

User Name: =

Date and Time: = 2024-11-24

Job Number: = 239387318

Documents (454)

Client/Matter: -None-

Search Terms: dele giwa "journalist"

Search Type: NaturalAnd

Content Type

Narrowed by

news

: Newspapers : Newswires & Press Releases : Blogs

Timeline: Oct 20, 1986 to Oct 20, 2023

1. Remembering Dele Giwa
2. Dele Giwa's Death: 37yrs After, Council Chairman Establishes Essay Competition
3. Letter bomb did not kill Dele Giwa — Saka
4. AFRICMIL invites young journalists to submit essays on late Dele Giwa
5. 37 years after Giwa's death: Etsako council chairman set up secondary school essay competition in his honour
6. Utomi, Falana to attend lecture in honour of #EndSARS, Dele Giwa
7. Remembering Dele Giwa, An Icon Of Bold Investigative Journalism
8. Dele Giwa's Assassination: 37 Years After -By Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye
9. 37 Years After, Analyst Blames Babangida, Successive Govts. For Failure To Find Giwa's Killers
10. Utomi, Falana to attend lecture in honour of #EndSARS, Dele Giwa

11. Dele Giwa: 34 Years After His Gruesome Murder!
12. Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (1)
13. Land grabbers invade 'property of Dele Giwa's doctor'
14. 'Why Dele Giwa's doctor left home after Newswatch editor's death'
15. Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After
16. Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After
17. Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (2)
18. I am Dele Giwa
19. Sunday Igboho: Why I rejected IGP Adamu's invitation
20. Why I Shunned Inspector-General Of Police's Invitation - Igboho
21. The enduring ministry of Ray Ekpu
22. The journalist as a game
23. MIKE [email protected]: I'll do journalism again if there's a second coming
24. Ita-Giwa tackles ex-DIG Omeben over Dele Giwa's death
25. Dele Giwa, 29 Years After
26. Dele Giwa's Mother Dies At 87 - As Community Demands Fresh Probe Into Dele Giwa's Death
27. Dele Giwa and the Dilemma of a Journalist

28. 'How Govt Can Unmask Dele Giwa's Killers'
29. Remembering Dele Giwa [opinion]
30. I won't rest until Bakassi people are properly resettled - Ita-Giwa
31. Sunday Igboho declines IGP's invitation via letter
32. Eminent journalist Ray Ekpu at 75
33. Dele Giwa - 25 Years of Fruitless Search for Killers
34. HATS OFF TO UNCLE RAY
35. FG Urged to Establish Journalism School in of Honour Dele Giwa
36. Ray is the reason I'm in journalism
37. Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism - Iboro Otongaran
38. Prologue: A diary of wastage
39. 30 Years After, Dele Giwa's Pen Remains Mightier
40. Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism
41. Who 'Killed' Gen. Ibrahim Attahiru?
42. Prologue: A diary of wastage
43. Dele Giwa: Omeben is a liar -Tsav
44. Ugbekpe -Ekperi - Remembering Dele Giwa 29 Years After
45. Return of Newswatch , Victory For Dele Giwa Ray Ekpu

46. Dele Giwa: Among Marwa, Amoda and Ogunade
47. What a murderer said
48. Why I turned down IGP's secret invitation - Sunday Igboho
49. 'Our history is rotting away': the newspaper archivists preserving Nigeria 's past
50. At Babangida's 80th Birthday Lecture, Panelists Address His Challenges
51. Kaleidoscope: an artist's rite of passage
52. A Rare Ray
53. A Rare Ray
54. A Rare Ray
55. Why I Couldn't Investigate Dele Giwa's Death--Ex-DIG
56. Why I Couldn't Investigate Dele Giwa's Death—Ex-DIG
57. A Rare Ray!
58. How Dele Giwa's mum died, by daughter
59. A Rare Ray
60. A rare Ray
61. Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry
62. Boko Haram Started With Bombing of Dele Giwa - - Prof Odinkalu
63. Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

64. A Rare Ray at 75
65. NMMA honours PUNCH, others - Punch Newspapers
66. Ex-Police Chief Opens Up On Dele Giwa Assassination
67. A master-reporter on top of his game
68. How Nzeribe helped IBB annul Abiola's election
69. Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry
70. Who Replaces Adedayo Among Nigerian Journalists?
71. Dele Giwa's Death and Investigation - Why the Truth Cannot Be Told [opinion]
72. Uncle Ray is 75
73. Vanguard Reporter: Police Must Produce Killers Of Tordue Salem, Says Omo-Agege
74. Ex-DIG Omeben Opens Up On Stalled Dele Giwa Assassination Investigation
75. NUJ Calls for End to Impunity, Crimes Against Journalists
76. Stanley Macebuh... 10 years in mind
77. The Controversial Lekki Conundrum
78. My good friend Ojeagbase gone for good
79. Dele Giwa Assassination - Investigation Was Marred By Interferences From'high Places' - Ex-DIG
80. Ihedioha Breaks Silence, Says God Will Render Ultimate Judgment
81. Did Investigative Journalism Die With Dele Giwa? [analysis]

82. Ex-DIG - Dele Giwa's Assassination Was Marred By Interference From 'High Places'
83. Ohanaeze, Afenifere, Uwazuruike mourn Tony Momoh
84. My journalism journey
85. Buhari, Solve Dele Giwa's Murder!
86. 'How Dele Giwa's Murder Led to Mother's Slow Death'
87. Chuks Iloegbunam: Restless But Peaceful Soul
88. My journalism journey
89. 'Insurgency started with Dele Giwa's bombing'
90. My Journalism Journey
91. Dele Giwa's murder suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria , say ex-DIG who probed the murder
92. Nigerian journalists and the military coup in Niger
93. Dimgba Igwe's Journalism Masterpiece
94. No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole
95. Whitewashing impunity and iniquity
96. No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole
97. GandoDollar Gate: Beyond Ja'afar's video
98. Pupils learn about journalism, others on career day

99. Gideon Orkar: The man who saw tomorrow
100. PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!
101. Stanley Macebuh: Unforgettable pathfinder of modern Nigerian journalism
102. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
103. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
104. Nyaknno Abasi Osso: The search engine before Google
105. Murder in the Consulate
106. Chronicles of an uncommon journalist
107. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
108. #EndSARS Protests: FG Asked To Probe TV Reporter's Death
109. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
110. 'How journalism became love of my life'
111. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
112. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
113. Protecting the battered rights of murder victims
114. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
115. Giwa, Death, and Journalism
116. 70 years of Ojeagbaseism

117. Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

118. 70 years of Ojeagbaseism

119. Reviewing parallax view of heroism

120. Loud Whispers with Joseph Edgar

121. Dele Giwa - Still No Clue Yet On Killers [analysis]

122. So Long A Reading Session For Ray Ekpu

123. 25 Years After, Dele Giwa Rests On, As His Killers Remain Restless [analysis]

124. Agent From Abuja : An Unending Nigerian Story

125. Dele Giwa's Assassination - the Verdict of History

126. Agent From Abuja : An Unending Nigerian Story

127. Media Trust Chairman, Others Get Newswatch Awards

128. Tompolo and the Niger Delta oil thieves

129. Between church and World Cup finals

130. Imo guber: I didn't expect my application for review would be rejected - Ihedioha

131. Journalist With A Heart: Nkanga Gets Reward For Courage

132. Nollywood As Compass to National Questions

133. Controversial and multiple award-winning journalist, Sam Omatseye, tells his story\xa0

134. Human Rights Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow

135. Tackling impunity for crimes against journalists
136. Zik's death story which turned out to be false, taught me a profound lesson - Azubuike Ishiekwene, ex-Punch Editor
137. Obi And His Obedient Tyrants
138. Press Freedom - Report Indicts Govt, Govs, Senators As Greatest Violators
139. Shekarau Urges Journalists to Expose Bad Leaders
140. A peep into history (III)
141. Supreme Court Judgment Portends Grave Implications For Judiciary, Democracy, Electoral Process — Ihedioha
142. Press Freedom: Report indicts FG, govs, NASS, others
143. Imo : God'll Judge Supreme Court Justices -Ihedioha
144. The road to the Sabres
145. The Nation flies highest with 10 prizes at NMMA
146. Ethical Dilemma, Journalism Practice and Remedies -By Taiwo Hassan
147. Favoured by Benevolent Gods...
148. Dele Giwa's Murder - Omeben Lied, I Gave Statements to Police Twice - Soyinka
149. A peep into history - 3
150. My Mother Was In Labour For Eight Days, I Came Out Presumed Dead -Onayiga
151. Why I sought review of Supreme Court judgement, by Ihedioha

152. Quadruple Heritage: The Drama of Post-Colonial Nigeria !

153. Duro Onabule: A library burns down, by Femi Adesina

154. Remembering Nigeria 's journalism pathfinder, Stanley Macebuh

155. Duro Onabule: A library burns down

156. Gen. Babangida On The Marble

157. Of reign of gangsters and fraudsters

158. ODUKOMAIYA: The man who gave me my first newspaper job

159. Celebrating Dele Momodu, my star reporter

160. Dotun Oyelade Reporting...(Memoirs Of A Newshound)

161. A Nation On The Precipice

162. A Nation Astray

163. Remarkable Historical Occurrences And Events In Nigerian History Made In August

164. Taking the power of the air

165. I was happy Soyinka got angry Concord interviewed ex-wife — Awoyinfa

166. Wayas' waltz across history's stage

167. 29 Years After, IBB Opens Up on What Killed Dele Giwa & 159 Officers on Crashed Military Plane

168. Wayas' Waltz Across History's Stage

169. A Return To A Season Of Anomie print

170. God will Judge Supreme Court Justices - Ihedioha
171. Dahiru Lawal On Yushau Shuaib: Less Sense, More Nonsense
172. Abubakar Tsav - When the Times Were Tough [opinion]
173. We'll reopen Dele Giwa's case - Sowore
174. I Will Temper With Press Freedom
175. Mike Adenuga buys Masekela's trumpet
176. The Nation stars at NMMA
177. Noble Birth, Troubled Adulthood
178. Nigeria Kills Them All (For Precious Owolabi)
179. Why IBB Should Not Be Celebrated - By Festus Aofun
180. The journalist, still an endangered species
181. Osinachi: Questions begging for answers -2
182. Former Nigerian dictator seeks to block possible probe into journalist's slaying
183. The Journalist, Still An Endangered Specie!
184. The editors' editor
185. Tony Momoh: Each Man, His Time
186. Unbalanced chequered checks: Judiciary fumbles
187. 27 Yrs After Parcel Bomb - I Could Have Been Killed Like Dele Giwa - Kayode Soyinka

188. I started doubting Buhari's smartness after our 1984 encounter - Oyelade
189. Murdered Journalist: Union Demands Justice
190. Magazine Disavows Lawyer's Move Against Security Chiefs
191. Tinubu's ministerial gyrations fail to inspire
192. Omatsola's Rhythmic eyes, watching and telling
193. Only restructuring can save Nigeria -Eze Ogbonnaya
194. Omatsola's Rhythmic Eyes, Watching and Telling [book review]
195. Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be
196. Fact-Checking Technology, Key To Combating Fake News - Olupohunda
197. Uneven Steps: Journey of nightmares
198. EBONY, and Ebonygate revisited
199. Why Nigerian government should kill NBC
200. Tony Momoh: A Statesman
201. We need selfless, incorruptible leaders —Cleric
202. 50 Moon years and Soyinka
203. The black monk (3)
204. My Journey: A Personal Story by Kingsley Moghalu
205. OF KARMA, CAMA, THE CHURCH, AND MUSHROOMING CHURCHES (1)

206. New book blames Odili for political violence in Rivers, Amaechi, Wike for profiting from it

207. NUJ demands arrest, prosecution of killers of Bayelsa journalist

208. NIGERIA SEEKS THE SLAYERS OF AN EDITOR

209. Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless

210. Why I Ventured Into Movie Production -Foluso Lala

211. RIGHTS- NIGERIA : PROBING 15 YEARS OF ABUSES UNDER THE MILITARY

212. NUJ demands arrest, prosecution of killers of Bayelsa journalist

213. OPINION: AT 78, IBB MAINTAINS HIS IMPORTANT BEATS, BUT

214. At 78, IBB maintains his important beats, but...

215. At 78, IBB Maintains His Essential Beats, But...

216. Blame Obasanjo For Bad Leadership In Nigeria Osoba

217. Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

218. Killing of Journalists Now Game [opinion]

219. Echoes of parcel bomb

220. Another Roots for IBB

221. The conscience of a nation

222. Six Things June 12 Taught Me

223. THE UNFORGETTABLE MEE 20 YEARS GONE

224. Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape And Murder So Gruesome!

225. I like doing house chores to encourage my sons -Bolaji Abdullahi

226. Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

227. Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape, Murder So Gruesome!

228. NIGERIA : INTERNATIONAL JURY TO PROBE INTO MURDER CASE

229. The myth of cars in a holy well

230. The Myth of Cars in a Holy Well

231. #EndSARS: My father would be proud of Nigerian youths - Dele Giwa's daughter

232. June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

233. June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

234. I Was a Security Guard Before I Became a Lawyer, SAN

235. NGE Mourns Slain Journalist

236. Understanding Hazards of The Country's Journalism [analysis]

237. Makinde, Adeolu Akande, Ogunwuyi, Fatia Buhari, Others Make 2021 Oyo 100 Most Influential List

238. War against everybody

239. The SSS Provocateur and Ken Saro-Wiwa (II) [opinion]

240. Gani: Ten Years On, Still The Finest

241. ANA commend Buhari on June 12, Abiola
242. Babangida: The Prince At 78
243. NUJ Wants IG to Revisit Alleged Journalists' Killings in Lagos
244. Akinnola Doles Out N.25 Million to Wives of Dead Journalists
245. PARCEL BOMB KILLS NIGERIAN JOURNALIST ACCUSED OF PLOTTING
246. Derek Ingram (1925-2018)
247. Derek Ingram: A tribute
248. Will the deceased get justice?
249. Will the deceased get justice?
250. Ex- Daily Times MD Dies in Road Crash
251. A President in Need of Disciples [opinion]
252. NUJ Abuja Protest Over Murdered Journalists
253. Babangida And the Bypass to Nowhere [column]
254. Repent of your corrupt antecedents, Clergy urges IBB
255. POLITICS- NIGERIA : TALES OF MILITARY ABUSES RECOUNTED BY VICTIMS
256. Nigeria @60 : New colours of crime
257. The greatest lesson I learnt in my 60-year journey: Toyin Onanuga
258. NIGERIAN MILITARY RULERS BLAMED FOR MURDERS

259. For Awoyinfa, My Boss, Teacher At 60 [opinion]
260. 2011 - Anti Babangida Coalition Sets to Mobilise Opposition
261. LOOKING FORWARD
262. Will David Ugolor Get Justice?
263. 23 Years After, IBB Opens up On Crashed Hercules C-130
264. Nigeria ranks 13th among 14 nations on Impunity Index
265. Wake Up, Nigeria Is Dying - a Reply to My Fulani Friends (I) [opinion]
266. Find the Killers [editorial]
267. Find the Killers or ... [editorial]
268. Ulli Beier's 'madman' at Aro psychiatric hospital
269. Gaddafi's Madness And the Senate President Who Saw Tomorrow [analysis]
270. INTERNATIONAL DAY TO END IMPUNITY FOR CRIMES AGAINST JOURNALISTS COMMEMORATED IN NIGERIA
271. Khashoggi's murder
272. Poor Leadership, Bane of Our Development - Eminent Nigerians
273. Crusaders for Coops & Rural Dev.
274. Press freedom under attack
275. Rawlings Must Vomit Abacha's Blood Money

276. Nigerian Nobel Prize Winner Calls for Justice in Journalist's Murder

277. Onukaba, Former Daily Times MD Dead

278. Former Daily Times MD, Onukaba Adinoyi-Ojo murdered

279. Clowns, the Tortoise And Babangida's Quest [column]

280. Untold Stories of Nigerian Media

281. The SSS Provocateur and Ken Saro-Wiwa [opinion]

282. Enduring legacies of Orlando Owoh

283. Bloody year for global media

284. Nothing like Notting Hill Carnival

285. Of Mines, Miners and Minefields [column]

286. We live in dangerous times in Nigeria -Awoyinfa

287. Boko Haram Will Soon Be History, Says Borno Deputy Governor

288. Live Updates: Governorship/Assembly Elections 2023

289. Live Updates: Governorship/Assembly Elections 2023

290. Top military arrests stun Nigerians

291. The first citizen of journalism Dele Olojede regards politics as a blood sport

292. Confab: Ighure, Dokpesi make case for journalists

293. Where is Aliyu Isma'il Gwarzo?

- 294. Nigeria enforces press clampdown
- 295. Omisore's thoughtful thoughts
- 296. Nigeria : Time for action
- 297. At NIJ Convocation - Dokpesi Sues for Professionalism in Media
- 298. National Conference - Ighure, Dokpesi Make Case for Journalists' Protection, Welfare
- 299. Shoddy investigation of violent deaths
- 300. Journalists at the Mercy of Gunmen [analysis]
- 301. Nigeria : Lagos journalist gunned down at home, 2 others killed in religious violence in Jos
- 302. Nigeria : Lagos journalist gunned down at home, 2 others killed in religious violence in Jos
- 303. Ex- Daily Times MD Adinoyi-Ojo is dead
- 304. Nigeria : 3 journalists killed in weekend violence
- 305. Police - an Institution and Its Challenges
- 306. UNFORGETTABLE DIMGBA IGWE @ 60
- 307. Nigeria : 3 journalists killed in weekend violence
- 308. Onukaba Adinoyi-Ojo (1960-2017)
- 309. Dimgba Igwe: Passage of the veteran
- 310. Lingering Effects of Nation's Terror Status [analysis]
- 311. Democracy and Freedom of the Press [opinion]

312. The dollar is dearer than your life!

313. Omisore's thoughtful thoughts

314. Journalists - An Endangered Species [analysis]

315. 50th Award - Robbing Peter to Pay Paul [opinion]

316. Why I Endorse Adams Oshiomhole [column]

317. Who Benefits When Citizens Bomb Citizens? [opinion]

318. Dimgba Igwe: Passage Of The Veteran

319. Nigeria journalists become target of radical sect

320. Nigeria journalists become target of radical sect

321. Chronicling Ordeal of Journalists [analysis]

322. Al-Mustapha's acquittal

323. Journalists in Nigeria , long threatened, become target of radical Islamist sect
Nigeria journalists become target of radical sect

324. Tribute for Kunle Ajibade

325. 'If I step foot in Nigeria , I'm going to die' – David Hundeyin

326. Seye Kehinde - the Rising Tale of a Magazine Mogul!

327. Journalists in the Throes of Insecurity [analysis]

328. Bankole's Diabolical Sense of Humour [opinion]

329. Revisiting power abuse in Nigeria

330. Killing of Journalists [editorial]

331. Another Journalist Felled Amidst Insecurity

332. Journalism Under Attack [analysis]

333. Laspotech Students' Initiative Towards Community Development

334. Five Books for Media Persons [opinion]

335. Vignettes of Nigerian History [opinion]

336. Why Journalists Should Be Suspicious of Politicians -Momoh

337. Nigeria ; a museum of unanswered questions

338. THE PAST OF TWO GREAT NIGERIAN GENERALS

339. A lifetime of gratitude

340. When a 'Senior Advocate of the Media' Departed

341. Master of coup on receiving end of armed challenge for power: Nigerian rebellion comes after years of despotic rule where criticism can end in death

342. A toast to Reuben Abati at 50 by Toni Kan

343. 'Writer's block is an illusion'

344. Southern Kaduna massacres on my mind

345. The journalist as endangered specie

346. Boko Haram Names Buhari, Five Others As Mediators - *FG Welcomes Move, Buhari Cautious

347. Soyinka's Demonisation of Jonathan
348. Budget Impasse, Executive Excesses - National Assembly to Blame
349. Dimgba Igwe: Nigeria and the hit-and-run syndrome
350. SPECIAL FEATURE: Khashoggi's killing renews calls for journalists' safety in Nigeria
351. Khashoggi's killing renews calls for journalists' safety in Nigeria
352. The Media and 2011 [column]
353. GANI FAWEHINMI Lawyer and activist who fought for human rights in Nigeria
354. Guns Against the Journalist [opinion]
355. Khashoggi's murder sparks calls for safety of journalists
356. Al-Mustapha and a Defective Justice System [opinion]
357. How Dimgba Igwe and I broke barriers to write 50 World Editors -Mike Awoyinfa
358. Soyinka's Demonisation of Jonathan
359. Insecurity - I Live in Constant Fear of the Next Attack - Nma, Father of Two [analysis]
360. Ode to teachers
361. Enenche Akogwu - A Case for Improved Welfare [analysis]
362. NIGERIA : STIFFER SANCTIONS WILL NOT SOLVE CRISIS, SAY OBSERVERS
363. The Case of Buhari's Alleged Plagiarism [column]
364. Ninth Daily Trust Dialogue - Politics and the Media in Africa [column]

365. The Human Person And the Evil Within (2) [analysis]

366. Ade Abolurin - Good Citizen of the Federal Republic (GCFR) [opinion]

367. Sustaining Political Re-Branding, Media Profiling [analysis]

368. Newswatch - Sad End to a Great News Magazine [column]

369. How to Go to Aba [column]

370. Nigerian Press Under Fire From Military Leaders

371. Soyinka's demonization of Jonathan

372. Access to Information and Transparency

373. Review: Fiction: Out of the shadows: A passionate first novel that emerges victorious against all the odds: Waiting for an Angel by Helon Habila 226pp, Hamish Hamilton, pounds 12.99

374. Abuja Bomb Blasts And 2011 Elections [analysis]

375. Onukaba: 'I am the hope of my people'

376. NIGERIA 'S PANEL ENCOUNTERED UNREPENTANT MILITARY CHIEFS. MANY FAILED TO EVEN APPEAR. INQUIRY INTO RIGHTS ABUSES STYMIED

377. Learning African Politics Through Chinua Achebe (IV) [opinion]

378. As Onukaba Adinoyi-Ojo Foundation is launched...

379. Re - Babangida's Age And Agenda [opinion]

380. Yemi Ogunbiyi - Consolidating Scholarship

381. 2012 in Retrospect - Any Respite From Bombings in 2013?

382. Harvest of awards for The Nation at NMMA
383. Sanwo-Olu: Fragile, handle with care!
384. How to end the bully culture in America
385. Jitters As MEND Threatens Another Blast
386. The Problem With Desperados [opinion]
387. Nigeria 's Persecuted Press Fights Back Underground
388. 21st Century Media - New Frontiers, New Barriers
389. Babangida's Age And Agenda [column]
390. The world of Achebe: Illustrissimo of African Literature (1)
391. Jimoh Ibrahim Cheated Us, Says Ekpu
392. Before the Next Terror Victims [opinion]
393. Free Speech, Reputation And National Security [column]
394. Between IBB And His Mentor, the Hannibal [analysis]
395. The Second Coming of Babangida [analysis]
396. Unmasking Adenuga [opinion]
397. It's Unfortunate We Have Recycled Leadership in Power - Ajakaye [interview]
398. My Dark Days With Anyim - Sen Ita-Giwa [interview]
399. A Life in Justice [analysis]

- 400. 'Our writers are the best in the land'
- 401. Going to meet Pa Michael Imoudu
- 402. Going to meet Pa Michael Imoudu
- 403. The Return of the Parcel Bomb [column]
- 404. Florence - a Woman of Substance
- 405. Journalists At the Mercy of Gunmen
- 406. An Illustrious Wordsmith At 70
- 407. Dele Giwa - IPC Calls for Justice
- 408. Another Journalist Murdered [analysis]
- 409. 77 Hearty Cheers for Kongi
- 410. The Legal Challenge of Insurgency [analysis]
- 411. Dele Momodu Visits His Father's Rented House In Ile-Ife (Video, Pics)
- 412. Buhari and transforming Nigeria 's military
- 413. IPC boss Lanre Arogundade released after arrest by DSS at Airport
- 414. Media Tasked On Accountability, Good Governance
- 415. Walking Through a Minefield At Midnight (2) [analysis]
- 416. Dr. Paulyn Walley-Daniels Ghanaian lady who became Nigeria 's first female sports reporter

417. Something Happened!

418. Dimgba Igwe: A life formed by the written word

419. The Transfiguration of General Buhari [ column]

420. I cannot guarantee that I would remain single for the rest of my life Florence Ita-Giwa @ 70

421. Odukomaiya @ 80 - 'Why Abiola Fought Everything Awolowo Stood For' [interview]

422. How to Make Our Constitution a People's Constitution - Editors, Others [analysis]

423. Soyinka At 76 - The Making of Kongi [analysis]

424. 2011 Presidency - IBB and His Presidential Burden [column]

425. Why I wrote a book on former President Jonathan - Bolaji Abdullahi

426. BOOKS OF Revelation

427. Ex-police chief: Dele Giwa's murder probe marred by interferences from 'high places'

428. Victory At Dawn - a Night of Horror Recalled [opinion]

429. Insecurity in Nigeria - The Legal Challenge [document]

430. Judiciary Should Point Out Proactively the Debris Called Laws to Interpret And Enforce - Eyo [interview]

431. Leadership and the Burden of History [opinion]

432. Unresolved Cases of Extra-Judicial Killings - So Far, So Bad - Mohammed Bello Adeoke, AGF [analysis]

433. Utomi - Countries That Have Made Progress Did So Because Leaders Inspired Followers [interview]

434. A Part of Us Died When Newswatch Was Sold to Jimoh Ibrahim - Ray Ekpu [interview]
435. A Night of Horror Recalled [analysis]
436. Why I abandoned CBN job for journalism-Ugochukwu
437. All the deities in my domain are now dead -Eze Ogbonnaya, Abia State
438. How Secure is the Nation? [analysis]
439. Dwindling Sales - a Looming Media Challenge [analysis]
440. Constitution Amendment - What the People Want [analysis]
441. Kingsley Moghalu - Watching Failure of Recycled Politicians Pushed Me to Run for President [interview]
442. We Don't Have a God in PDP Anymore - Mohammed, Newswatch Co-Founder [interview]
443. Men who control Nigeria
444. Men who control Nigeria
445. A Northern Candidate Against All Odds
446. The Sun is not partisan, but on the side of Nigerians -Eric Osagie, MD /EIC, The Sun Publishing Limited
447. Weak Laws Make Judges Give Semblance of Justice to Rotten Cases - Eyo [interview]
448. Kukah's bombshell! I can marry if I wish
449. Nigerian ex-ruler lists conditions to appear before rights panel
450. Volksadvocaat van Nigeria Gani Fawehinmi (1938-2009), mensenrechtenactivist

451. Smiling enigma may return to fore NIGERIAN POLITICS PRO-DEMOCRACY
CAMPAIGNERS CONCERNED OVER LEGAL MOVE AGAINST PRESIDENT OBASANJO BY FORMER MILI:

452. Ein Leben im Alptraum

453. Child protection

454. PARCEL BOMB KILLS NIGERIAN JOURNALIST ACCUSED OF PLOTTING

Remembering Dele Giwa

The Nation (Nigeria)

October 19, 2023 Thursday

Copyright 2023 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 273 words

Body

---

How time flies? Today makes it exactly 37 years that founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine, Dele Giwa, was killed by parcel bomb in his Adeniyi Jones, Ikeja, Lagos home. Time virtually stood still that Sunday, as news spread of his death. Sympathisers rushed to his residence and the Newswatch office then at Oregun to condole with his family and colleagues.

Giwa was a colourful journalist. After returning home from the United States (US), he landed at the Daily Times, where he made the features pages a delight to read. He crossed over to Concord Group of Newspapers to edit the Sunday paper. Giwa wrote with passion. He threw himself into his job and when he and his three friends started Newswatch in 1985, magazine publishing came of age. Giwa's forceful nature gave Newswatch its outlook.

'Why Dele Giwa's doctor left home after Newswatch editor's death'

The circumstances surrounding his death remain as hazy as they were when he was bombed in 1986. Who killed Dele Giwa? This is the question his family, friends and colleagues have been asking since his death. The question remains pertinent today, just as it was in 1986. The Ibrahim Babaginda-led junta under which he was killed pledged to fish out his killers. It failed to do so despite the linking of some of its top officials with the dastardly act.

Will Giwa die in vain? Will we continue to ask the question: Who killed Dele Giwa? Or will the latter change to: Revealed: Those who killed Dele Giwa? For his children and grandchildren, finding Giwa's killers and bringing them to justice is the only way to bring closure to the matter. May he continue to rest in peace.

Load-Date: October 20, 2023

Dele Giwa's Death: 37yrs After, Council Chairman Establishes Essay Competition

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

October 20, 2023 Friday

Copyright 2023 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 367 words

Byline: Our Correspondents

Body

---

Dele Giwa

BENIN - As a way of immortalizing late Dele Giwa's name after 37 years of his death, Etsako Central LGA chairman Hon. Solomon Obomighie has established essay competition among secondary schools in the local government in commemoration of his journalism profession.

Late Dele Giwa, was a prominent journalist and an illustrious son of Etsako Central, a renowned editor-in-chief and chief executive of Newswatch magazine, made significant contributions to the journalism profession and remains a symbol of integrity and courage in the face of adversity who was killed on October 19th, 1986, through a pancel bomb.

The chairman said late Dele Giwa secondary school essay competition is aimed to celebrate and promote the values that he embodied throughout his career and it will provide a platform for young writers and journalists in the local government to know more about him and express thheir thoughts on pressing societal issues and showcase their writing skills.

"This competition will not only serve as a tribute to late Dele Giwa but also foster a nurturing environment for budding writers and journalists to receive recognition and encouragement. It is our hope that through this platform, we will inspire the next generation of journalists to embrace the core principles of truth, transparency, and accountability", he added.

Hon Obomighie further stated that the late Dele Giwa secondary school essay competition is an initiative that demonstrates his commitment to appreciate the worthy sons of the entire Etsako Central local government and a way to promoting education, fostering talent, and upholding the legacy of our remarkable individuals.

Dele Giwa's Death: 37yrs After, Council Chairman Establishes Essay Competition

"We will be collaborating with local education authority, private school owners and professional journalists to make this competition a success and impactful among the young ones.

The chairman said that the council would give a details regarding the essay competition, including eligibility, prizes, and submission guidelines, will be released soon in.

Hon. Obomighie however urged all secondary school principals to give a wider awareness to their students in the Local Government for participation as it will help in widening their writing skills.

Load-Date: October 20, 2023

---

End of Document

Letter bomb did not kill Dele Giwa — Saka

Opinion Nigeria

October 20, 2023 Friday

Copyright 2023 Opinion Nigeria Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

...Addressing today's topical issues

Length: 350 words

Byline: Opinion Nigeria

Body

---

Thirty-seven years after the death of the founder of Newswatch, a public affairs analyst and public relations consultant, Mr. Deyemi Saka, yesterday, refuted claims that the veteran journalist, late Dele Giwa, died from a letter bomb.

Saka, who spoke on a breakfast show, a Television Continental, TVC, programme, said no investigation or forensic analysis was carried out to determine the cause of Giwa's death.

According to him, if Giwa truly died from a parcel bomb, his hands would not have been intact, adding that examples abound of individuals who lost their hands after opening a letter bomb.

Saka insisted that there is a need for Nigerians to call the eye witness for a clear account of all that transpired before Giwa passed on.

His words: "Dele Giwa did not die from the explosion of the letter bomb. He held it with his left hand and tore it. It mangled the mahogany table. The right hand that tore the bomb was intact. I am not happy that Chief Gani Fawehinmi isn't alive because he sought closure to Giwa's death before he died."

Letter bomb did not kill Dele Giwa — Saka

"Victims or survivors of parcel bombs always have injuries on their faces or limbs. The death of Giwa wasn't consistent with this. The eyewitness account explained how he tore it open. His face was spared.

"I am probably hopeful that Nigerians will start asking more questions. I probably see that if Nigerians accept this, it is an opening that will help the Dele Giwa family to get closure and justice.

"The only blame on Gen. Ibrahim Babangida (retd) was not fishing out his killers. I also blame successive governments for this. Nigerians should please start asking questions, probably need to call the eyewitness to please sit back and tell Nigerians maybe he missed a thing or two.

"He died from an explosion, but not necessarily from a parcel bomb. Michael Lassie, who was a victim of a parcel bomb, lost both hands. He now uses prosthetic hands.

"Giwa died of an explosion, but not a letter bomb. The idea that General Akilu called Giwa's house to know his residence as an alibi for the fact that the Federal Government killed him is farther from the truth.

Load-Date: October 20, 2023

---

End of Document

AFRICMIL invites young journalists to submit essays on late Dele Giwa

AFRICMIL invites young journalists to submit essays on late Dele Giwa

The Nation (Nigeria)

September 18, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 288 words

Body

---

The African Centre for Media and Information Literacy (AFRICMIL) has invited young journalists across the country to contribute to the book of essays in honour of Dele Giwa.

Oladele Sunmonu Giwa was a fiery and courageous Nigerian journalist, Editor-in-Chief and founder of Newswatch, a weekly magazine founded in 1984.

He was assassinated on October 19, 1986, through a letter bomb delivered at his residence in Lagos. He was 39 years old at the time.

AFRICMIL is putting together a book of essays in honour of the late journalist.

October 19, 2021, marks the 35th anniversary of the murder of Dele Giwa. Thirty-five years later, his family is still waiting for justice to be served; his killers and their accomplices have yet to be brought to book.

The Dele Giwa Book of Essays is a key feature of the Dele Giwa Annual Lecture and Awards on Courage and Accountability in Journalism scheduled to hold later in the year.

Dele Giwa redefined Nigerian journalism because of his courage and his writing. Although there are a few books on Dele Giwa, the first being 'Born To Run' by Dele Olojede, another gifted journalist, who was working with Giwa in Newswatch at the time the heinous crime was committed, not much has been done in concrete terms to promote his legacy.

The Dele Giwa Book of Essays is a key feature of the Dele Giwa Annual Lecture and Awards on Courage and Accountability in Journalism scheduled to hold later in the year.

The essay, according to AFRICMIL is open to journalists under 40 years and affiliated with a recognised media house in Nigeria.

Essays it said should be between 1000 and 1200 words (maximum) and submitted in Microsoft word document (Times New Roman - 12 points). They MUST reflect the aims of the book.

AFRICMIL invites young journalists to submit essays on late Dele Giwa

Load-Date: September 18, 2021

---

End of Document

37 years after Giwa's death: Etsako council chairman set up secondary school essay competition in his honour

37 years after Giwa's death: Etsako council chairman set up secondary school essay competition in his honour

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 20, 2023 Friday

Copyright 2023 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Voice of the Nation

Length: 368 words

Byline: Cyril

Body

---

From Ighomuaye Lucky, Benin

As a way of immortalizing his name after 37 years of his death, Etsako Central LGA chairman Hon. Solomon Obomigie has established Dele Giwa's essay competition among secondary schools in the Local Government in commemoration of his journalism profession.

Late Dele Giwa, was a prominent journalist and an illustrious son of Etsako Central, a renowned editor-in-chief and chief executive of Newswatch magazine, made significant contributions to the journalism profession and remains a symbol of integrity and courage in the face of adversity who was killed on October 19th, 1986, through a pancel bomb.

The chairman said late Dele Giwa secondary school essay competition is aimed to celebrate and promote the values that he embodied throughout his career and it will provide a platform for young writers and journalists in the local government to know more about him and express their thoughts on pressing societal issues and showcase their writing skills.

"This competition will not only serve as a tribute to late Dele Giwa but also foster a nurturing environment for budding writers and journalists to receive recognition and encouragement. It is our hope that through this platform, we will inspire the next generation of journalists to embrace the core principles of truth, transparency, and accountability", he added.

37 years after Giwa's death: Etsako council chairman set up secondary school essay competition in his honour

Hon Obomighie further stated that the late Dele Giwa secondary school essay competition is an initiative that demonstrates his commitment to appreciate the worthy sons of the entire Etsako Central Local Government and a way to promoting education, fostering talent, and upholding the legacy of our remarkable individuals.

"We will be collaborating with local education authority, private school owners and professional journalists to make this competition a success and impactful among the young ones.

The chairman said that the council would give a details regarding the essay competition, including eligibility, prizes, and submission guidelines, will be released soon.

Hon. Obomighie however urged all secondary school principals to give a wider awareness to their students in the Local Government for participation as it will help in widening their writing skills.

Load-Date: October 20, 2023

---

End of Document

Utomi, Falana to attend lecture in honour of #EndSARS, Dele Giwa

The Punch

October 17, 2021 Sunday

Copyright 2021 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 298 words

Body

---

Ademola Olonilua Published 17 October 2021

Political economist and former presidential candidate, Prof. Patrick Utomi, and Human Rights lawyer, Mr Femi Falana, are billed to attend a lecture in honour of Dele Giwa, as well as to commemorate the first anniversary of the #EndSARS protest.

Dele Giwa was the founding editor-in-chief of Newswatch magazine. He died 35 years ago. However, the event is organised by the African Centre for Media and Information Literacy, in partnership with Wole Soyinka Centre for Investigative Journalism, Enough is Enough Nigeria, National Consultative Front, PLAYYA and MILID Foundation

Moreso, the event will also mark the public presentation of Remaking Nigeria: Sixty Years, Sixty Voices – a book of 60 essays by 60 young Nigerians which salutes 60 years of Nigeria's independence and points the way towards a better country.

The #EndSARS advocacy made global headlines last October when young Nigerians across the country and in major cities around the world embarked on protests against persistent brutality and rights violations by the Nigeria Police Force.

The Coordinator of AFRICMIL, Chido Onumah, said in a statement, "One year after the protests and the reprehensible violent response by the Nigerian Army which led to the death of unarmed protesters at the Lekki Toll Gate in Lagos. It is important to cast a critical eye on that incident and see what lessons have been learnt and what needs to be done going forward."

Significantly, the first-year remembrance of these protests coincides with the 35th anniversary of the murder via letter-bomb of the celebrated journalist, Dele Giwa.

"It is a measure of the acute dysfunction of the Nigerian state that till date, no one has been arrested let alone brought to trial for this heinous crime, Onumah noted.

Load-Date: October 17, 2021

Utomi, Falana to attend lecture in honour of #EndSARS, Dele Giwa

---

End of Document

Remembering Dele Giwa, An Icon Of Bold Investigative Journalism

Nigerian Tribune

October 19, 2022 Wednesday

Copyright 2022 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 447 words

Body

---

It's 36 years today since the death of journalist, Dele Giwa, editor-in-chief and chief executive of Newswatch, who was killed via a parcel bomb.

He died on October 19, 1986 by a parcel bomb that was delivered to his house during the military regime of former military Head of State, Major General Ibrahim Babangida.

Giwa was killed while having breakfast with his friend Soyinka at his residence, located at 25 Talabi Street, Ikeja, Lagos, in 1986. He died at the age of 39.

Looking at the manner of his death, a death in his family home, by bomb parceled, sealed and delivered to his home, what could be more worrying than this manner of death?

This may be why, even after his death, Giwa has not ceased to arouse more controversies and theories about who killed Dele Giwa? And why? The question has not died.

It's quite unfortunate that African journalists face several violations of their right to press freedom and freedom of expression in the form of intimidation, harassment, threats, attacks, beatings, illegal detentions, arrests and imprisonment, and confiscation of equipment.

These are dark days for Nigerian journalists when they operate in difficult situations.

Nigeria has recorded a number of important journalists who have lost their lives in the course of exposing evil and wrongdoing.

Giwa would be remembered for his nature of exposing corrupt and illegal acts of the government and this earned him deserved recognition. He said he never answered to any powerful authority except for himself because he never liked to be the errand boy of some powerful politicians.

He once wrote in one of his rejoinders: 'I have said at every available opportunity that NOBODY tells me what to write in my column. It is my property, and I guard it jealously, for it is my freedom to think and write as I see. Nobody higher than me in the Concord Group has ever demanded my column for editing before publication. Any reaction to any of my columns has come after publication'... culled from the article - Enough of Errand Boy Journalism.

Remembering Dele Giwa, An Icon Of Bold Investigative Journalism

In 1984, two years before his death, Giwa and fellow journalists Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed founded a news magazine called Newswatch, that resurrected investigative journalism.

At first, the magazine triggered attention and praise from the public and also from the military administration of General Ibrahim Babangida. But by the second half of 1986, the magazine had become a threat to the military administration as a result of its criticisms of the government.

Giwa's death has always reminded us of the dangerous nature and power of journalism.

He died as a hero and his legacies of a good name and enchanting words will not be forgotten

Load-Date: October 20, 2022

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 37 Years After -By Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye

Opinion Nigeria

October 19, 2023 Thursday

Copyright 2023 Opinion Nigeria Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

...Addressing today's topical issues

Length: 1926 words

Byline: Opinion Nigeria

Body

---

"Death is...the absence of presence...the endless time of never coming back...a gap you can't see, and when the wind blows through it, it makes no sound" – Tom Stoppard

In the morning of Monday, October 20, 1986, I was preparing to go to work when a major item on the Anambra Broadcasting Service (ABS) 6.30 news bulletin hit me like a hard object. Mr. Dele Giwa, the founding editor-in-chief of 'Newswatch' magazine, had the previous day been killed and shattered by a letter bomb in his Lagos home. My scream was so loud that my colleague barged into my room to inquire what it was that could have made me to let out such an ear-splitting bellow.

We were three young men who had a couple of months earlier been posted from Enugu to Abakaliki to work in the old Anambra State public service, and we had hired a flat in a newly erected two-storey building at the end of Water Works Road, which we shared. My flat-mate, clearly, was not familiar with Giwa's name and work, and so had wondered why his death could elicit such a reaction from me.

But later that day, as he interacted with people, he realised that Giwa's death was such big news, and by the next couple of days, he had become an expert on Giwa and his truncated life and career. Across the country, Giwa's brutal death dominated the news not just because of the pride of place he occupied in Nigerian journalism practice, but more because of the totally novel way his killers had chosen to end his life.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 37 Years After -By Ugochukwu Ejinkonye

Indeed, death is an appointment which every human being must keep. While we are on earth, we reserve the right to reschedule or even cancel our day-to-day appointments. But in the matter of birth or death, any cancellation or rescheduling of appointments remain the exclusive prerogative of the Creator.

Although death is unavoidable, yet, no man has any right to arrogate to himself the role of bringing forward another person's appointment with death. In fact, it is abominable to even use one's hands to hasten one's own appointment with death. Laws of God and man fiercely abhor such an action. So, murderers, including suicide bombers, their sponsors and supporters should get it into their heads that they have no mandate whatsoever from the Creator of man to take even their own lives let alone that of other people, no matter the motivation.

Now, deep down the heart of every man and woman, and beyond the facade of all apparent fearlessness and bravery, lie this cold loathing and resentment for death. The survival instinct is always there and there is always this desire and care to avoid danger, to postpone one's date with death, temporarily at least, hence the constant struggle at many a deathbeds.

No doubt, Mr. Giwa was not expecting his own appointment with death when it came calling on Sunday, October 19, 1986. His friends say he loved life, was full of life, and wanted to make the best out of life. He had also worked hard to excel in his chosen career – journalism. But on that Sunday morning, as he had a late breakfast in his study in the company of Kayode Soyinka, the magazine's London Bureau Chief, a parcel was handed to him. On it was written: "From the Commander-in-Chief" with an instruction that it must be opened only by the addressee.

"This must be from the president", Giwa was reported to have said.

But unknown to him, in that seemingly innocuous parcel, was the cold, callous agent of brutal death, intent on accomplishing the abominable mission of hastening his appointment with death. Conceived by man, prepared by man, sent by man and delivered to him by man, this lethal instrument had only one mission: to bomb out the young life of Dele Giwa. And it did precisely that with chilling exactitude, tearing his flesh, wasting his blood, talent, usefulness to himself, his family, Newswatch magazine, Nigerian journalism and the Nigerian nation.

Giwa had written in 'Sunday Concord' newspaper of June 8, 1980 that "Death looks for a happy home where it can turn happiness into grief and ensure that for days the household will have nothing to discuss but the blow of death." He was the pioneer editor of 'Sunday Concord'. By writing this, he unwittingly wrote his own elegy.

"They got me!" That was Giwa's last words at First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja, where the Chief Medical Director, late Dr. Tosin Ajayi and his doctors had battled to see how they could save his life. Earlier, on their way to the hospital, Giwa was saying to his wife, Funmi, in Yoruba, "Nwon ti pa mi", meaning: "They have killed me."

Now, who are these "they" that were so heartless, so senseless, so callous, so fiendish and irremediably inhuman? How can a human being elect to do such a horrifying damage to another person? Giwa's flesh was reportedly shattered, with some pieces (some of which were discovered many days later) scattered about in his study. The autopsy report performed by pathologists at Lagos University Teaching Hospital (LUTH) said that Giwa suffered from "multiple blast injuries with 25 percent burns, mutilated thighs with fractures of femoral bones and avulsion of femoral vessels".

This is indeed horrible! The first reaction at the news of such a horrendous tragedy would be to ask like Banquo in William Shakespeare's play, 'Macbeth,' whether we, as a people, had "eaten on the insane root that takes reason prisoner?"

Dele Giwa's death was a very slow painful death. The pictures of his shattered body which late Chief Gani Fawehimbi displayed during the sitting of the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission of Nigeria (also known as Oputa Panel) set up in 1998 and headed by late Justice Chukwudifo Oputa could have passed as horror images of the goriest type, showing man (Giwa's killer) at his basest, most bestial and fiendish worst.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 37 Years After -By Ugochukwu Ejinkonye

"They have killed me", Giwa moaned while writhing in indescribable pain, begging Dr. Ajayi to do all within his power to save him.

For more than three decades now Giwa's killers have been hiding, afraid of the inevitable fall-out of their satanic deed, haunted and tormented by their dirty, murky, slimy conscience. Even if they eventually manage to escape the judgment of man, they cannot escape the judgment of the Almighty God which is much more dreadful. As we all know, they will surely serve their indescribable punishment forever. That will surely be the case unless they repent of their hideous deed and make the necessary restitutions!

Giwa's had death plunged a broad spectrum of the Nigerian population into clearly unprecedented, monumental grief and fear. People were afraid to open parcels sent to their homes and offices. The public outcry and loud condemnations were deafening. Indeed, Giwa was right when he wrote in his highly regarded column, 'Parallax Snaps,' some months earlier, that "One life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as millions lost in a pogrom." The reactions that followed his death vindicated the truth of this assertion.

A lot of accusing fingers pointed at the government of the day. It was believed that only a special panel could unravel the mystery that seemed to have attended the gory affair and unearth the unseen hands that perpetrated the spine-chilling murder. In fact, 'Newswatch's Board of Directors called for a three-man Judicial Commission of Enquiry headed by a retired judge of high repute, with an archbishop and an Imam as members, to probe the murder. But the General Ibrahim Babangida regime insisted that it was the police that should investigate the murder. And as would be expected, public skepticism about the likely outcome of investigations undertaken by the Nigerian police was widespread.

In its editorial of October 28, 1986, 'The Guardian' newspaper disagreed with the Babangida regime's insistence that the investigation should be left for the police, despite widespread calls for a Commission of Inquiry to be set up to probe it.

Said 'The Guardian': "The police have been signally inept in solving much simpler crimes, and the public is justifiably unimpressed by their investigative ability and seriousness... The government has very little choice but to appoint a special prosecutor... [which] will be a dramatic demonstration by government that it has nothing to hide, and is as interested in discovering Giwa's assassins as the public is..."

A year after Giwa's murder, when the police predictably "found" nothing and "caught" no one, Ray Ekpu, 'Newswatch's new editor-in-chief, in a letter to the police reminded them that any murder which remained unsolved could only mean "added insecurity to the living."

On his part, Lagos lawyer and human rights crusader, late Chief Gani Fawehinmi, SAN, vowed to catch Giwa's killers. Until his death in September 2009, Gani remained unrelenting in his determination to ensure that the people he had continued to accuse of the murder since 1986 were brought to justice.

It is now thirty-seven years since Giwa's murder shook Nigeria to her foundations. Several other mysterious assassinations of journalists and other outspoken public figures have also followed. Maybe, if Giwa's murder was solved and the perpetrators exposed and punished, it might have deterred other murderous characters from going ahead to kill the other victims that were assassinated afterwards.

And when police investigations into Giwa's death eventually yielded no results, Gani said: The police have failed to find Giwa's killers because they know the killers!

After 37 years, the gory story of Giwa's gruesome murder has refused to go away. The greatest honour that can be accorded to his name now is to insist that his killers be found. It is not yet late to set up a reputable Commission of Inquiry as favoured by many Nigerians to reopen the case, reexamine the various narratives that have continued to trail the murder and really get to the root of the tragedy, especially, now that most of the witnesses and even those that have been consistently fingered are still alive.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 37 Years After -By Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye

Other cases of assassination which have also been shrouded in mystery need to be revisited too. Until Nigeria demonstrates a capacity to solve murder cases, especially, high profile ones involving people critical of government policies and actions, potential murderers would always derive incentive from the conviction that they can always eliminate anyone in Nigeria and get away with it. And "anyone" can be anybody! Somebody can be in government today and surrounded by heavy security, but tomorrow, such a person might be out of office and become as vulnerable as the next man out there. Leaders go all out to make society a safer place, not just because of others, but also, for them and their relatives.

As murderers continue to be allowed to circulate within the bounds of civilised ambience, and eliminate people with utmost impunity, they not only constitute a threat to hapless, decent and hard-working citizens, their vile activities go further to stifle critical thoughts that are very essential in influencing the evolution of responsible governance which fosters progress and development.

They may, however, continue to hide from man due to government's inability or unwillingness, or both, to fish them out, and bring them to justice, but they, certainly, cannot hide from God. Their day with Divine Judgment will surely come! And as the African-Caribbean writer, George Lamming, said in his classic novel, 'In The Castle Of My Skin', "God can see the blackest ant on the blackest piece of coal on the blackest night."

*Ejinkeonye, a writer and journalist, is the author of the book, "Nigeria: Why Looting May Not Stop" (scruples2006@yahoo.com)

Load-Date: October 19, 2023

---

End of Document

37 Years After, Analyst Blames Babangida, Successive Govts. For Failure To Find Giwa's Killers

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

October 19, 2023 Thursday

Copyright 2023 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 283 words

Byline: Joy Anigbogu

Body

---

LAGOS - A Political Analyst, Deyemi Saka has blamed former military President, Ibrahim Babangida and successive governments for failure to find the killers of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, 37 years after his demise.

According to Saka, who spoke on TVC on Thursday, Dele Giwa didn't die from the letter bomb but died from an explosion.

Saka, while making case for his position said that the late Giwa held the envelope with his left hand and tore it, stressing that his right hand that tore the bomb was intact, and the explosion mangled the mahogany table in his house.

He said, "I'm not happy that Chief Gani Fawehinmi is not alive, because he sought closure to Giwa's death before he died.

"Victims or survivors of parcel bombs always have injuries on their faces or limbs. The death of Giwa wasn't consistent with this.

"The eyewitness account by Kayode Soyinka explained how Giwa tore the envelope open. His face was spared.

"The only blame on Ibrahim Babangida was not fishing out his killers. I also blame successive governments for this.

On what he hopes to achieve with the new perspective as to who killed Giwa. Saka said, "He died from an explosion, but not necessarily from a parcel bomb.

POLL

"Micheal Lassy, who was a victim of the parcel bomb, lost both hands. He now uses prosthetic hands. Giwa died of explosion, but not letter bomb.

37 Years After, Analyst Blames Babangida, Successive Govts. For Failure To Find Giwa's Killers

"The idea that Gen Akilu called Giwa's house to know his residence as an alibi to the fact that the Federal Government killed him is far from the truth.

"If the State Security Service (SSS) as it was then known wanted anything on Giwa, they didn't have to call him to ask for his address.

"Giwa didn't die from a parcel bomb, he died of an explosion," Saka added.

Load-Date: October 19, 2023

---

End of Document

Utomi, Falana to attend lecture in honour of #EndSARS, Dele Giwa

The Punch

October 18, 2021 Monday

Copyright 2021 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 295 words

Body

---

Ademola Olonilua Published 17 October 2021

Political economist and former presidential candidate, Prof. Pat Utomi, and human rights lawyer, Mr Femi Falana, are billed to attend a lecture in honour of Dele Giwa, as well as to commemorate the first anniversary of the #EndSARS protest.

Giwa was the founding editor-in-chief of Newswatch magazine who was killed 35 years ago. The event is organised by the African Centre for Media and Information Literacy, in partnership with Wole Soyinka Centre for Investigative Journalism, Enough is Enough Nigeria, National Consultative Front, PLAYYA and MILID Foundation

More so, the event will also mark the public presentation of Remaking Nigeria: Sixty Years, Sixty Voices – a book of 60 essays by 60 young Nigerians which salutes 60 years of Nigeria's independence and points the way towards a better country.

The #EndSARS advocacy made global headlines last October when young Nigerians across the country and in major cities around the world embarked on protests against persistent brutality and rights violations by the Nigeria Police Force.

The Coordinator of AFRICMIL, Chido Onumah, said in a statement, "One year after the protests and the reprehensible violent response by the Nigerian Army which led to the death of unarmed protesters at the Lekki tollgate in Lagos, it is important to cast a critical eye on that incident and see what lessons have been learnt and what needs to be done going forward,"

Significantly, the first-year remembrance of these protests coincides with the 35th anniversary of the murder via letter-bomb of the celebrated journalist, Giwa.

"It is a measure of the acute dysfunction of the Nigerian state that till date, no one has been arrested let alone brought to trial for this heinous crime, Onumah noted.

Load-Date: October 18, 2021

Utomi, Falana to attend lecture in honour of #EndSARS, Dele Giwa

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa: 34 Years After His Gruesome Murder!

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

October 18, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1697 words

Byline: Editorial

Body

---

Dele Giwa

UG OCHUKWU EJINKEONYE

"Death is...the absence of presence...the endless time of never coming back...a gap you can't see, and when the wind blows through it, it makes no sound". – Tom Stoppard, German playwright.

In the morning of Monday, October 20, 1986, I was preparing to go to work when a major item on the Anambra Broadcasting Service (ABS) 6.30 news bulletin hit me like a hard object. Mr. Dele Giwa, the founding editor-in-chief of Newswatch magazine, had the previous day been killed and shattered by a letter bomb in his Lagos home. My scream was so loud that my colleague barged into my room to inquire what it was that could have made me to let out such an ear-splitting bellow.

ABUJA DOCTOR REVEALS HOW OVER 2,000 NIGERIAN MEN ARE NOW NATURALLY OVERCOMING TERRIBLE BEDROOM PERFORMANCE DUE TO THIS BRILLIANT DISCOVERY. DON'T BE A VICTIM!

Across the country, Giwa's brutal death dominated the news not just because of the pride of place he occupied in Nigerian journalism practice and but more because of the totally novel way his killers had chosen to end his life.Indeed, death is an appointment which every human being must keep. While we are on earth, we reserve the right to reschedule or even cancel our day-to-day appointments. But in the matter of birth or death, any cancellation or rescheduling of appointments remain the exclusive prerogative of the Creator.No doubt, Mr. Giwa was not expecting his own appointment with death when it came calling on Sunday, October 19, 1986. His friends say he loved life, was full of life, and wanted to make the best out of life. He had also worked hard to excel in his chosen career – journalism. But on that Sunday morning, as he had a late breakfast in his study in the company of Kayode Soyinka, the magazine's London Bureau Chief, a parcel was handed to him. On it was written: "From the Commander-in-Chief " with an instruction that it must be opened only by the addressee."This must be from the president", Giwa was reported to have said.But unknown to him, in that seemingly innocuous parcel, was the cold, callous agent of brutal death, intent on accomplishing the abominable mission of hastening his appointment with death. Conceived by man, prepared by man, sent by man and delivered by man, this lethal instrument had only one mission: to bomb out the young life of Dele Giwa. And it did precisely that with chilling exactitude, tearing his flesh, wasting his blood, talent, usefulness to himself, his family, Newswatch magazine, Nigerian journalism and the Nigerian nation. Giwa had written in "Sunday Concord" newspaper of June 8, 1980 that "Death looks for a happy home where it can turn happiness into grief and ensure that for days the household will have nothing to discuss but the blow of death." He was the pioneer editor of Sunday Concord. By writing this, he unwittingly wrote his own elegy. "They got me!" That was Giwa's last words at First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja where the Chief Medical Director, Dr. Tosin Ajayi and his doctors battled to see how they could save his life. Earlier, on their way to Hospital, Giwa was saying to his wife, Funmi, in Yoruba, "Nwon ti pa mi", meaning: "They have killed me." Who are these "they" that were so heartless, so senseless, so callous, so fiendish and irremediably inhuman? How can a human being elect to do such a horrifying damage to another person? Giwa's flesh was reportedly shattered, with some pieces (some of which were discovered many days later) scattered about in his study. The autopsy report performed by pathologists at Lagos University Teaching Hospital (LUTH) said that Giwa suffered from "multiple blast injuries with 25 percent burns, mutilated thighs with fractures of femoral bones and avulsion of femoral vessels". This is indeed horrible. The first reaction at the news of such horrendous tragedy would be to ask like Banquo in William Shakespeare's play, "Macbeth" whether we, as a people, had "eaten on the insane root that takes reason prisoner?" Dele Giwa's death was a very slow painful death. The damage on his body was massive. The pictures of his shattered body which late Chief Gani Fawehinmi displayed during the sitting of the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission of Nigeria (also known as Oputa Panel) set up in 1998 and headed by late Justice Chukwudifo Oputa could have passed as horror images of the goriest type, showing man (Giwa's killer) at his basest, most bestial and fiendish worst. Again, who are these "they"? Who are these cowardly bestial lot, these direct descendants of the first murderer – Cain? For more than three decades now they have been hiding, afraid of the inevitable fall-out of their satanic deed, haunted and tormented by their dirty, murky, slimy conscience. Even if they eventually manage to escape the judgment of man, they cannot escape the judgment of the Almighty God which is much more dreadful. As we all know, they will surely serve their indescribable punishment forever. That will surely be the case unless they repent of their hideous deed and do the necessary restitution! A lot of accusing fingers pointed at the government of the day. It was believed that only a special panel could unravel the mystery that seemed to attend the gory affair and unearth the unseen hands that perpetrated the spine-chilling murder. In fact, Newswatch Board of Directors called for a three-man Judicial Commission of Enquiry headed by a retired judge of high repute, with an archbishop and an Imam as members, to probe the murder. But the General Ibrahim Babangida regime insisted that it was the police that should investigate the murder. And as would be expected, public skepticism about the likely outcome of investigations undertaken by the Nigerian police was widespread. In its editorial of October 28, 1986, The Guardian newspaper disagreed with the Babangida regime's insistence that the investigation into Dele Giwa's murder should be left for the police, despite widespread calls for a Commission of Inquiry to be set up to probe it. A year after Giwa's murder, when the police predictably "found" nothing and "caught" no one, Ray Ekpu, Newswatch's then new editor-in-chief in a letter to the police reminded them that any murder which remained unsolved could only mean "added insecurity to the living." But Lagos lawyer and human rights crusader, late Chief Gani Fawehinmi, SAN, vowed to catch Giwa's killers. His attempt to dock Babangida's two security chiefs, Brig-Gen Halilu Akilu and Col A.K. Togun, brought him in direct confrontation with the Babangida regime which made no pretense of its intention to not allow any probe more penetrating than the unserious, shallow, perfunctory thing the police was doing. A day before Giwa's assassination, Akilu had reportedly phoned Giwa's house to enquire about the address of the house from Giwa's wife, Funmi, explaining that Babangida's ADC was to stop by to deliver an item for Giwa at his house. And less than twenty-four hours after this call, a letter bomb was delivered at Giwa's house, could that have been mere coincidence? After Babangida's military dictatorship expired, Gani took the matter to the Oputa Panel. And this once more caused the lingering question to ring out louder: Who killed Dele Giwa? Until his death in September 2009, Gani had been unrelenting in his determination to ensure that the people he had continued to accuse of the murder since 1986 were brought to justice. It is now thirty-four years since Giwa's murder shook Nigeria to her foundations. Several other mysterious assassinations of journalists and other outspoken public figures have also followed. Maybe, if Giwa's murder was solved and the perpetrators exposed and punished, it might have deterred other murderous characters from going ahead to kill the other victims that were assassinated afterwards. Even when Babangida and the two security chiefs who had served under him were summoned by the Oputa Panel following Gani's petition, they refused to show up. They instead sought a restraining order from the court to frustrate any attempt by the Panel to compel them to appear before it. Their argument was that the Nigerian president lacked the powers to set up the Panel. Although the Supreme Court later agreed with their submission in a ruling that was delivered long after the Panel's report had been submitted, what has remained clear is that despite the court judgment, unanswered questions about the gruesome murder have continued to linger in many minds, which the Oputa Panel would have provided them an amazing platform to convincingly address. Interestingly, Col. A. K. Togun, in chat with airport correspondents in late 1986, gave some very instructive illustrations that appeared to have thrown some light on the circumstances surrounding Dele Giwa's murder. When asked what he thought about Col. Togun's revelations during his airport encounter with reporters, the then Deputy Inspector General of police, Mr. Chris Omeban, who was in charge of the investigations into Giwa's murder reportedly replied that the police does not go into proverbs. And when police investigations into Giwa's death eventually yielded no results, Gani said: The police have failed to find Giwa's killers because they know the killers! After 34 years, the gory story of Giwa's gruesome murder has refused to go away. The greatest honour that can be accorded to his name now is to insist that his killers be found. It is not yet late to set up a reputable Commission of Inquiry as favoured by many Nigerians to reopen the case, reexamine the various narratives that have continued to trail the murder and really get to the root of the tragedy, especially, now that most of the witnesses and even those that have been consistently fingered are still alive.*Ejinkeonye, a journalist, is the author of the book, "Nigeria: Why Looting May Not Stop" (scruples2006@yahoo.com)

Dele Giwa: 34 Years After His Gruesome Murder!

Dele Giwa: 34 Years After His Gruesome Murder!

SHOCKING! PREMATURE, SMALL-DICKED CIVIL SERVANT REVEALS ANCIENT NATURAL SECRET THAT MYSTERIOUSLY JERKED HIS DEAD MANHOOD TO LIFE WITH STIFF ROCK HARD ERECTIONS AND A FULL SIZE

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/74/160300450786.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/61/160300450788.jpeg>

Load-Date: October 18, 2020

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (1)

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

October 26, 2021 Tuesday

Copyright 2021 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1079 words

Byline: Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye

Body

---

"Death is...the absence of presence...the endless time of never coming back...a gap you can't see, and when the wind blows through it, it makes no sound" – Tom Stoppard

In the morning of Monday, October 20, 1986, I was preparing to go to work when a major item on the Anambra Broadcasting Service (ABS) 6.30 news bulletin hit me like a hard object. Mr. Dele Giwa, the founding editor-in-chief of 'Newswatch' magazine, had the previous day been killed and shattered by a letter bomb in his Lagos home. My scream was so loud that my colleague barged into my room to inquire what it was that could have made me to let out such an ear-splitting bellow.

We were three young men who had a couple of months earlier been posted from Enugu to Abakaliki to work in the old Anambra State public service, and we had hired a flat in a newly erected two-storey building at the end of Water Works Road, which we shared. My flat-mate, clearly, was not familiar with Giwa's name and work, and so had wondered why his death could elicit such a reaction from me. But later that day, as he interacted with people, he realised that Giwa's death was such big news, and by the next couple of days, he had become an expert on Giwa and his truncated life and career. Across the country, Giwa's brutal death dominated the news not just because of the pride of place he occupied in Nigerian journalism practice and but more because of the totally novel way his killers had chosen to end his life.

Indeed, death is an appointment which every human being must keep. While we are on earth, we reserve the right to reschedule or even cancel our day-to-day appointments. But in the matter of birth or death, any cancellation or rescheduling of appointments remain the exclusive prerogative of the Creator. Although death is unavoidable, yet, no man has any right to arrogate to himself the role of bringing forward any other person's appointment with death. In fact, it is abominable to even use one's hands to hasten one's own appointment with death. Laws of God and man fiercely abhor such an action. So, murderers, suicide bombers and their sponsors and supporters should get it into their heads that they have no mandate whatsoever from the Creator of man to take even their own lives let alone that of other people, no matter the motivation.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (1)

Now, deep down the heart of every man and woman, and beyond the facade of all apparent fearlessness and bravery, lie this cold loathing and resentment for death. The survival instinct is always there and there is always this desire and care to avoid danger, to postpone one's date with death, temporarily at least, hence the constant struggle at many a deathbeds.

No doubt, Mr. Giwa was not expecting his own appointment with death when it came calling on Sunday, October 19, 1986. His friends say he loved life, was full of life, and wanted to make the best out of life. He had also worked hard to excel in his chosen career – journalism. But on that Sunday morning, as he had a late breakfast in his study in the company of Kayode Soyinka, the magazine's London Bureau Chief, a parcel was handed to him. On it was written: "From the Commander-in-Chief" with an instruction that it must be opened only by the addressee.

"This must be from the president", Giwa was reported to have said.

But unknown to him, in that seemingly innocuous parcel, was the cold, callous agent of brutal death, intent on accomplishing the abominable mission of hastening his appointment with death. Conceived by man, prepared by man, sent by man and delivered by man, this lethal instrument had only one mission: to bomb out the young life of Dele Giwa. And it did precisely that with chilling exactitude, tearing his flesh, wasting his blood, talent, usefulness to himself, his family, Newswatch magazine, Nigerian journalism and the Nigerian nation.

Giwa had written in 'Sunday Concord' newspaper of June 8, 1980 that "Death looks for a happy home where it can turn happiness into grief and ensure that for days the household will have nothing to discuss but the blow of death." He was the pioneer editor of 'Sunday Concord'. By writing this, he unwittingly wrote his own elegy.

"They got me!" That was Giwa's last words at First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja where the Chief Medical Director, late Dr. Tosin Ajayi and his doctors had battled to see how they could save his life. Earlier, on their way to the hospital, Giwa was saying to his wife, Funmi, in Yoruba, "Nwon ti pa mi", meaning: "They have killed me."

Now, who are these "they" that were so heartless, so senseless, so callous, so fiendish and irremediably inhuman? How can a human being elect to do such a horrifying damage to another person? Giwa's flesh was reportedly shattered, with some pieces (some of which were discovered many days later) scattered about in his study. The autopsy report performed by pathologists at Lagos University Teaching Hospital (LUTH) said that Giwa suffered from "multiple blast injuries with 25 percent burns, mutilated thighs with fractures of femoral bones and avulsion of femoral vessels".

This is indeed horrible. The first reaction at the news of such horrendous tragedy would be to ask like Banquo in William Shakespeare's play, 'Macbeth,' whether we, as a people, had "eaten on the insane root that takes reason prisoner?"

Dele Giwa's death was a very slow painful death. The pictures of his shattered body which late Chief Gani Fawehinmi displayed during the sitting of the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission of Nigeria (also known as Oputa Panel) set up in 1998 and headed by late Justice Chukwudifo Oputa could have passed as horror images of the goriest type, showing man (Giwa's killer) at his basest, most bestial and fiendish worst.

"They have killed me", Giwa moaned while writhing in indescribable pain, begging Dr. Ajayi to do all within his power to save him.

For more than three decades now Giwa's killers have been hiding, afraid of the inevitable fall-out of their satanic deed, haunted and tormented by their dirty, murky, slimy conscience. Even if they eventually manage to escape the judgment of man, they cannot escape the judgment of the Almighty God which is much more dreadful. As we all know, they will surely serve their indescribable punishment forever. That will surely be the case unless they repent of their hideous deed and make the necessary restitutions!

Ejinkeonye, a writer and Journalist, is the author of the book, "Nigeria: Why Looting May Not Stop".

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (1)

Load-Date: October 26, 2021

---

End of Document

Land grabbers invade 'property of Dele Giwa's doctor'

The Nation (Nigeria)

October 13, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 282 words

Body

---

A lawyer, Mr. Akinjide Isola, has petitioned the Lagos State Building Control Agency (LASBCA) to stop alleged trespassers from encroaching on land owned by the late founder of First Foundation Hospital, Dr Olutosin Ajayi.

Ajaiy died on April 27, 2020, after a brief illness. He was the doctor who tried to save the late renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, after he was parcel-bombed in 1986.

Isola, who is Ajaiy's lawyer, said the trespassers destroyed structures on the land on Afolabi Awosanya Street, Opebi, Ikeja, with the intention of grabbing the land.

He said armed hoodlums invaded the property less than a month after Ajaiy died.

'We reported to the Assistant Inspector-General of Police in charge of the Zone 2 Police Command at Onikan, Lagos. The police instructed them to stay away from the property pending when investigations would be concluded.'

'Despite the police instructions, the land grabbers mobilised themselves and went back to the land, vandalised structures, materials, and started working day and night,' Isola said.'

The lawyer urged LASBCA to investigate the invasion.

He added: 'The late Ajaiy has been the legal owner of the land since 1975, which was duly registered with the Lagos Land Registry as No. 12, at page 12 in Volume 1705 of the Register of Deeds.'

'The land grabbers claimed to have obtained a court judgment since 1977. They are now enforcing the judgment with armed hoodlums and thugs, whom they brought into the land to injure, maim, and chased away the workers. They vandalised the land, demolished the fence and materials on site after the death of Ajaiy.'

The Nation learnt that the matter is being investigated by the police and the Lagos State Government.

Load-Date: October 14, 2020

'Why Dele Giwa's doctor left home after Newswatch editor's death'

'Why Dele Giwa's doctor left home after Newswatch editor's death'

The Nation (Nigeria)

October 3, 2021 Sunday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 620 words

Body

---

The Lagos State High Court has been told why the late Dr Tosin Ajayi of First Foundation Medical Engineering Co. Ltd left home soon after renowned journalist, Dele Giwa died in 1986.

His widow, Mrs Oluyemisi Ajayi, said her husband did not leave home because he was fed up with his marriage to her.

She averred that neither were the couple separated for 35 years before his death as claimed by the deceased's lover and former Miss Nigeria, Helen Prest.

Dr Ajayi, who died on April 27, 2020, was the doctor who tried in vain to save Giwa's life after he was parcel-bombed by suspected agents of the military junta of former military president, Gen Ibrahim Babangida.

Giwa, then editor-in-chief of Newswatch magazine, was attended to at Dr Ajayi's hospital, First Foundation Medical Centre.

Mrs Ajayi averred that Dr Ajayi kept away from home for fear of his life in the face of possible attack by the junta, and subsequently for business reasons.

His death has resulted in a legal battle over his estate filed at the Federal High Court in Lagos by Prest, under the name 'Helen Prest-Ajayi.'

Prest told then vacation judge, Justice Tijjani Ringim, in an ex-parte application that in the course of Dr Ajayi's separation, she married him and they had a child, Tosin, who lived with her until his demise.

On August 5, 2021, she obtained an order restraining Mrs Ajayi from dealing with or running the affairs of the firm as a sole surviving director/shareholder pending the hearing and determination of the main suit.

The court also, among others, restrained in the interim, Mrs Ajayi and three other respondents from carrying out or dealing with any assets of the company.

'Why Dele Giwa's doctor left home after Newswatch editor's death'

Mrs Ajai has prayed the court to vacate that order.

In her July 23, 2021 counter-affidavit to Prest's originating motion, Mrs Ajai said she became aware 'of an adulterous relationship between my deceased husband, Dr Tosin Ajai, and his adulteress, Ms Helen Prest.'

She added: 'Although my late husband had an illicit affair with the 2nd Plaintiff (Prest), my relationship with him remained extant from the time we got married till death did us part.'

'Though my late husband had decided to sleep away from home solely because of security concerns following the circumstances of the death of the late Dele Giwa (who was cared for by my late husband at First Foundation Hospital until his passing) in late 1986 and the phenomenal successes of our businesses in the years following that, my deceased husband and I were still happily married (with my husband still visiting home almost daily) until the 2nd Plaintiff began the illicit love affair with him;

'Despite the meddlesomeness of the 2nd Plaintiff in my marriage to my deceased husband, my relationship with my deceased husband was never estranged as he and I remained cordial throughout his lifetime;

'Throughout my deceased husband's lifetime, our relationship went beyond mere communications relating to the education and welfare of our children as my deceased husband never ceased in his responsibility towards me;

'In this regard, my deceased husband regularly gave me money for my upkeep, and he would lavish me with gifts from time to time, including buying me cars;

'Up till the time of his death, my late husband always liaised with me in my capacity as director and shareholder in matters relating to the 1st Defendant company and all other First Foundation companies in which my late husband and I were co-directors and co-shareholders.'

Mrs Ajai is seeking, among others, an order that she and her children (including Prest's daughter, Tomisin Ajai) are the only ones entitled to share in the deceased's estate.

She is praying, among others, that the court should exclude Prest from Dr Ajai's estate.

Load-Date: October 4, 2021

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

The Nigerian Observer (Nigeria)

November 6, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 The Nigerian Observer All Rights Reserved

Length: 2666 words

Body

---

"Death is the absence of presence the endless time of never coming back a gap you can't see, and when the wind blows through it, it makes no sound" Tom Stoppard

In the morning of Monday, October 20, 1986, I was preparing to go to work when a major item on the Anambra Broadcasting Service (ABS) 6.30 news bulletin hit me like a hard object. Mr. Dele Giwa, the founding editor-in-chief of 'Newswatch' magazine, had the previous day been killed and shattered by a letter bomb in his Lagos home. My scream was so loud that my colleague barged into my room to inquire what it was that could have made me to let out such an ear-splitting bellow.

We were three young men who had a couple of months earlier been posted from Enugu to Abakaliki to work in the old Anambra State public service, and we had hired a flat in a newly erected two-storey building at the end of Water Works Road, which we shared. My flat-mate, clearly, was not familiar with Giwa's name and work, and so had wondered why his death could elicit such a reaction from me. But later that day, as he interacted with people, he realised that Giwa's death was such big news, and by the next couple of days, he had become an expert on Giwa and his truncated life and career. Across the country, Giwa's brutal death dominated the news not just because of the pride of place he occupied in Nigerian journalism practice and but more because of the totally novel way his killers had chosen to end his life.

Indeed, death is an appointment which every human being must keep. While we are on earth, we reserve the right to reschedule or even cancel our day-to-day appointments. But in the matter of birth or death, any cancellation or rescheduling of appointments remain the exclusive prerogative of the Creator. Although death is unavoidable, yet, no man has any right to arrogate to himself the role of bringing forward any other person's appointment with death. In fact, it is abominable to even use one's hands to hasten one's own appointment with death. Laws of God and man fiercely abhor such an action. So, murderers, suicide bombers and their sponsors and supporters should get it into their heads that they have no mandate whatsoever from the Creator of man to take even their own lives let alone that of other people, no matter the motivation.

Now, deep down the heart of every man and woman, and beyond the facade of all apparent fearlessness and bravery, lie this cold loathing and resentment for death. The survival instinct is always there and there is always this desire and care to avoid danger, to postpone one's date with death, temporarily at least, hence the constant struggle at many a deathbeds.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

No doubt, Mr. Giwa was not expecting his own appointment with death when it came calling on Sunday, October 19, 1986. His friends say he loved life, was full of life, and wanted to make the best out of life. He had also worked hard to excel in his chosen career journalism. But on that Sunday morning, as he had a late breakfast in his study in the company of Kayode Soyinka, the magazine's London Bureau Chief, a parcel was handed to him. On it was written: "From the Commander-in-Chief" with an instruction that it must be opened only by the addressee.

"This must be from the president", Giwa was reported to have said.

But unknown to him, in that seemingly innocuous parcel, was the cold, callous agent of brutal death, intent on accomplishing the abominable mission of hastening his appointment with death. Conceived by man, prepared by man, sent by man and delivered by man, this lethal instrument had only one mission: to bomb out the young life of Dele Giwa. And it did precisely that with chilling exactitude, tearing his flesh, wasting his blood, talent, usefulness to his himself, his family, Newswatch magazine, Nigerian journalism and the Nigerian nation.

iwa had written in 'Sunday Concord' newspaper of June 8, 1980 that "Death looks for a happy home where it can turn happiness into grief and ensure that for days the household will have nothing to discuss but the blow of death." He was the pioneer editor of 'Sunday Concord'. By writing this, he unwittingly wrote his own elegy.

"They got me!" That was Giwa's last words at First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja where the Chief Medical Director, late Dr. Tosin Ajayi and his doctors had battled to see how they could save his life. Earlier, on their way to the hospital, Giwa was saying to his wife, Funmi, in Yoruba, "Nwon ti pa mi", meaning: "They have killed me."

Now, who are these "they" that were so heartless, so senseless, so callous, so fiendish and irremediably inhuman? How can a human being elect to do such a horrifying damage to another person? Giwa's flesh was reportedly shattered, with some pieces (some of which were discovered many days later) scattered about in his study. The autopsy report performed by pathologists at Lagos University Teaching Hospital (LUTH) said that Giwa suffered from "multiple blast injuries with 25 percent burns, mutilated thighs with fractures of femoral bones and avulsion of femoral vessels".

This is indeed horrible. The first reaction at the news of such horrendous tragedy would be to ask like Banquo in William Shakespeare's play, 'Macbeth,' whether we, as a people, had "eaten on the insane root that takes reason prisoner?"

Dele Giwa's death was a very slow painful death. The pictures of his shattered body which late Chief Gani Fawehinmi displayed during the sitting of the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission of Nigeria (also known as Oputa Panel) set up in 1998 and headed by late Justice Chukwudifo Oputa could have passed as horror images of the goriest type, showing man (Giwa's killer) at his basest, most bestial and fiendish worst.

"They have killed me", Giwa moaned while writhing in indescribable pain, begging Dr. Ajayi to do all within his power to save him.

For more than three decades now Giwa's killers have been hiding, afraid of the inevitable fall-out of their satanic deed, haunted and tormented by their dirty, murky, slimy conscience. Even if they eventually manage to escape the judgment of man, they cannot escape the judgment of the Almighty God which is much more dreadful. As we all know, they will surely serve their indescribable punishment forever. That will surely be the case unless they repent of their hideous deed and make the necessary restitutions!

iwa's had death plunged a broad spectrum of the Nigerian population into clearly unprecedented, monumental grief and fear. People were afraid to open parcels sent to their homes and offices. The public outcry and loud condemnation was deafening. Indeed, Giwa was right when he wrote in his highly regarded column, 'Parallax Snaps,' some months earlier, that "One life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as millions lost in a pogrom." The reactions that followed his death vindicated the truth of this assertion.

lot of accusing fingers pointed at the government of the day. It was believed that only a special panel could unravel the mystery that seemed to have attended the gory affair and unearth the unseen hands that perpetrated the spine-

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

chilling murder. In fact, 'Newswatch's Board of Directors called for a three-man Judicial Commission of Enquiry headed by a retired judge of high repute, with an archbishop and an Imam as members, to probe the murder. But the General Ibrahim Babangida regime insisted that it was the police that should investigate the murder. And as would be expected, public skepticism about the likely outcome of investigations undertaken by the Nigerian police was widespread.

In its editorial of October 28, 1986, 'The Guardian' newspaper disagreed with the Babangida regime's insistence that the investigation into Dele Giwa's murder should be left for the police, despite widespread calls for a Commission of Inquiry to be set up to probe it.

Said 'The Guardian': "The police have been signally inept in solving much simpler crimes, and the public is justifiably unimpressed by their investigative ability and seriousness. The government has very little choice but to appoint a special prosecutor [which] will be a dramatic demonstration by government that it has nothing to hide, and is as interested in discovering Giwa's assassins as the public is"

year after Giwa's murder, when the police predictably "found" nothing and "caught" no one, Ray Ekpu, 'Newswatch's new editor-in-chief, in a letter to the police reminded them that any murder which remained unsolved could only mean "added insecurity to the living."

On his part, Lagos lawyer and human rights crusader, late Chief Gani Fawehinmi, SAN, vowed to catch Giwa's killers. His attempt to dock Babangida's two security chiefs, Brig-Gen Halilu Akilu and Col A.K. Togun, brought him in direct confrontation with the Babangida regime which made no pretense of its intention to not allow any probe more penetrating than the unserious, shallow, perfunctory thing the police was doing. A day before Giwa's assassination, Akilu had reportedly phoned Giwa's house to enquire about its correct address from Giwa's wife, Funmi, explaining that Babangida's ADC was to stop by to deliver an item for Giwa at his house. And less than twenty-four hours after this call, a letter bomb was delivered at Giwa's house!

Until his death in September 2009, Gani remained unrelenting in his determination to ensure that the people he had continued to accuse of the murder since 1986 were brought to justice.

It is now thirty-five years since Giwa's murder shook Nigeria to her foundations. Several other mysterious assassinations of journalists and other outspoken public figures have also followed. Maybe, if Giwa's murder was solved and the perpetrators exposed and punished, it might have deterred other murderous characters from going ahead to kill the other victims that were assassinated afterwards.

Even when Babangida and the two security chiefs who had served under him were summoned by the Oputa Panel following Gani's petition, they had refused to show up. They instead sought a restraining order from the court to frustrate any attempt by the Panel to compel them to appear before it. Their argument was that the Nigerian president lacked the powers to set up the Panel. Although the Supreme Court later agreed with their submission in a ruling that was delivered long after the Panel's report had been submitted, what has remained clear is that despite the court judgment, unanswered questions about the gruesome murder have continued to linger in many minds, which the Oputa Panel would have provided everyone fingered an amazing platform to convincingly address.

Interestingly, Col. A. K. Togun, in chat with airport correspondents in late 1986, gave some very instructive illustrations that appeared to have thrown some light on the circumstances surrounding Dele Giwa's murder. Permit me to reproduce the details of the encounter as reported in the 'Newswatch' edition of November 10, 1986:

"Ten days after he interrogated Giwa, Togun surfaced at the local terminal of Murtala Mohammed International Airport Ikeja, on Monday, October 27, 1986. He told journalists at the airport that the press was 'shouting for a crucifixion' without hearing the other side of the story. He said that at a seminar on security organised in Lagos, October 9, for media executives and the security agencies, a compromise was struck that editors would inform the SSS of any story they consider damaging to the government interests, and the security service would then decide what to do about it.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

"I mean we came to a real agreement and one person cannot just come out and blackmail us. I am an expert in blackmail", he said.

"He then illustrated his point by saying thus: 'If a motorcycle man suddenly dashed in front of a car and the driver kills that motorcycle man, another motorcycle man who was there would not say that the motorcycle man that dashed in front of the car was wrong. He would say the driver deliberately killed him, not knowing that he killed himself'

"Togun sternly warned the journalists that he would deal with them if their newspapers published the accounts of their encounter with him and if he lost his job in the process. 'If you allow them to take away my uniform I will deal with you people and go to any length to even the score with you,' he warned, but added that 'Dele was my friend".

When asked what he thought about Col. Togun's revelations during his airport encounter with reporters, the then Deputy Inspector General of police, Mr. Chris Omeban, who was in charge of the investigations into Giwa's murder reportedly replied that the police does not go into proverbs.

nd when police investigations into Giwa's death eventually yielded no results, Gani said: The police have failed to find Giwa's killers because they know the killers!

fter 35 years, the gory story of Giwa's gruesome murder has refused to go away. The greatest honour that can be accorded to his name now is to insist that his killers be found. It is not yet late to set up a reputable Commission of Inquiry as favoured by many Nigerians to reopen the case, reexamine the various narratives that have continued to trail the murder and really get to the root of the tragedy, especially, now that most of the witnesses and even those that have been consistently fingered are still alive.

While accusing fingers are still pointing to the direction the Babangida regime and its security chiefs whose names have remained reoccurring items in the gory event, they, too, have been trying to present their own sides of the story, and even attempting to return the accusation at the doorstep of the 'Newswatch' executives.

In a recent interview, Togun, who is now a retired general, tried to advance some theories to suggest that the 'Newswatch' London Bureau Chief, Mr. Soyinka, who was at the breakfast table with Giwa when the bomb exploded (and who miraculously escaped being wounded, although he reportedly suffered severe hearing impairment for quite some time) may have some more explanations to volunteer on the murder. All these accusations and counter-accusations and all the other occurrences around the murder, including the contents of Gani's petition, are what an Independent Commission of Inquiry can thoroughly examine and solve this murder that shook the nation when it occurred.

Other cases of assassination which have also been shrouded in mystery need to be revisited too. Until Nigeria demonstrates a capacity to solve murder cases, especially, high profile ones involving people critical of government policies and actions, potential murderers would always derive incentive from the conviction that they can always eliminate anyone in Nigeria and get away with it. And that "anyone" can be anybody! Somebody can be in government today and surrounded by heavy security, but tomorrow, such a person might be out of office and become as vulnerable as the next man out there. Leaders go all out to make society a safer place, not just because of others, but also, for them and their relatives.

s murderers continue to be allowed to circulate within the bounds of civilised ambience, and eliminate people with utmost impunity, they not only constitute a threat to hapless, decent and hard-working citizens, their vile activities go further to stifle critical thoughts that are very essential in influencing the evolution of responsible governance which fosters progress and development.

They may, however, continue to hide from man due to government's inability or unwillingness, or both, to fish them out, and bring them to justice, but they, certainly, cannot hide from God. Their day with divine judgment will surely come! And as the African-Caribbean writer, George Lamming, said in his classic novel, 'In The Castle Of My Skin', "God can see the blackest ant on the blackest piece of coal on the blackest night."

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

---

Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye, a writer and journalist, is the author of the book, "Nigeria: Why Looting May Not Stop" (scruples2006@yahoo.com)

Load-Date: November 6, 2021

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

November 8, 2021 Monday

Copyright 2021 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2705 words

Body

---

"Death is...the absence of presence...the endless time of never coming back...a gap you can't see, and when the wind blows through it, it makes no sound"\xa0\x0Tom Stoppard\x0

In the morning of Monday, October 20, 1986, I was preparing to go to work when a major item on the Anambra Broadcasting Service (ABS) 6.30 news bulletin hit me like a hard object. Mr. Dele Giwa, the founding editor-in-chief of\x0'Newswatch'\xa0magazine, had the previous day been killed and shattered by a letter bomb in his Lagos home. My scream was so loud that my colleague barged into my room to inquire what it was that could have made me to let out such an ear-splitting bellow.

We were three young men who had a couple of months earlier been posted from Enugu to Abakaliki to work in the old Anambra State public service, and we had hired a flat in a newly erected two-storey building at the end of Water Works Road, which we shared. My flat-mate, clearly, was not familiar with Giwa's name and work, and so had wondered why his death could elicit such a reaction from me. But later that day, as he interacted with people, he realised that Giwa's death was such big news, and by the next couple of days, he had become an expert on Giwa and his truncated life and career. Across the country, Giwa's brutal death dominated the news not just because of the pride of place he occupied in Nigerian journalism practice and but more because of the totally novel way his killers had chosen to end his life.

Indeed, death is an appointment which every human being must keep. While we are on earth, we reserve the right to reschedule or even cancel our day-to-day appointments. But in the matter of birth or death, any cancellation or rescheduling of appointments remain the exclusive prerogative of the Creator. Although death is unavoidable, yet, no man has any right to arrogate to himself the role of bringing forward any other person's appointment with death. In fact, it is abominable to even use one's hands to hasten one's own appointment with death. Laws of God and man fiercely abhor such an action. So, murderers, suicide bombers and their sponsors and supporters should get it into their heads that they have no mandate whatsoever from the Creator of man to take even their own lives let alone that of other people, no matter the motivation.

Now, deep down the heart of every man and woman, and beyond the facade of all apparent fearlessness and bravery, lie this cold loathing and resentment for death. The survival instinct is always there and there is always this desire and care to avoid danger, to postpone one's date with death, temporarily at least, hence the constant struggle at many a deathbeds.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

No doubt, Mr. Giwa was not expecting his own appointment with death when it came calling on Sunday, October 19, 1986. His friends say he loved life, was full of life, and wanted to make the best out of life. He had also worked hard to excel in his chosen career – journalism. But on that Sunday morning, as he had a late breakfast in his study in the company of Kayode Soyinka, the magazine's London Bureau Chief, a parcel was handed to him.\xa0On it was written:\xa0"From the Commander-in-Chief"\xa0with an instruction that it must be opened only by the addressee.

"This must be from the president", Giwa was reported to have said.

But unknown to him, in that seemingly innocuous parcel, was the cold, callous agent of brutal death, intent on accomplishing the abominable mission of hastening his appointment with death. Conceived by man, prepared by man, sent by man and delivered by man, this lethal instrument had only one mission: to bomb out the young life of Dele Giwa. And it did precisely that with chilling exactitude, tearing his flesh, wasting his blood, talent, usefulness to himself, his family,\xa0Newswatch\x0magazine, Nigerian journalism and the Nigerian nation.

Giwa had written in\x0'Sunday Concord'\xa0newspaper of June 8, 1980 that\x0"Death looks for a happy home where it can turn happiness into grief and ensure that for days the household will have nothing to discuss but the blow of death."\xa0He was the pioneer editor of\x0'Sunday Concord'.\xa0By writing this, he unwittingly wrote his own elegy.

"They got me!" That was Giwa's last words at First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja where the Chief Medical Director, late Dr. Tosin Ajayi and his doctors had battled to see how they could save his life. Earlier, on their way to the hospital, Giwa was saying to his wife, Funmi, in Yoruba, "Nwon ti pa mi",\xa0meaning: "They have killed me."

Now, who are these "they" that were so heartless, so senseless, so callous, so fiendish and irremediably inhuman? How can a human being elect to do such a horrifying damage to another person? Giwa's flesh was reportedly shattered, with some pieces (some of which were discovered many days later) scattered about in his study. The autopsy report performed by pathologists at Lagos University Teaching Hospital (LUTH) said that Giwa suffered from "multiple blast injuries with 25 percent burns, mutilated thighs with fractures of femoral bones and avulsion of femoral vessels".

This is indeed horrible. The first reaction at the news of such horrendous tragedy would be to ask like Banquo in William Shakespeare's play, 'Macbeth,'\xa0whether we, as a people, had "eaten on the insane root that takes reason prisoner?"

Dele Giwa's death was a very slow painful death. The pictures of his shattered body which late Chief Gani Fawehinmi displayed during the sitting of the\x0Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission of Nigeria (also known as Oputa Panel) set up in 1998 and headed by late Justice Chukwudifo Oputa\x0could have passed as horror images of the goriest type, showing man (Giwa's killer) at his basest, most bestial and fiendish worst.

"They have killed me", Giwa moaned while writhing in indescribable pain, begging Dr. Ajayi to do all within his power to save him.

For more than three\x0decades now Giwa's killers have been hiding, afraid of the inevitable fall-out of their satanic deed, haunted and tormented by their dirty, murky, slimy conscience.\xa0Even if they eventually manage to escape the judgment of man, they cannot escape the judgment of the Almighty God which is much more dreadful. As we all know, they will surely serve their indescribable punishment forever. That will surely be the case unless they repent of their hideous deed and make the necessary restitutions!

Giwa's had death plunged a broad spectrum of the Nigerian population into clearly unprecedented, monumental grief and fear. People were afraid to open parcels sent to their homes and offices. The public outcry and loud condemnation was deafening. Indeed, Giwa was right when he wrote in his highly regarded column,\xa0'Parallax

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

Snaps, "some months earlier, that" "One life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as millions lost in a pogrom." The reactions that followed his death vindicated the truth of this assertion.

A lot of accusing fingers pointed at the government of the day. It was believed that only a special panel could unravel the mystery that seemed to have attended the gory affair and unearth the unseen hands that perpetrated the spine-chilling murder. In fact, Newswatch's Board of Directors called for a three-man Judicial Commission of Enquiry headed by a retired judge of high repute, with an archbishop and an Imam as members, to probe the murder. But the General Ibrahim Babangida regime insisted that it was the police that should investigate the murder. And as would be expected, public skepticism about the likely outcome of investigations undertaken by the Nigerian police was widespread.

In its editorial of October 28, 1986, The Guardian newspaper disagreed with the Babangida regime's insistence that the investigation into Dele Giwa's murder should be left for the police, despite widespread calls for a Commission of Inquiry to be set up to probe it.

Said 'The Guardian': "The police have been signally inept in solving much simpler crimes, and the public is justifiably unimpressed by their investigative ability and seriousness... The government has very little choice but to appoint a special prosecutor... [which] will be a dramatic demonstration by government that it has nothing to hide, and is as interested in discovering Giwa's assassins as the public is..."

A year after Giwa's murder, when the police predictably "found" nothing and "caught" no one, Ray Ekpu, Newswatch's new editor-in-chief, in a letter to the police reminded them that any murder which remained unsolved could only mean "added insecurity to the living."

On his part, Lagos lawyer and human rights crusader, late Chief Gani Fawehinmi, SAN, vowed to catch Giwa's killers. His attempt to dock Babangida's two security chiefs, Brig-Gen Halilu Akili and Col A.K. Togun, brought him in direct confrontation with the Babangida regime which made no pretense of its intention to not allow any probe more penetrating than the unserious, shallow, perfunctory thing the police was doing. A day before Giwa's assassination, Akili had reportedly phoned Giwa's house to enquire about its correct address from Giwa's wife, Funmi, explaining that Babangida's ADC was to stop by to deliver an item for Giwa at his house. And less than twenty-four hours after this call, a letter bomb was delivered at Giwa's house!

Until his death in September 2009, Gani remained unrelenting in his determination to ensure that the people he had continued to accuse of the murder since 1986 were brought to justice.

It is now thirty-five years since Giwa's murder shook Nigeria to her foundations. Several other mysterious assassinations of journalists and other outspoken public figures have also followed. Maybe, if Giwa's murder was solved and the perpetrators exposed and punished, it might have deterred other murderous characters from going ahead to kill the other victims that were assassinated afterwards.

Even when Babangida and the two security chiefs who had served under him were summoned by the Oputa Panel following Gani's petition, they had refused to show up. They instead sought a restraining order from the court to frustrate any attempt by the Panel to compel them to appear before it. Their argument was that the Nigerian president lacked the powers to set up the Panel. Although the Supreme Court later agreed with their submission in a ruling that was delivered long after the Panel's report had been submitted, what has remained clear is that despite the court judgment, unanswered questions about the gruesome murder have continued to linger in many minds, which the Oputa Panel would have provided everyone fingered an amazing platform to convincingly address.

Interestingly, Col. A. K. Togun, in chat with airport correspondents in late 1986, gave some very instructive illustrations that appeared to have thrown some light on the circumstances surrounding Dele Giwa's murder. Permit me to reproduce the details of the encounter as reported in the Newswatch edition of November 10, 1986:

"Ten days after he interrogated Giwa, Togun surfaced at the local terminal of Murtala Mohammed International Airport Ikeja, on Monday, October 27, 1986. He told journalists at the airport that the press was 'shouting for

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

a crucifixion' without hearing the other side of the story.\xa0He said that at a seminar on security organised in Lagos, October 9, for media executives and the security agencies, a compromise was struck that editors would inform the SSS of any story they consider damaging to the government interests, and the security service would then decide what to do about it.\xa0

"I mean we came to a real agreement and one person cannot just come out and blackmail us.\xa0I am an expert in blackmail', he said.\xa0

"He then illustrated his point by saying thus: 'If a motorcycle man suddenly dashed in front of a car and the driver kills that motorcycle man, another motorcycle man who was there would not say that the motorcycle man that dashed in front of the car was wrong.\xa0He would say the driver deliberately killed him, not knowing that he killed himself'...\xa0

"Togun sternly warned the journalists that he would deal with them if their newspapers published the accounts of their encounter with him and if he lost his job in the process.\xa0'If you allow them to take away my uniform ... I will deal with you people and go to any length to even the score with you,' he warned, but added that 'Dele was my friend".\xa0

When asked what he thought about Col. Togun's revelations during his airport encounter with reporters, the then Deputy Inspector General of police, Mr. Chris Omeban, who was in charge of the investigations into Giwa's murder reportedly replied that the police does not go into proverbs.

And when police investigations into Giwa's death eventually yielded no results, Gani said:\xa0The police have failed to find Giwa's killers because they know the killers!

After 35 years, the gory story of Giwa's gruesome murder has refused to go away.\xa0The greatest honour that can be accorded to his name now is to insist that his killers be found. It is not yet late to set up a reputable Commission of Inquiry as favoured by many Nigerians to reopen the case, reexamine the various narratives that have continued to trail the murder and really get to the root of the tragedy, especially, now that most of the witnesses and even those that have been consistently fingered are still alive.

While accusing fingers are still pointing to the direction the Babangida regime and its security chiefs whose names have remained reoccurring items in the gory event, they, too, have been trying to present their own sides of the story, and even attempting to return the accusation at the doorstep of the\ Newswatch\executives.

In a recent interview, Togun, who is now a retired general, tried to advance some theories to suggest that the\ Newswatch\London Bureau Chief, Mr. Soyinka, who was at the breakfast table with Giwa when the bomb exploded (and who miraculously escaped being wounded, although he reportedly suffered severe hearing impairment for quite some time) may have some more explanations to volunteer on the murder. All these accusations and counter-accusations and all the other occurrences around the murder, including the contents of Gani's petition, are what an Independent Commission of Inquiry can thoroughly examine and solve this murder that shook the nation when it occurred.

Other cases of assassination which have also been shrouded in mystery need to be revisited too. Until Nigeria demonstrates a capacity to solve murder cases, especially, high profile ones involving people critical of government policies and actions, potential murderers would always derive incentive from the conviction that they can always eliminate anyone in Nigeria and get away with it. And that "anyone" can be anybody! Somebody can be in government today and surrounded by heavy security, but tomorrow, such a person might be out of office and become as vulnerable as the next man out there. Leaders go all out to make society a safer place, not just because of others, but also, for them and their relatives.

As murderers continue to be allowed to circulate within the bounds of civilised ambience, and eliminate people with utmost impunity, they not only constitute a threat to hapless, decent and hard-working citizens, their vile activities go further to stifle critical thoughts that are very essential in influencing the evolution of responsible governance which fosters progress and development.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After

They may, however, continue to hide from man due to government's inability or unwillingness, or both, to fish them out, and bring them to justice, but they, certainly, cannot hide from God. Their day with divine judgment will surely come! And as the African-Caribbean writer, George Lamming, said in his classic novel, 'In The Castle Of My Skin', "God can see the blackest ant on the blackest piece of coal on the blackest night."

*Ejinkeonye, a writer and journalist, is the author of the book, "Nigeria: Why Looting May Not Stop" (scruples2006@yahoo.com)

Load-Date: November 8, 2021

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (2)

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

October 28, 2021 Thursday

Copyright 2021 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1601 words

Byline: UGOCHUKWU EJINKEONYE

Body

---

UGOCHUKWU EJINKEONYE

Giwa's death had plunged a broad spectrum of the Nigerian population into clearly unprecedented, monumental grief and fear. People were afraid to open parcels sent to their homes and offices. The public outcry and loud condemnation was deafening. Indeed, Giwa was right when he wrote in his highly regarded column, 'Parallax Snaps,' some months earlier, that "One life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as millions lost in a pogrom." The reactions that followed his death vindicated the truth of this assertion.

A lot of accusing fingers pointed at the government of the day. It was believed that only a special panel could unravel the mystery that seemed to have attended the gory affair and unearth the unseen hands that perpetrated the spine-chilling murder. In fact, 'Newswatch's Board of Directors called for a three-man Judicial Commission of Enquiry headed by a retired judge of high repute, with an archbishop and an Imam as members, to probe the murder. But the General Ibrahim Babangida regime insisted that it was the police that should investigate the murder. And as would be expected, public skepticism about the likely outcome of investigations undertaken by the Nigerian police was widespread.

In its editorial of October 28, 1986, 'The Guardian' newspaper disagreed with the Babangida regime's insistence that the investigation into Dele Giwa's murder should be left for the police, despite widespread calls for a Commission of Inquiry to be set up to probe it.

Said 'The Guardian': "The police have been signally inept in solving much simpler crimes, and the public is justifiably unimpressed by their investigative ability and seriousness... The government has very little choice but to appoint a special prosecutor... [which] will be a dramatic demonstration by government that it has nothing to hide, and is as interested in discovering Giwa's assassins as the public is..."

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (2)

A year after Giwa's murder, when the police predictably "found" nothing and "caught" no one, Ray Ekpu, 'Newswatch's new editor-in-chief, in a letter to the police reminded them that any murder which remained unsolved could only mean "added insecurity to the living."

On his part, Lagos lawyer and human rights crusader, late Chief Gani Fawehinmi, SAN, vowed to catch Giwa's killers. His attempt to dock Babangida's two security chiefs, Brig-Gen Halilu Akilu and Col A.K. Togun, brought him in direct confrontation with the Babangida regime which made no pretense of its intention to not allow any probe more penetrating than the unserious, shallow, perfunctory thing the police was doing. A day before Giwa's assassination, Akilu had reportedly phoned Giwa's house to enquire about its correct address from Giwa's wife, Funmi, explaining that Babangida's ADC was to stop by to deliver an item for Giwa at his house. And less than twenty-four hours after this call, a letter bomb was delivered at Giwa's house!

Until his death in September 2009, Gani remained unrelenting in his determination to ensure that the people he had continued to accuse of the murder since 1986 were brought to justice.

It is now thirty-five years since Giwa's murder shook Nigeria to her foundations. Several other mysterious assassinations of journalists and other outspoken public figures have also followed. Maybe, if Giwa's murder was solved and the perpetrators exposed and punished, it might have deterred other murderous characters from going ahead to kill the other victims that were assassinated afterwards.

Even when Babangida and the two security chiefs who had served under him were summoned by the Oputa Panel following Gani's petition, they had refused to show up. They instead sought a restraining order from the court to frustrate any attempt by the Panel to compel them to appear before it. Their argument was that the Nigerian president lacked the powers to set up the Panel. Although the Supreme Court later agreed with their submission in a ruling that was delivered long after the Panel's report had been submitted, what has remained clear is that despite the court judgment, unanswered questions about the gruesome murder have continued to linger in many minds, which the Oputa Panel would have provided everyone fingered an amazing platform to convincingly address.

Interestingly, Col. A. K. Togun, in chat with airport correspondents in late 1986, gave some very instructive illustrations that appeared to have thrown some light on the circumstances surrounding Dele Giwa's murder. Permit me to reproduce the details of the encounter as reported in the 'Newswatch' edition of November 10, 1986:

"Ten days after he interrogated Giwa, Togun surfaced at the local terminal of Murtala Mohammed International Airport Ikeja, on Monday, October 27, 1986. He told journalists at the airport that the press was 'shouting for a crucifixion' without hearing the other side of the story. He said that at a seminar on security organised in Lagos, October 9, for media executives and the security agencies, a compromise was struck that editors would inform the SSS of any story they consider damaging to the government interests, and the security service would then decide what to do about it.

"I mean we came to a real agreement and one person cannot just come out and blackmail us. I am an expert in blackmail', he said.

"He then illustrated his point by saying thus: 'If a motorcycle man suddenly dashed in front of a car and the driver kills that motorcycle man, another motorcycle man who was there would not say that the motorcycle man that dashed in front of the car was wrong. He would say the driver deliberately killed him, not knowing that he killed himself'..."

"Togun sternly warned the journalists that he would deal with them if their newspapers published the accounts of their encounter with him and if he lost his job in the process. 'If you allow them to take away my uniform ... I will deal with you people and go to any length to even the score with you,' he warned, but added that 'Dele was my friend'".

When asked what he thought about Col. Togun's revelations during his airport encounter with reporters, the then Deputy Inspector General of police, Mr. Chris Omeban, who was in charge of the investigations into Giwa's murder reportedly replied that the police does not go into proverbs.

Dele Giwa's Assassination: 35 Years After (2)

And when police investigations into Giwa's death eventually yielded no results, Gani said: The police have failed to find Giwa's killers because they know the killers!

After 35 years, the gory story of Giwa's gruesome murder has refused to go away. The greatest honour that can be accorded to his name now is to insist that his killers be found. It is not yet late to set up a reputable Commission of Inquiry as favoured by many Nigerians to reopen the case, reexamine the various narratives that have continued to trail the murder and really get to the root of the tragedy, especially, now that most of the witnesses and even those that have been consistently fingered are still alive.

While accusing fingers are still pointing to the direction the Babangida regime and its security chiefs whose names have remained reoccurring items in the gory event, they, too, have been trying to present their own sides of the story, and even attempting to return the accusation at the doorstep of the 'Newswatch' executives.

In a recent interview, Togun, who is now a retired general, tried to advance some theories to suggest that the 'Newswatch' London Bureau Chief, Mr. Soyinka, who was at the breakfast table with Giwa when the bomb exploded (and who miraculously escaped being wounded, although he reportedly suffered severe hearing impairment for quite some time) may have some more explanations to volunteer on the murder. All these accusations and counter-accusations and all the other occurrences around the murder, including the contents of Gani's petition, are what an Independent Commission of Inquiry can thoroughly examine and solve this murder that shook the nation when it occurred.

Other cases of assassination which have also been shrouded in mystery need to be revisited too. Until Nigeria demonstrates a capacity to solve murder cases, especially, high profile ones involving people critical of government policies and actions, potential murderers would always derive incentive from the conviction that they can always eliminate anyone in Nigeria and get away with it. And that "anyone" can be anybody! Somebody can be in government today and surrounded by heavy security, but tomorrow, such a person might be out of office and become as vulnerable as the next man out there. Leaders go all out to make society a safer place, not just because of others, but also, for them and their relatives.

As murderers continue to be allowed to circulate within the bounds of civilised ambience, and eliminate people with utmost impunity, they not only constitute a threat to hapless, decent and hard-working citizens, their vile activities go further to stifle critical thoughts that are very essential in influencing the evolution of responsible governance which fosters progress and development.

They may, however, continue to hide from man due to government's inability or unwillingness, or both, to fish them out, and bring them to justice, but they, certainly, cannot hide from God. Their day with divine judgment will surely come! And as the African-Caribbean writer, George Lamming, said in his classic novel, 'In The Castle Of My Skin', "God can see the blackest ant on the blackest piece of coal on the blackest night."

Ejinkeonye, a writer and Journalist, is the author of the book, "Nigeria: Why Looting May Not Stop".

Load-Date: October 28, 2021

I am Dele Giwa

Weekly Trust

October 20, 2018 Saturday

Copyright 2018 Media Trust Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 784 words

Body

---

The year 1986 reminds me of two events. First, the assassination of Dele Giwa and secondly as a football lover, Mexico '86 comes to mind because of Diego Maradona's performance. Although I was born the next year, as someone who loves history, I know about them very well. At a very young age, I was privileged to watch Maradona in USA '94 live on TV in the games he played against Nigeria and Greece.

However, I wasn't able to see Dele Giwa or read any of his columns while he was alive but I have read some of his columns and tried to imagine what it was like back then. It is now 32 years since Nigeria lost Dele Giwa, co-founder of Newswatch magazine.

He died as a result of injuries he sustained via a letter bomb on the 19th of October 1986 in his home at 25 Talabi Street, Adeniyi Jones, Ikeja Lagos. He died 12.27pm in First Foundation hospital, Opebi, Ikeja. Seven months later, I was born in the same hospital Dele Giwa died. Today, I am a journalist writing about him. I call it fate.

Who was Dele Giwa? Talking about him in terms of journalism alone is like reducing him. Yes, he was among the crème de la crème of the profession. He was one of the finest journalists ever but above all, he had all the qualities that a leader should have. He was selfless, fearless, detribalized and so on.

Today he is no more but we have to celebrate him. Speaking of Dele Giwa, it is almost impossible to leave out his colleagues. There were musical groups like the Beatles, Jackson Five, Cool and the Gang but here we had a group of young men who mesmerized us, but not with music.

They did it with the pen. According to Chief Dele Momodu, publisher of Ovation magazine, 'It was impossible not to be attracted to the writings of Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed, the powerful quartet that founded Newswatch magazine around 1984, shortly after their dramatic exit from Concord newspapers.

'These were the authentic superstars who titillated us with beautiful prose that dripped with poetic and colourful words. And they lived up to their billing. Newswatch was an instant success and the hottest cake out of the oven. Every issue was a collector's item.'

They wrote the minds of the masses irrespective of whose ox was gored. That is the true essence of journalism. It is just as if the words integrity, detribalized, fairness, equity, doggedness and brilliance were invented specifically for the Newswatch men.

I am Dele Giwa

They had it all. These men coming together to found Newswatch was like a match made in heaven. They came from different backgrounds but they had professionalism in common. They were pacesetters and trend setters. They made journalism attractive in Nigeria because they combined intellect with swagger.

These men had 'swag' long before the word became popular. Unfortunately for Nigerians one of them was killed in his prime. Dele Giwa was assassinated at the peak of his powers. He was full of life when the angel of death came knocking. He had so much to offer Nigerians before his demise. He was only 39 years but today, everyone is talking about him. It isn't easy to be a legend at that age.

That was what he achieved with his colleagues, legendary status in their youth. It is 32 years now and people are still talking about how he died. As for me, I prefer to talk about his life and the things he stood for. What should we learn from the life and times of Dele Giwa? We should be objective and courageous. Without honesty and courage one has no business in journalism. Journalism should never be a cash and carry business.

The less privileged should be given an equal chance to air their views. Journalists should carry all Nigerians along irrespective of financial, ethnic or religious status. A journalist should be the voice of the voiceless. If you look at the rot in the judiciary, the executive and the legislative arms of government, it means there is more work to be done by the fourth estate. It would be catastrophic if journalists ignore the core principles of the job. In every institution there are bad eggs but we shouldn't allow the bad eggs overshadow the good ones. If that happens, then what hope would the ordinary Nigerian have?

Journalists are meant to be torch bearers. We should always shine the light. That is the best we can do for Dele Giwa. That is what he would want. Not partisanship. Not trying to be politically correct.

I believe practitioners of this great profession should dedicate October 19 to Dele Giwa. We should have public lectures or discourses on the professionalism of Dele Giwa because this job certainly requires that.

I am saying the best way to keep Giwa's legacy is to be him. There is no better way than that. Let's all be Dele Giwa.

Load-Date: October 23, 2018

---

End of Document

Sunday Igboho: Why I rejected IGP Adamu's invitation

PM News

April 2, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 276 words

Body

---

Sunday Adeyemo, a self-acclaimed Yoruba freedom fighter, popularly known as Sunday Igboho has explained why he turned down the invitation from the Inspector-General of Police, Mohammed Adamu.

The letter was sent to the activist on Thursday via DHL and another with about 15 police officers - but both were rejected due to security reasons according to Igboho's media aide Olayomi Koiki.

Olayomi explained that both were not received by Igboho's security operatives due to safety reasons as such a letter had purportedly led to the death of Nigerian journalist, Dele Giwa.

Olayomi said: 'We would like to tell the international communities and every Nigerian that this morning 1st of April, 2021, a letter was sent via DHL to Chief Sunday Igboho but the letter was not received by his security operatives.'

'Later around 3 pm of the same day, a team of about 6 men without uniform arrived in a Corolla car and another 9 were in police uniform but all were identified as police officers.'

'They wanted to see Chief Sunday Igboho with a letter said to have been addressed to him by the Inspector General of Police. Again, the letter was not received by Chief Sunday's security team.'

'Chief Sunday would like to know why a letter was sent to him and for what purpose. If the IG of police wants to invite him, we would like him to first send the same letter to all the bandits and Boko Haram members killing our mothers and farmers and those kidnapping them.'

'Since the IG of police wants to invite him, he should make a public statement addressed to Chief Sunday Igboho.'

'We should all remember how letters had been sent to previous Yoruba sons like the late Dele Giwa.'

Load-Date: April 3, 2021

---

End of Document

Why I Shunned Inspector-General Of Police's Invitation - Igboho

Naija 247 News

April 3, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 Naija 247 news Media Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 307 words

Body

---

Yoruba freedom fighter, Sunday Adeyemo, popularly known as Sunday Igboho has explained why he did not accept an invitation by the Inspector-General of Police, Mohammed Adamu.

In a press statement issued by Igboho's media aide, Olayomi Koiki, a letter was sent on Thursday to his boss via a courier service and another with about 15 police officers.

Sunday Igboho

Olayomi explained that both were not received by Igboho's security operatives due to safety reasons as such a letter had purportedly led to the death of Nigerian journalist, Dele Giwa.

The statement read, 'We would like to tell the international communities and every Nigerian that this morning 1st of April, 2021, a letter was sent via DHL to Chief Sunday Igboho but the letter was not received by his security operatives.

'Later around 3 pm of the same day, a team of about 6 men without uniform arrived in a Corolla car and another 9 were in police uniform but all were identified as police officers.

'They wanted to see Chief Sunday Igboho with a letter said to have been addressed to him by the Inspector General of Police. Again, the letter was not received by Chief Sunday's security team.

'Chief Sunday would like to know why a letter was sent to him and for what purpose. If the IG of police wants to invite him, we would like him to first send the same letter to all the bandits and Boko Haram members killing our mother's and farmers and those kidnapping them.'

'Since the IG of police wants to invite him, he should make a public statement addressed to Chief Sunday Igboho.'

'We should all remember how letters had been sent to previous Yoruba sons like the late Dele Giwa.'

A team reportedly comprising policemen, soldiers and others had in February attempted to arrest Igboho on the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway.

The security operatives, however, failed in their attempt to arrest him.

Why I Shunned Inspector-General Of Police's Invitation - Igboho

Load-Date: April 5, 2021

---

End of Document

The enduring ministry of Ray Ekpu

The Guardian

August 17, 2023 Thursday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1407 words

Body

---

Ray Ekpu writes well. Since he left the University of Lagos 50 years ago, Ekpu has continued to regale and amaze us with his use of English language, his poetic twist of phrases, the cadence of his prose, the lilting alliterations and his uncanny coinages has put him in a special class. He is a public intellectual who is also appealing to the man on the street. He is the man in front with the flag. We follow him because he continues to amaze us.

He is brilliant and unforgivably prophetic. But I don't want to write about his amazing power to send words into battle. I want to write about his personal courage in the midst of battle. He had earned his glittering epaulet. On Sunday, August 6, Ray Ekpu celebrated his 75th birthday. It is now clear to us that the general, who has been leading us all these years, may be entering his winter years. He remains a roaring lion.

Ekpu's weekly column in The Guardian is a monument to the best of African journalism. He is not just informed; he is educated and draws regularly from his vast personal resources of knowledge and experience. He lavishes us with captivating prose and arresting logic. I don't know of any other journalist, who has endured more personal travails than Ekpu in the pursuit of public good. He is always in front in the quest to make our society and humanity better.

Ekpu became our Editor-in-Chief in the old Newswatch after the brutal assassination of Dele Giwa, our pioneer Editor-in-Chief, on October 19, 1986. The death of Giwa was our greatest trial. Ekpu and Giwa share the same twin duplex, each occupying one wing at their Adeniyi-Jones, Ikeja address. Our two other bosses, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed, were also living not far. All the three of them (Ekpu, Agbese and Mohammed) were to see hell after the sudden death of Giwa.

No one could have predicted the rough road ahead when Newswatch hit the newsstand in February 1985. The quartet of Giwa, Ekpu, Agbese and Mohammed had moved us into a new frontier of journalism and we were giddy with excitements. It was a difficult period.

The Second Republic and democracy had just collapsed due to the greed and carelessness of the civilian politicians. Now we had militaricians in power led by the said Major-General Muhammadu Buhari and his unsmiling deputy, Major-General Tunde Idiagbon. Both of them were tough masters of double-standard and double-speak. Soon, we started complaining loudly when Buhari and his team brought out the koboko.

The enduring ministry of Ray Ekpu

Then the coup of August 27, 1985 that brought in the smiling Major-General Ibrahim Babangida to power. It was a good relief and Buhari was thrown into detention. Only few people missed him. Babangida decided to open the cells and the detention centres and review the cases of those detained by the Buhari regime.

I was assigned to cover the Special Tribunal for the review of cases of those politicians thrown into detention by General Buhari. The tribunal was headed by Justice Samson Uwaifo of the Bendel (now Edo and Delta) State High Court and it was sitting in one of the committee rooms of the old National Assembly at the Tafawa Balewa Square, Lagos.

The most important of the cases was the one about President Shehu Shagari and Vice-President Alex Ekwueme. After reviewing the cases against the two men, Uwaifo concluded that there was no genuine reason for their continuing detention. It recommended that they should be free. I brought this news to my superiors at Newswatch and everyone agreed that the Uwaifo Tribunal was wrong. We agreed that happenings at the Uwaifo Tribunal should become our cover story and I was assigned to write it.

The cover story titled: The Trial of Shehu Shagari, hit the newsstand on February 3, 1986. Anyone reading our story, especially the incendiary column penned by Ray Ekpu, would know that the respected judge was also on trial. "It was clear to most people after a few days of the clowning that was going on in the Justice Samson Uwaifo tribunal ... that the whole thing was a farce, inelegantly contrived much in the manner of a Kangaroo court, rendered even more kangarooic, permit the coinage, by the abject naiveté of the presiding judge."

Ekpu continued with acidic flourish: "What the Uwaifo tribunal was saying in effect is that Shagari and his gang did no wrong, that the country should call them back, apologise to them, give them a bouquet of flowers, kiss them on both cheeks and hand over the government to them and then it will be business as usual!"

I stayed away from the tribunal sensing that there would be trouble that Monday. Justice Uwaifo, believing that he had been unfairly vilified, was livid. He asked for me and when he was told that the Newswatch reporter was not present at the tribunal, he issued arrest warrant for me, Ekpu and other reporters who contributed to the story: Dele Olojede, Nosa Igiebor, Soji Omotunde and Joyce Osakwe.

The following day, we were all present in court except Olojede, who was out of Lagos on official assignment. We met an angry judge who upbraided Ekpu and promptly committed us to prison. The Black Maria prison vehicle was on standby outside the tribunal. Our lawyer, the incomparable Chief Gani Fawehinmi, however, rose to the occasion and said the tribunal cannot commit us to prison. The judge relented after extensive legal fireworks, fined Ekpu and asked the rest of us to go with a caution.

Barely nine months later, our world shattered, when suspected agents of the military junta killed Dele Giwa, who had led the Newswatch team to the Uwaifo tribunal. Ekpu stepped into his shoes. It was a truly trying period and despite our wounds, Newswatch maintained the tempo as the most radical media house in the country.

We soon ran into an ambush. In April 1987, six months after the assassination of Giwa, Newswatch was proscribed by the Babangida junta ostensibly for carrying an exclusive story on the report of the Political Committee set up by the military government. That was the public reason, but the real reason was because every week, we were carrying the disturbing question: Who killed Dele Giwa?

We were driven out of our office on Oregun Road, Ikeja and our three editors were harassed and detained. Reprieve was later negotiated for Newswatch. When asked by journalists whether he had any regret, Ekpu said if the situation should repeat itself, "I will do it again!"

Courage under fire is the hallmark of Ray Ekpu's ministry. As the editor of the old Sunday Times before his Concord and Newswatch days, he proved his mettle as a columnist of steadfast courage. At the Daily Times group, Ekpu soon found himself at odds with the leaders of the ruling National Party of Nigeria (NPN). He was shunted into the editorial seat of Business Times and when he would not relent, he was fired. He said he accepted his sacking with "philosophical calmness."

The enduring ministry of Ray Ekpu

Chief Moshood Abiola hired him and made him the Chairman of Editorial Board of the Concord Group of Newspapers. His column was a must read in the old Concord. He was arrested and charged for murder for predicting, in one of columns, that fire may gut the giant NITEL Building overlooking the Marina. His prediction came to pass. NITEL was gutted and Sunday Adewusi, the then Inspector-General of Police, had Ekpu arrested and charged for murder!

Some people died in the NITEL fire. Temporary respite only came when Buhari seized power on December 31, 1983. This is 2023; Ray Ekpu is still standing and potent.

Oba Adedokun Abolarin, the Orangun of Oke-Ila, Osun State, himself a lawyer and veteran of our struggle against military rule, said recently that heroes like Ekpu should be honoured by our country. He said that is the only way to inspire the next generation to greatness. I agree with him. However Kabiyesi would need to wait long.

Those who inherited the estate after the arduous struggle against military rule are mostly those who collaborated with the military. Therefore, they perceive their era as the continuation of military rule. That is why Ekpu's assignment remains unfinished.

At 75, he remains a living inspiration, an intrepid general of the pen whose accomplishment and greatness cannot be diminished by whatever may be the attitude of those in temporary control of the Nigerian state.

Congratulations Oga Ray. May God grant you many more years of impact!

In this article Mr. Ray Ekpu

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 18, 2023

---

End of Document

The journalist as a game

The Sun (Nigeria)

November 5, 2022 Saturday

Copyright 2022 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1207 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

This year marks the 10th anniversary of the United Nations (UN) Plan of Action on the Safety of Journalists and the Issue of Impunity. It's a commemorative plan triggered by growing impunity against journalists across the globe.

Every November 2, the UN tasks governments across the world to reaffirm their commitments to end impunity for crimes against journalists and to create a friendlier environment for the media to operate. The date was instituted after the UN General Assembly endorsed it in 2013 and it has continued to place a mirror before journalists, the general public and governments on how fairly or unjustly media professionals have been treated.

Journalism is not the only profession on earth. But it is the only profession whose practitioners are often subject of attack by public office holders, criminal merchants and sundry crooks. Journalists do not event news but they report it. Often, they report what the powers that be do not want reported. Journalists dive into the underworld of drug dealers, forex scammers, public office thieves and private sector swindlers. This puts them at great risk. They are harassed, heckled and, in some cases, hunted down to early grave. The journalist is a hunter for news. But sometimes, this same hunter becomes the hunted. He becomes the game, a prey to be hunted by persons aggrieved by the raw audacity of the journalist.

Such is the friction between the journalist and a section of the public. It's this friction that breeds impunity for crimes against the journalist. An impunity that has gone unchecked for years, an impunity that has shoved many journalists to the grave, usually at the prime of their lives. Countless journalists have been jailed without trial, without fair hearing.

Ms. Audrey Azoulay, Director-General of UNESCO, on the occasion of this year's International Day to End Impunity for Crimes against Journalists last Wednesday, November 2, lamented the high tide of impunity against journalists.

The journalist as a game

Citing the latest UNESCO data on killings of journalists, Azoulay regretted that the global impunity rate for killing of journalists remains shockingly high at 86 percent. In the last decade alone, about 955 journalists were killed with many of the deaths still unresolved puzzles in different countries.

In a fast-transforming digital age, the role of the journalist and the methodology of his/her trade is yet to be fully appreciated by two key professions that ought to protect the journalist. Security and the judiciary. These two professions must, as a necessity, adopt new strategies to protect the journalist against the darts of societal renegades.

In her message to mark this year's anniversary, Azoulay said: "Here at UNESCO, we have developed guidelines and toolkits, and trained over 24,000 judicial actors and 11,500 law enforcement and security officials on issues related to freedom of expression and the security of journalists, including in the digital world. Despite these efforts, journalists continue to be killed at an alarming rate. According to our Observatory, 955 journalists have lost their lives since 2012. Seventy-one have been killed since January, making 2022 already the deadliest year since 2018. Just as shockingly, although we have seen a slight improvement over the past ten years, almost nine in 10 journalist killings remain unresolved."

This is at the core of the growing impunity and killings of journalists, the fact that such killings are usually unresolved. This gives extra incentives to the killers and their ilk to kill more journalists. Sadly, these killings happen outside war zones, usually among nations where there is no war. Nigeria has a fat share of unresolved killings of journalists and an even fatter portion of impunity and violence against journalists.

We've seen the murder of Dele Giwa, Bagauda Katho, Godwin Agbroko, Abayomi Ogundehi, Bayo Ohu, Sule Ugbagwu, Enenche Akogwu, Fidelis Ikwuebe, Nathan S. Dabak, Sunday Gyang Bwede, Okezie Amarubeni, Sam Nimfa-Jan, Samson Boyi, Tunde Oladepo, Zakariya Isa, among others.

The list is long. Save for Giwa and Katho who were bombed, the others were made to take the bullet in the most gruesome manner. Some were killed in their homes. Some waylaid on the road and shot dead, pointblank. In most of the cases listed, the killers never hid their intent. They came to kill, nothing more. They never faked robbery of any kind. Their mission was well spelt out by their sponsors: Kill the meddlesome interloper.

In all of its annual reports on global journalism practice, the Committee for the Protection of Journalists (CPJ) has consistently identified war as the major agent of death for the journalists. Year after year, more journalists have been reported killed in countries with long history of war. Iraq, Cambodia etcetera, have always featured in the yearly reports. And this is where the puzzle lies. Nigeria is not at war, yet her journalists can't find a safe place to keep their pens.

Nigerian journalists are not killed at battle fronts. They are killed right in their homes, on their way to and from their offices, or while investigating a story. Dele Giwa was bombed in his house, Bayo Ohu was murdered in his house, Ogundehi got the pellets pumped into his body while driving home, Ugbagwu was murdered in his house in a carefully choreographed operation.

Tunde Oladepo was a senior correspondent with The Guardian newspaper when he was murdered by five masked gunmen who entered his home early in the morning and shot him to death in front of his wife and children on February 26, 1998. It's not a case of robbery as nothing was removed from Oladepo's residence.

The case of Enenche Akogwu, a reporter and camera operator with Channels TV, was as scary as any. He had interviewed witnesses of terrorist attacks in Kano on January 20, 2012, and had just returned from a police press conference when unidentified gunmen badged into his home and killed him. Again, nothing was removed. They simply came for his precious life.

In all the reported cases, the journalists were not killed by some aliens from outer space. They were killed by Nigerians or by aliens resident in Nigeria. They were killed with arms and ammunition freely circulated in Nigeria by the hoodlums.

The journalist as a game

And this brings us to the next puzzle. Why have the security authorities not been able to unearth any of these killers, right from Dele Giwa's murder case? In all the instances, police investigation has followed a familiar route. Arrests were made and suspects(?) were paraded. And it ends there. No justice for the bereaved; no succour for the victims and their families.

So, why were they killed? The answer lurks in the fact that there must be something the gunmen and their paymasters are hiding which they do not want the larger society to know. It is the duty of the journalist to inform the society. And it is the right of the people to know how they are being governed, how their collective patrimony is being managed.

But no matter, Nigerian government must make a renewed commitment to protect journalists. The best way to show good faith in this regard is to dispassionately investigate previous murder cases and mete out appropriate sanctions against the brood of murderers.

Load-Date: November 6, 2022

---

End of Document

MIKE [email protected]: I'll do journalism again if there's a second coming

MIKE [email protected]: I'll do journalism again if there's a second coming

The Nation (Nigeria)

July 23, 2022 Saturday

Copyright 2022 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 3096 words

Body

---

Talk of the biggest stars of Nigeria's journalism industry of the late '80s and '90s, and you can't but come up with the name, Mike Awoyinfa. As pioneer editor of Weekend Concord then, he rocked the boat, stirred controversies and generally redefined the face of tabloid journalism in Nigeria, becoming a name to look forward to every Saturday. His column, Press Clips and the paper as a whole became a must-read in every home and circle. The icon, who later became pioneer MD of The Sun newspapers at the turn of the millennium and made a name as an author and biographer alongside his lifetime friend, Dimgba Igwe (now late), clocked 70 today and took out time to regal Gboyega Alaka with some high points of his career.

YOU clocked 70 years of age yesterday, July 23; so you are officially a senior citizen; do you feel old? Or do you feel you can still do those things that you used to do as a young man?

In truth it feels scary. We used to see 70-year-old people back in those days as very old people, like people in the Bible (laughs); and it used to look very far away. But we thank God. He has been faithful. To be 70 is a cause for joy. We have every reason to be thankful. Everybody prays to grow old; and I pray that I would not just be 70. I hope to be 80, 90; and if God says 100, why not? As long as my faculties are intact. Also 70 brings you nearer to God. Even if you are not nearer to God or your religion is not that strong, 70 gives you that last chance to turn around your life to go to a better place. However, old age comes along with its own baggage too, chief of which is illness. I used to jog and do all sorts of fitness things, but suddenly old age came like nightfall. I had a degenerative disease at my lower back; I had prostate cancer, which I never bargained for. I used to see prostate cancer as a disease for people that are pope-like; but I'm not a pope. But I've gone through my treatment and I thank God for it. I am saying this so that everybody would who is 50 should take issues of their health seriously, do health checks, so that the doctor would know the state of your prostate, because it is a disease for everybody (male).

Talking about faculties being intact, there has been a lot of controversy over old age in recent time, especially in politics. There is this tendency to 'stigmatise' old people by younger people who are advocating that they should just retire and vacate the space. You are at a very good place to tell us how fit or alert a 70-year-old can be.

Mentally, I am as fit as fiddle. The older you are, the wiser, the more experience you have had in life and nothing surprises you. You are able to look at a situation and draw an accurate analysis and take an accurate decision, more than young people. You are more like a historian. It's not like football, where you get to age 40 or 35 and they say you have aged and you are of no value. But even then, you become valuable as a coach. Same with tennis. So I won't run down old age. But having said that, I think the young people should be given a chance in politics, because governance requires some physicality, strength, and ability to do tasking things. You need good health. Look at the trends all over the world; take for instance Obama, when he became president. We have had of old presidents who go to the United Nations to doze. And then 50 percent of their lives is spent travelling for medical checkups. However, for writer, old age is like wine. The older you are the better. The more mature, the more reflective and you can sit down and write like a guru.

MIKE [email protected]: I'll do journalism again if there's a second coming

Your days as editor of Weekend Concord ushered many green-eyed youths into the beauty of the journalism profession, including this reporter. Your column was a must-read and the paper itself a must-buy in many homes. Tell us of those interesting times in your career.

Before you become an editor, you must have paid your dues as a reporter. Journalism is all about reporting. I don't believe in editors who rose to the position of an editor through being on the desk, and never went to the field. A reporter is like an infantry soldier in times of war. That is where the action is. All my life, I've been a reporter. I read Mass Communication at the University of Lagos, I passed out in 1977, and then worked with the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) as a reporter in Jos. But the kind of journalism they were doing was anonymous journalism. They had no bi-line. So when National Concord came and we had names like Dele Giwa and others on board, I applied to work there. I had been reading Dele Giwa from his days at Daily Times; he had a column called Parallax Snaps, which was breezy, catchy, very readable and engaging. I was appointed Chief Correspondent for the paper in Kaduna. I have always been a very ambitious person, so my goal was to one day be the editor of a newspaper. As a kid, I was a voracious reader. I was living with my uncle who was a teacher and I ended up reading all the books in his library. I had a lonely childhood, so I fought loneliness with my reading habit. There was a paper called The Spectator in Ghana - I was born and raised in Ghana, so I would buy and read it. That reading habit really helped my work at school. Every time I wrote an essay, the teacher would ask me to come and read it before the class. So it is important to groom our children to cultivate reading habit.

Back to Kaduna, there was a feature story I did for Dele Giwa, who was then the editor of Sunday Concord. It was about one illiterate Hausa woman journalist. We had gone for an Aminu Kano Press Conference and she stood up to ask questions in Hausa; I thought what's this woman doing in journalism? I saw that as news, so I sat her down and interviewed her. And Dele Giwa carved a column for me and called it 'Reporter's Column by Mike Awoyinfa'. He titled the piece, 'Hajia Bilikisu, Reporter without Biro and Notebook'. When I saw it, I said 'Wow!'. My view was that he created it for every reporter to contribute but I became so hungry and avaricious that every week, I sent him a human angle story for that column, so it became my column. And that is the origin of my being a columnist. And to be a columnist under Dele Giwa, you must be really worth your salt. And I wasn't just writing human angle stories, whenever there was an international story, I wrote my own commentary. I just imagined myself as little Dele Giwa, put myself in his mindset and say how would Dele Giwa write this? Like when Janet Cook, the Washington Post based journalist cooked a story of a nine-year-old cocaine addict, which won the Pulitzer. But at the end of the day, the police stepped in. They said they wanted to see the nine-year-old and to arrest the people that gave him cocaine. So it eventually turned out that it was a cooked up story, and that did her in. It became a big controversy and spoilt the image of Washington Post. Even the editor, I think was fired for not asking the right questions. I can't remember his name but Katherine Graham was the publisher of the paper at the time. I wrote a own commentary on that. Dele Giwa eventually redeployed me to Lagos to work under him. That was where I also learnt a lot about the man. In those days, Sunday Concord was like a university; we called ourselves 'Writer's Enclave'. Lewis Obi was there, so many names. Eventually Giwa left to found Newswatch Magazine and his deputy, Adediye, another tough editor took over. If you were going to his meeting and you didn't prepare yourself, be sure to be in trouble.

Then of course I went abroad for the Harry Briton Fellowship; it was a three-month training for Commonwealth journalists. I represented Nigeria. That was when I had my son, Jide, 1985. I was attached to the Sunday Sun of Newcastle. Having worked in a home of tabloid journalism, UK, you came back brimming with confidence. When I came back, I was moved to the features department to be the Features Editor.

MIKE [email protected]: I'll do journalism again if there's a second coming

You also wrote a book on features writing

At about that time, me and Dimgba had written a book called The Art of Features Writing. We just asking what should we do for ourselves? We thought, only God knows when we would reach the top, and decided that we'd better start writing to make some money for ourselves. We went round asking journalists what a feature story is, and we discovered that a whole lot of people didn't know. Some knew and they clarified, so we documented it. So when I was appointed Features Editor, armed with the knowledge of that book, I changed the paradigm in National Concord. Their orientation towards features was hard stuffs, analysis and all that; but when I came, I humanised the whole feature thing and turned it into human angle, which is exactly what it is supposed to be - stories that are emotional, stories that evoke pity; that evoked joy... And the little that we did made impact, because people started buying National Concord more than they were. They would buy and pull out the section. So my MD, Doyin Abiola, saw my potentials and said 'Come let's start a Saturday paper. You will be editor, form your team, give me a dummy of how the paper would look.' We wanted to call it Saturday Concord but I called it Weekend Concord. That was how I assembled my team; young, hungry men like Dele Momodu, Femi Adeshina, Shola Osunkeye... a collection of stars. The dream was 'Let's shake the nation. Let's come up with a paper that the nation would not be able to ignore. And the first story that we had then was by Dele Momodu. It was titled 'Soyinka's love life'. He went to interview Soyinka's former wife and that one told the story of how they broke apart.... And Soyinka was so mad, so angry, and I was so happy. News is something that somebody don't want you to publish but which people would like to read. Dele Momodu did not stop at that; for the second edition, he went to speak with Soyinka's son who was then in Ife studying, and the innocent boy spilled. And Soyinka became angrier. There was a time he actually called me; I can't remember what I told him but I begged him. I told him I did all this for your admiration, you are our father, you are our hero, you cannot hide.... (laughs heartily)

There was one about the late Tai Solarin

Yes, when he said he saw something in Ebony Magazine during Babangida's time which he couldn't defend. And then I wrote a column 'abusing' Tai Solarin, 'May Your Road Be Rough', and people came after me. How can you be abuse an old man, such a respected man like that? People didn't understand that it was sarcasm. They attacked me, sending me lots of letters (laughs), and I published all the letters. Next we publish all those that supported me, where they criticised the educational standard, saying it had fallen and pointing out that people couldn't even understand simple satire.

You shook the industry.

We really did, to the point where all other papers started their own Saturday paper - Punch, Vanguard.... I remember when the late Alaafin Lamidi Adeyemi had his problem with drugs and was detained abroad and we were to go to town the following day; I said 'Guys, bring me all Alaafin's photographs'. So they went into the library and dug up all his photos. Those were not the days of digital when you could just punch your computer and photos would jump out. I started going through, and then I saw one where he was Alaafin laughing. Then I said 'Aha this is it'. And then I slammed it and headlined it boldly: 'NOT ALAAFIN MATTER!'. (General laughter and applause.) That is one strong point I have. Headlining. I think it is one gift of inspiration that God gave me. God is the number one headline writer.

Yeah, many who worked with you have testified to that; how does it come to you?

First, you must have it inside you. And then you must develop it, you must train yourself on how make the biggest impact with words, with pictures. Atimes, you don't go for the obvious. If it is the picture of a dog that would have the biggest impact, blow the picture of the dog. It's like when May Ellen Ezekiel died, we didn't just say May Ellen Ezekiel died, we blew her picture - everybody already knew she had died; and we captioned it, 'OOh MEE!'. And at the bottom, we wrote: 'She died vomiting blood' - because the doctor had told me that she died vomiting blood. Gbam! So don't choke the paper with words. Make it a visual beauty, dramatise it. Have a sense of drama. Headline is something you sleep over; it is something you dream over; it is something you think over. Even when there is no news breaking, you must be giving yourself training - assuming this person dies, how will I cast the headline? If his wife dies, what would be her headline?

MIKE [email protected]: I'll do journalism again if there's a second coming

Have you considered offering a Masterclass in headline casting, for younger people in the industry?

Yeah, the next book I would want to write is on the art of headline writing. I pray God gives me the energy and the wisdom and insight to be able to put it together.

The peak of your career at Weekend Concord coincided with the peak of military turbulence; how did you manage to practise without getting into trouble with the junta?

The thing is professionalism. Be very professional, balance your story, have your evidence to support whatever you are writing. Follow all the tenets of good journalism. Once you have done your duty, balanced it by hearing from both sides and satisfied your conscience well, you are free. All through, I never had any brush with the law. When I was sued by a professor who plagiarised, we won the case because we had a good lawyer who defended us. And we had evidence. We said this is what the American professor wrote, this is what the Ilorin professor wrote. Oya compare. I think it was Omololu Kassim who wrote the story. The professor was saying it was his jealous colleagues who were trying to bring him down.

Back in the days, Weekend Concord sold 100,000 copies...

(Cuts in) Point of correction, we sold up to 250,000.

Good, but today, no newspaper can boast of selling 50,000 copies. What has changed?

I think it's a global phenomenon. The advent of the internet. Every revolution brings its own casualty. People now prefer to go online to read. Luckily it is also free. When you can punch your gadget and read an article or story for free, why go and buy a hard copy? That is the mindset of many. However, some papers like New York Times let you read a little of their stuff and then lock it up and ask you to subscribe. Poor reading habit may also be part of it.

You lost your friend, Dimgba Igwe. It was a friendship that lasted a lifetime. How did you meet?

We met at Sunday Concord. I was there before him, his senior. He just came in one day with a freelance story he did on the struggle school children went through to go to school. He went on that journey several times, observing and interviewing them, so he came out with the feature for Sunday Concord, which we titled 'Children as they war to go to school in Lagos', capturing how they struggle to board Molue buses with adults. Dele Giwa didn't know him from anywhere but once he read it, he said 'Wow! who is this?' The next time he came for his pay, Dele Giwa gave him a job. So we did stories together, shared bi-lines; I was humble enough to accommodate him. One of the stories we covered was when Abiola was 50, and we went to Abeokuta to cover it. That was when we started thinking about our future and the idea of writing a book came. We had options like starting a magazine, there was a magazine called Hero then, which we would have modelled it after, but we were thinking of capital. We thought to go and meet Abiola, but Abiola would not give us money to leave his paper to go and start another. So we wrote that book. I think Abiola gave us 73,000 to publish it, which was a big money then. With it, we had money to do other things. It also opened our eyes that we could write books, so during one of the media close downs, we wrote another book, '50 Nigeria's Corporate Strategists', where CEOs shared their experiences about managing business. It was a big sellout and we made money. That was the money we used in building our houses. Like you know, his house is next door. After that, we wrote 'Nigeria's Marketing Memoirs', where marketing directors told stories about the brands they had built. We wrote a book on Orji Kalu; that was how we became friends and he asked us to come and head his newspaper, The Sun. So immediately Dimgba died, the only thing I could do was to write a book that I knew he would like. That's why I wrote, 50 Nigeria's Boardroom Leaders, with him as co-author. My prayer is that all journalists would take interest in writing books, because it's also an extension of journalism and it's more permanent.

Was the proceeds of the last book shared?

Definitely, whatever I give to myself, I give the wife. We have a company that we both co-owned.

Your friendship with Dimgba was so close that some even suggested both of you could be into some queer relationship.

MIKE [email protected]: I'll do journalism again if there's a second coming

Why wouldn't they? We were really close, but God knows I'm not that kind of person. He was a pastor, is it a pastor I would be doing gay with? God forbid, with all the beautiful women in this world.

Speaking of beautiful women, Igwe also called you 'Man of Iniquity'...

Yeah (laughs). In those days, I used to be a very handsome young man. And when you add that to having a name mine and you were a man about town, women would look at you and you would look at them too.

And you were not a pastor.

I was not a pastor, I was an iniquity man (laughs again). In fact, they said Eric Osagie and I used to decide covers of our editions at beer parlous, which was true anyway. The best place is where you are more relaxed.

Not long ago, you also ventured into publishing.

Yes, Entertainment Express. We invested the little money we had to start an entertainment newspaper, but it didn't survive. You need bigger money to publish. It's not a short term vocation. You should be able to have money to project for many years without looking at the revenue, but with the peanuts we put in and the little cover price, we were always running short of money. And adverts weren't coming in too. But it was a good experience. We met young men who learnt from us.

You were MD of The Sun, and then one day the world woke up to hear that you were no longer there.

Well that's capitalism for you. Once you're not the sole owner of a business or brought in the Lion's share in a business, there is a limit to what you can do. The good part for us is that when people see The Sun, they remember that you guys birthed it.

Load-Date: July 24, 2022

---

End of Document

Ita-Giwa tackles ex-DIG Omeben over Dele Giwa's death

Nigerian Tribune

October 31, 2015 Saturday

Copyright 2015 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 584 words

Body

---

Former Special Adviser on National Assembly Matters, Senator Florence Ita-Giwa has tackled former Deputy Inspector General of Police, Christopher Omeben, for remotely linking her with the death of former Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, Mr. Dele Giwa.

Giwa, an ex-husband to Ita-Giwa, was assassinated in 1986 via a parcel bomb.

Omeben, who investigated the killing, had a few days ago in an interview said that Giwa's assassination via a parcel bomb could be remotely connected to his "unhealthy relations with his "estranged wife."

Also, Omeben identified Kayode Soyinka, Dele Giwa's colleague who was the only survivor and eyewitness of the dastardly act as the "prime suspect."

The former Special Adviser on National Assembly Matters, on Friday, while debunking the claim of Omeben, who is now a clergyman, said in a statement made available by her Media Liaison Officer, Mr. Jonathan Eze, that if women in his locality killed their husbands, that was not the case where she came from.

The statement reads in part: "It is very possible that the aged former crime fighter is hallucinating on account of the blemish his shoddy handling of the case had cast on what might have been labeled an illustrious police career.

"Without a doubt the 'estranged wife' referred to by our former police chief is none other than the Distinguished Senator Florence Ita-Giwa, who was once married to the late Dele Giwa.

"At the risk of sounding impetuous, it would appear that the former detective turned clergyman is now clutching at straws in a puerile attempt to cover up his crass incompetence with regard to the case.

"The pendulum of suspicion about the identity of the killers has always swung in one direction and is well known by any one who was around at the time the heinous act occurred.

"Just because Christopher Omeben lacked the courage at the time to pursue the obvious suspects at the time does not give him a right to bandy spurious allegations in the twilight of his life.

"Senator Florence Ita-Giwa was never considered a person of interest in the immediate aftermath of the murder, so for her name to be linked to this most reprehensible crime nearly 30 years after is preposterous, to say the least.

Ita-Giwa tackles ex-DIG Omeben over Dele Giwa's death

"The Senator categorically denies being with Dele Giwa the night before his death as the senator was in Calabar as a member of a state government empaneled committee.

"Also, the identity of the person who delivered the parcel bomb to the late Dele Giwa's residence is now in the public domain, so to say that the senator's houseboy delivered the parcel now is suggestive of the deterioration of the mental faculties of the former Deputy Inspector General.

"Indeed the senator would like to be put on record that at the time Dele Giwa died, she had no knowledge of the location of his residence and had not met with him for at least one year before.

"For the avoidance of doubt, the separation of the Distinguished Senator and the late Dele Giwa was devoid of any animosity and the Senator would like to know if separating from one's husband means that they ought to become enemies."

"Indeed she has no apologies to make for having a good relationship with Dele Giwa, even after their separation. As a matter of fact, Senator Ita-Giwa maintains very cordial relations with the siblings and children of the late great journalist to this day.

"The elderly former top cop ought to know that women of Nigeria will not take kindly to his denigrating a national icon and role model of thousands of Nigerian women."

Load-Date: October 30, 2015

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa, 29 Years After

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 19, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 555 words

Body

---

Today marked exactly 29 years since ace journalist and founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch, Sumonu Oladele Giwa was gruesomely murdered by a mail bomb, in his residence on 25, Talabi Street, off Adeniyi Jones Avenue, Ikeja, Lagos.

Dele Giwa as he was fondly called, met his untimely death on Sunday, October 19, 1986, at the House 25 Talabi Street, which has now given way to a hospital. He was killed in his prime at age 39. Had he been alive today, he would be 68 years old.

That Sunday morning, the merchants of death gave the deadly parcel to his then 19-year-old son, Billy, who received it on his behalf.

The assailants had vanished into thin air when he attempted to open the parcel and a blast occurred "tearing open" his lower region.

His colleague, Newswatch's London Bureau Chief, Kayode Soyinka, who was with him at the time of the tragic event, suffered perforated eardrums. Giwa died at the First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja, Lagos, where he was rushed to after the explosion.

Dele Giwa was born on March 16, 1947 to a poor family working in the palace of Oba Adesoji Aderemi, the Ooni of Ife.

He attended local Authority Modern School in Lagere, Ile-Ife.

When his father moved to Oduduwa College, Ile-Ife as a laundry man, he gained admission to that school.

Dele Giwa travelled to the USA for his higher education, earning a BA in English and Communication Arts from Brooklyn College in 1977 and enrolled for a Graduate program at Fordham University.

He worked with the New York Times as a news assistant for four years after which he relocated to Nigeria to work with Daily Times.

Later, in 1984, Dele Giwa and fellow journalists Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed founded Newswatch and the first edition was distributed on 28 January 1985.

Dele Giwa, 29 Years After

A 1989 description of the magazine said it "changed the format of print journalism in Nigeria [and] introduced bold, investigative formats to news reporting in Nigeria".

However, in the first few months of the administration of General Ibrahim Babangida, who took power in August 1985, the magazine was shamelessly flattering. It printed his face on the cover four times and even criticised "anyone who attempted to make life unpleasant for Babangida."

Later, the paper took a more hostile view of the Babangida regime.

However, so many stories sprung up after his death on who killed him and why he was killed.

One of such stories was his link to Gloria Okon, a lady who was arrested in 1985 for Drug related offenses and who was said to have links to the late wife of IBB

Gloria Okon was said to have died in detention but a couple of months after, Dele Giwa ran into her in London and she poured out her story to him.

It was said that the Government got to know of the meeting and allegedly decided to wipe out Giwa as that remained the only way to keep him off their tracks.

Giwa married an American nurse in 1974.

His second marriage, to Florence Ita Giwa, lasted 10 months.

He later married Olufunmilayo Olaniyan on July 10, 1984, and they were married until his death in 1986.

He was survived by his mother, wives and children.

As Nigeria and the rest of the world seize today, to celebrate, as well as to remember the legacies of this refined journalist, the unanswered question 29 years after remains: Who killed Dele Giwa?

When an answer will come, however, remains unknown for now.

Load-Date: October 20, 2015

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Mother Dies At 87 - As Community Demands Fresh Probe Into Dele Giwa's Death

Vanguard (Lagos)

January 08, 2013

Copyright 2013 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 563 words

Byline: Simon Ebegbulem

Dateline: Benin City

Body

---

THE mother of Nigeria's foremost journalist and late Editor in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, Dele Giwa, Madam Elekia Aishat Giwa, 87, is dead.

Madam Giwa died at the Aruna Ogun Hospital in Ikorodu, Lagos, Tuesday morning, of an undisclosed ailment.

Already the people of Ugbekpe, Ekperi in Etsako Central Local Government Area of Edo State, have been thrown in mourning following the death of Madam Giwa.

Before her death at about 5 a.m, she was living with her daughter, Abibat Ronke Aboaba.

Her son, Dele, a celebrated journalist was murdered by unknown persons via a letter bomb delivered to his house in Ikeja on October 19, 1986. The parcel was marked "From the C-in-C" which raised speculations that the then military government had something to do with his death.

The government then, under Gen. Ibrahim Babangida, however, denied any complicity in the murder and institute a panel to find the killers which was never achieved.

The people of Ugbekpe Ekperi lamented, yesterday, that Madam Giwa died before the Federal Government could unmasked the killers of Dele Giwa and called on President Goodluck Jonathan to commence fresh investigation into Giwa's murder.

Former Chairman of Etsako Central Local Government Council and one of the leaders of Ekperi community, Paschal Ugbome, described the death of Madam Giwa as another devastating news for the people, particularly as the Federal Government failed to fish out the killers of her son whom he described as a fearless journalist and a proud son of Ekperi land.

Meanwhile, Chairman, Nigeria Union of Journalists, NUJ, Lagos State Council, Mr Deji Elumoye, has described the death of late Dele Giwa's mother as painful.

Dele Giwa's Mother Dies At 87 - As Community Demands Fresh Probe Into Dele Giwa's Death

In a condolence message to the family over the death of Madam Elekia Giwa, yesterday, Elumoye said the news came as a shock, but "we thank God for the life of mama."

He said: "Mama living till this year showed her strong spirit considering the manner her son, Dele Giwa, was killed."

Also, the Edo State Government, yesterday, described the death of Madam Giwa as shocking and a great loss to the people of the state and regretted that the Federal Government was yet to find the killers of her son, Dele Giwa.

Secretary to the State Government, Prof. Julius Ihonvhere, who reacted to the death, described the deceased as "strong mother" who kept the home front solid despite the "high level conspiracy against the family."

"The governor and the people of Edo State received news of the death with shock and sadness, the passing away of the daughter of our great land whose son and left indelible landmark in the practice of journalism and activism in this country. It is our regret that the custodians of power in this Nigeria state were never able to apprehend the killers of our dear son Dele Giwa.

"As the souls of the mother and son lives in the bosom of the Lord, may they continue to hunt those killers."

Reacting also, former Deputy Governor of Edo State, Rev. Peter Obadan, lamented that "Dele was not alive to mourn his mother."

Obadan said,"It is a shame there is nobody to mourn her. It is also unfortunate that the country is yet to establish those who killed Dele Giwa. Our hearths go to the family because it will bring back the memory of this great son of our land; he was a fearless, not just writer but a progressive developer of young minds and we still miss him. May her gentle soul rest in peace."

Load-Date: January 9, 2013

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa and the Dilemma of a Journalist

This Day (Lagos)

October 19, 2013

Copyright 2013 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1839 words

Body

---

Fellow Nigerians, today is not one of my happiest days. I'm sorry to start on such a depressing note. But that is the way I usually feel on every October 19, since 1986, when one of Nigeria's finest journalists of all time, Dele Giwa, was blasted into smithereens, by God-knows-who. Dele Giwa and I were brothers who never met, but had our paths steeped in similar upbringing. We were both born in the ancient city of Ile-Ife. Our parents migrated from the old Mid-Western region, now Edo State and settled in Ile-Ife to engage in odd jobs. Though we never met one on one Dele loomed larger than life and we all knew him like the man next door. I studied his life like a textbook, followed his world trajectory, and fantasised regularly about meeting him some day. The other man who had such magnificent effect on me is the one and only Sonala Olumhense who I was privileged to meet and who later gave me the honour of contributing to the birth of Ovation International in London in our exile days.

My God, those gentlemen had such rare gift of the pen. While Dele Giwa was very bubbly and swashbuckling, Sonala was ostensibly reserved and unquestionably cherubic. Dele Giwa was always going to stand out in the crowd. He gave journalism in Nigeria a lease and its practitioners a life. He challenged the stereotype that journalists were poor and scruffy by appearing most of his life like your High Street Banker. Just as Dele was loved by those who idolised him, he was feared by men of power for his ability to expose their foibles and egocentricities in his indomitable style. It was an influential position that made him susceptible to love and hate in almost equal measure. The life of a successful journalist is usually a delicate balance of standing between friends and enemies. And only a thin line separates the two. One negative article is just enough to obliterate 99 positive ones. No one ever remembers to thank you when you write that beautiful story but everyone remember to curse you and your family when you write that one that seems unpalatable.

That is what I call the dilemma of a journalist. My guess is as good as yours. Dele Giwa must have stepped on very powerful but sore toes who felt uncomfortable about his temerity to take on a system that made him who he was. The nation had not attained such level of tolerance to understand the job of a journalist was to write about friends and foes alike. There was always a channel of communication available to the aggrieved. The law courts are essentially there to serve as arbiter and secure rectitude for the victim of yellow journalism in any event.

The problem was not just that Dele died it was the manner of his death. For years, I carried the gory spectre of that bizarre murder in my memory. According to reports at the time, a parcel bomb was delivered at his Ikeja, Lagos home, somewhere off Adeniyi-Jones, in the presence of another accomplished journalist, Kayode Soyinka, now the Publisher of Africa Today. He was luckier to escape with not more than his damaged ear-drums as well as an indefinite sojourn in exile. Dele wasn't that fortunate. He bled to death and his family comprising of an aged mother, relations, wife and children were thrown into perpetual mourning. The whole country was engulfed in utter shock while the outside world marvelled at our ability to settle scores in the most deadly manner under the flimsiest provocation.

Dele Giwa and the Dilemma of a Journalist

At the time of his death, Dele Giwa was the Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine and easily the most celebrated journalist of that period. His former wife, Florence Ita-Giwa, recently told me she fell in love with Dele because of his effervescent style of writing. By the time they met there was no protocol because she was already head-over-heels in love with awesome diction and rhapsodies. They became inseparable from that moment on. Dele was such a debonair writer who brought a lot of razzmatazz into the media industry. He was young, dashing and daring. He was a power-dresser, a fashion icon but above all an intelligent, inspiring writer and analyst.

Dele Giwa's column, Parallax Snaps, was a must read for guys of my generation. It was impossible not to be attracted to the writings of Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed, the powerful quartet that founded Newswatch magazine around 1984, shortly after their dramatic exit from Concord newspapers. These were the authentic superstars who titillated us with beautiful prose that dripped with poetic and colourful words. And they lived up to their billing. Newswatch was an instant success and the hottest cake out of the oven. Every issue was a collector's item. It is hoped that under the new management, that glory would be restored no matter how daunting.

I had followed Dele Giwa in particular like a true devotee. He was a pen-god who was worshipped at the altar of investigative journalism, and admired irreverently by the high and mighty and the low and meek. His pen was mighty; in fact, mightier than the sword. He was considered a proponent of fairness and justice in governance. Newswatch was a reader's delight any day. Every week, the magazine went behind the scene to bring us hidden stories that were buried beyond our prying eyes. Newswatch did not just tell stories, its daredevil reporters told it in elegant style. The team was simply awesome: Nosa Igiebor, Dele Omotunde, Onome Osifo-Whiskey, Dare Babarinsa, Dele Olojede, Kola Ilori, May Ellen-Ezekiel and other journalism greats. Kayode Soyinka reported majestically from London. I will never forget his amazing scoops on the Umaru Dikko saga during the Buhari-Idiagbon military era.

Everything was going well for Newswatch, or so it seemed. The dream of the founding fathers of the magazine evaporated one hot afternoon as the powerhouse of the organisation was inflicted with the most iniquitous brutishness ever experienced in our vengeful society. Neither the exact motives nor the particular identity of the perpetrators has ever come to light. At the very best, all we got were conspiracy theories and circumstantial evidence but there was nothing conclusive till this day. A private prosecutor, Gani Fawehinmi, who took it upon himself to unravel the mystery and jigsaw, met brick-walls at every turn. The labyrinth of esoteric cases he filed at different junctures died with Gani without recording any major success or victory.

One could easily have concluded that such a dastardly act occurred because we were living at that time under the jackboots of the military who knew no other way to persuade its critics than shutting up their mouths through cold blooded murder. Its microphone was the gun-nose and the loudspeaker was the barrel. The military knew no other way to offer superior logic and simply did not bother. And we all prayed and hoped that the evil cup would pass over us. Unfortunately, not much has changed.

Even in the democratic dispensation that we have supposedly enjoyed these past 15 years or so the curse of unsolved extra-judicial cold-blooded murders of our critics and activists continues unabated.

More journalists have lost their lives in the line of duty under the civilian dispensation in our strange country. The list is painfully long enough. The politicians and their cronies are getting more and more intolerant. Power has become a matter of life and death. I doubt if that was the purpose of fighting for democracy. What I find sadder is that there is a new crop of young people who are being brainwashed and indoctrinated by desperate politicians to cause mayhem and confusion all over the place. It has become almost impossible to have decent conversation and cerebral debates without resorting to vulgarities and vitriolic attacks. This trend can't continue. If it does, it will certainly portend great dangers for the future of our nation and has the likelihood and potential of descending us all into anarchy.

Dele Giwa and the Dilemma of a Journalist

As we remember Dele Giwa today, let's try to have sober reflections and reach the decision that all disagreements of whatever ilk can be resolved through peaceful, gentlemanly means.

Of Tony Uranta And His Tricksters

I stumbled on an interesting post on Facebook the other day. It was a link to an outburst that was credited to a Niger Delta activist and ally of our dear President, Tony Ipriye Uranta. I was shocked to read his unequivocal indictment of President Goodluck Jonathan who he accused of surrounding himself with a kitchen cabinet that was incapable of helping him to deliver on his promises to the good people of Nigeria. He described those cabinet members as nothing but rogues and tricksters.

We must thank God for bountiful mercies. I don't know what sparked Tony's anger but it must have been a result of acute frustration about the way the ship of State was floundering aimlessly with the country almost bleeding to death. The manner public officers are splashing scarce resources on luxury items as if all there is to being in power is to indulge in reckless fun should be a cause for concern.

There is nothing new in what Tony said. The only surprise is that he spoke in the way he did. He merely gave fillip to what we've always known and written about. It is reassuring that someone close to the seat of power could be that bold as to tell it as it is. If an outsider had uttered those words, the world won't hear the last of it. Accusations and allegations about the writer's motive rather than a robust critique of the substance and the presentation of a veritable defence on behalf of the Presidency would have been the order of the day from the President's stalwarts. Fortunately, this is coming from a close friend of theirs. They can't in good conscience accuse Tony of working for some disgruntled Governors or opposition parties. Although, in retrospect, I won't be surprised if they do, especially if there has been a parting of ways.

I know it will not go down well with some of Tony's friends who continue to behave as if there is no tomorrow. I pray the President would heed Tony's candid advice and appreciate the fact that it is only those who love him genuinely that would tell him what others are shying away from saying. The sum total of the rising cries of patriots is that our nation is in a bad shape and the President's policies are now working or even helping. It is about time that the President reviews not only the positions of those he has entrusted with assisting him in managing the affairs of state but also the principles and policies that his government is implementing. The groans, pain and anger of our people has become incessant and is fast rising to a crescendo. Something must be done before something gives. The President must understand that when the chips are down, the soldiers of fortune will move on effortlessly to other suitors. He will be left stranded in the sea and will be left to drown like a lonely sailor whose ship has sunk without any life rafts or vests.

We have seen it all before. We pray not to see it again for President Jonathan's sake.

Load-Date: October 21, 2013

---

End of Document

'How Govt Can Unmask Dele Giwa's Killers'

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 20, 2016

Copyright 2016 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 608 words

Byline: Charles Kumolu and David Okpe

Body

---

The thirtieth anniversary of the assassination of the founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, Mr. Dele Giwa provided an opportunity for Nigerians to urge the Federal Government to declassify the outcome of the various investigations into the matter, noting that doing so would easily unmask those behind the gruesome murder.

It was also an avenue to demand that the case be included among those to be reinvestigated in line with a recent directive by President Muhammadu Buhari for the re-opening of all unresolved high-profile assassinations in Nigeria.

At the event, which was convened, yesterday in Lagos, by the Lagos State chapter of the Nigeria Union of Journalists, NUJ, attendees unanimously said unravelling Giwa's killers would not be a challenge considering the availability of reports on the issue especially the position of Oputa Panel on human rights violations.

Those at the forum, entitled: 'Safety of Journalists and the Culture of Impunity in Africa', include the Lagos State governor, Mr. Akinwumi Ambode, who was represented by the Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Information and Strategy, Mr. Fola Adeyemi; Lagos State Police Commissioner, Mr. Fatai Owoseni; House of Representatives member, Mr. Sani Zoro; President, Nigerian Guild of Editors, NGE, Mrs. Funke Egbemode; General Manager/Editor-in-Chief of Vanguard Newspapers, Mr. Gbenga Adefaye; human rights lawyer, Mr. Femi Falana, SAN, who was represented by Mr. Malachy Ugwumadu and co-founders of Newswatch Magazine, Messrs. Ray Ekpu, Yakubu Mohammed and Dan Agbese.

Others are Mr. Dare Babarinisa; Second Vice President of Nigerian Bar Association, NBA, Mr. Monday Ubani; President of Tell Communications, Mr. Nosa Igiebor; Executive Secretary of Dele Giwa Foundation, Mr. Richard Akinnola; Deputy Managing Director of Thisday Newspapers, Mr. Kayode Komolafe; Managing Director/Editor-in-Chief of The Sun Newspapers, Mr. Eric Osagie; wife of the deceased, Mrs. Funmi Giwa; daughter of the deceased, Miss Aisha Giwa and a younger brother of the late journalist, Mr. Tunde Giwa, among others.

Falana tasks media

In his remarks, Falana, who was the guest speaker, urged journalists to keep the issue on the front burner to enable the police unmask those behind the act which happened on October 19, 1986.

Dele's death touched our family -- Brother

'How Govt Can Unmask Dele Giwa's Killers'

On his part, Dele Giwa's younger brother, Tunde Giwa, said: "It is my belief that keeping his memory alive in this manner would keep the issue alive. That is why we came up with the Dele Giwa Foundation. I have to thank Funmi, she is the only one I know as Dele Giwa's wife. The death of Dele Giwa touched our family in a negative way because he was the only one we had."

"I want to beg the media not to let the death go like that. We still want justice to be done because we all know the person responsible. I can even mention the person's name. Gani Fawehimi told me that even if it will take 50 years, we must ensure the killer is brought to book."

FG should reopen case--Ekpu

On his part, Ekpu said: "We issued a statement indicating that the government should reopen the investigation into the case. We stand by our position. All of us here are collective widows, it is not just Funmi and Dele's brothers who were made widows by that dastardly act of 30 years ago. The perpetrators thought the issue would be quickly done and forgotten but it was quickly done but has not been forgotten. Books have been written on it, positions have been taken, we must not forget that a lot of Nigerians have been killed and the killers have not been brought to justice. That is why we must ensure that the killers are brought to book."

Load-Date: October 20, 2016

---

End of Document

Remembering Dele Giwa [opinion]

Leadership (Abuja)

October 13, 2010 Wednesday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1092 words

Byline: Kunle Somorin

Body

---

'All men's souls are immortal, but the souls of the righteous are immortal and divine' - Socrates

Numbed by the twin-explosion near Eagle Square on Independence Day, Nigerians seem to have forgotten that the seed of dastardly bombings was sown 24 years ago. By Tuesday, it will be exactly 24 years when Prof. Wole Soyinka will say, the euphoria of the Nobel Prize, which he won that year, was turned into ashes in our mouths! That day, a substantial part of the house that bore number 25 Talabi Street in Ikeja, was shattered and charred by a bomb explosion. A television set, louvres, chairs, a table, breakfast set, which he was having with his visiting colleague, Kayode Soyinka, and other domestic appurtenances, were blown apart and burnt. His body was mangled and his handsomeness seemed faded for the few hours he spent at the First Foundation Hospital, Opebi, where he eventually gave up the ghost.

That was the end for Nigeria's most celebrated journalist and investigative reporter, Sunmonu Oladele Giwa, style-named Dele Giwa. Giwa had waded through the drudgery of being a washer-man's son at Ile-Ife. Although, he was originally from Ugbekpe-Ukeperi in Edo State, Dele equipped himself intellectually at home and especially abroad, made his mark at New York Times before heading home an accomplished journalist. His sartorial elegance, cerebral capacity and ambition meant he had consigned poverty to the past. His professional sons, Dele Olojede and Onukuba Adinoyi-Ojo, award winning journalists who are purveyors of the Dele Giwa legacy in a riveting biography, contend that Dele Giwa was born to run.

The children of Dele Giwa's brand of journalism are everywhere. Every decent journalist would want to live, not die like dele Giwa. The league of those journalist-writers of his school of thought keeps increasing. Those who killed Dele Giwa could not kill his essence, his soul. He lives on. His killers must be some cowardly but powerful elements who have 24 years on succeeded in 'covering' their tracks.

In his last days, he got ensconced in the circles of the nobles - men and women of power, some of honour and mostly, the intelligentsia. The best trees don't last in the forest. Giwa was only 39 when the agents of hell, sneaked in to snuff life out of the man bristling with fantastic prose and gift of investigative report. Many believe he was above peers in preaching the message of more abundant opportunities for the down-trodden. For one man who was at home having a late breakfast with a colleague when a postman brought a parcel addressed to him, we all are now captive to these Armageddon apostles. The parcel was delivered to his eldest son, Billy (then 19 years old and a student at the University of Jos). Billy handed the parcel over to his father. The latter looked the parcel over and commented: "this must be from the president", because it bore the insignia of the President of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

Remembering Dele Giwa [opinion]

Two men in a Peugeot car had delivered the instrument of the man's annihilation at his home. He had allegedly received threats from state agents and had been their guest in the previous week. He was accused of gun-running among other 'subversive' offences. As a reporter of prodigious intellect, he had engaged many issues as these issues equally engaged the country and her people. His contacts, which should be a journalist's delight any day, and which on a good day, would have served him in good stead, were his undoing. Three court cases and several inquisitions after 1986 have not conclusively linked anybody fingered by his lawyer, even circumstantially, with his murder.

What followed the delivery of the letter was a sustained agonising refrain: "they have got me!" He shouted as the parcel bomb landed on his laps. Reeling in pains was the eclectic. Giwa died and the nation mourns, up till this day. His dastardly murder has neither been avenged nor the mystery of it unearthed. It was the first of its kind in the nation's history and all the accused have maintained innocence. The pervasive 'born AGAINISM' has not pricked one person's conscience to own up to the dastardly act.

Today, Giwa's business associates have had a chill cast 'on their journalistic odyssey'. The Newswatch they co-founded and which peaked at 150,000 circulation figure has become a recluse of its vibrant self. Professionals who understudied Giwa have come up with replicas of the magazine and are doing better in line of practice. Dan Agbese, another thorough-bred founding director of Newswatch disclosed in a tribute, quarter of a century after Giwa's death, upon reflection of the circumstances and aftermath of his demise: 'we were tempted to wallow in self-pity...'

The enchanting prose stylist and author of Paralax Snaps made a statement in life and in death. He used journalism for social reformation and changed the face of the reporter. It is one record that Dele Giwa and his team drummed into the ears of the bourgeoisies that the labourer deserves his wages. They bargained for and got good remunerations for hardwork. They became Benzyl-journalists without recourse to brown-enveloping. Journalists were never so well treated before then. He did that for the profession.

Unfortunately, the most vociferous of Giwa's backers, the delectable Lagos lawyer, the late Gani Fawehinmi, tried in vain to ensure that a just denouncement was brought into the case, but the principle of 'collateral estoppel' or 'issue preclusion' - a legal jargon which '...preclude(s) relitigation' stopped him, even after the Oputa Panel allowed him to re-open the case when democracy returned to the country after the military years of locust.

All the evidences he gathered had been adjudged 'hearsay' by the regular courts. That is the law of the land. We are consoled that those who thwarted efforts at getting an independent or international inquisition done are still very much around. Some even ridiculously urged that his visitor on the fateful day, Kayode Soyinka be tried since he came in from the United Kingdom where such lethal weapon could have been manufactured. It is all human logic and if that will bring the perpetrators to book, why not?

The courts gave judgements and we are bound to live with them as civilised people. But the death of Giwa and the endless list of unresolved murders and resurgence of violence are pointers to the fact that Dele Giwa was, indeed, a historic figure. The judgement of God is immutable and not subject to arm-twisting or legalese as it obtains in our world. We shall all get there.

Load-Date: October 14, 2010

I won't rest until Bakassi people are properly resettled - Ita-Giwa

The Nation (Nigeria)

February 19, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 275 words

Body

---

Former presidential adviser, Senator Florence Ita-Giwa, says she will not rest until the displaced people of Bakassi local government area in Cross River State are properly resettled.

Ita-Giwa, who marked her 75th birthday on Friday, said this was the main reason she was still active on the political scene at her age.

'I am still fighting for my people. We are Nigerians who were suddenly displaced out of no fault of ours. We didn't ask to be ceded. Our ancestral home was just ceded without any consultation and for many years now we have been crying. This is a fight so I would never give up on until proper resettlement is achieved,' she told The Nation on Friday.

Popularly known as Mama Bakassi, Ita-Giwa has been unrelenting in her effort to ensure justice and proper resettlement for the people of Bakassi, who were displaced following the ceding of their land to Cameroon.

She was born in 1946 in Cross River State. Her mother, Beatrice Bassey-Ita was a journalist, who worked for The Guardian Nigeria Newspaper and The West African Pilot.

She was married to the late Dele Giwa, a foremost journalist and the founding editor of Newswatch magazine, who was unfortunately killed in 1986 with a parcel bomb.

She has, among other efforts, organized prestigious media awards aimed at improving the journalism profession.

As part of her many philanthropic efforts, she runs the Bakassi Children Foundation which caters to the needs, including the education, of Bakassi children.

Ita-Giwa has worked against human trafficking and sex slavery.

She has among others, been awarded Officer of the Order of the Niger (OON) and The Sun Lifetime Achievement Award.

I won't rest until Bakassi people are properly resettled - Ita-Giwa

Load-Date: February 20, 2021

---

End of Document

Sunday Igboho declines IGP's invitation via letter

The Nation (Nigeria)

April 3, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 552 words

Body

---

Barely a month after a dramatic attempt to arrest the self-acclaimed Yoruba activist, Chief Sunday Adeyemo, a.k.a. Sunday Igboho, by security operatives along the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway suffered a setback, the activist again rebuffed an invitation for questioning by the Inspector General of Police, Mohammed Adamu, on Thursday.

The letter was sent to the activist through a foremost courier firm, DHL. However, it was rejected by the aides of Igboho.

The invitation came a few weeks after Igboho declared and launched the 'Yoruba Nation' campaign, claiming that Southwest states are independent of Nigeria.

Giving reasons for rejecting the invitation letter and the police team that visited his residence, Igboho, who spoke through his media aide, Olayomi Koiki, cited safety reasons.

He explained that the invitation letter and the police team were not received because a lethal letter was responsible for the death of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, at his Ikeja residence in Lagos in 1986.

Olayomi said: 'We would like to tell the international communities and every Nigerian that this morning, 1st of April, 2021, a letter was sent via DHL to Chief Sunday Igboho but the letter was not received by his security operatives.'

'Later around 3 pm of the same day, a team of about six men without uniform arrived in a Corolla car and another nine were in police uniform but all were identified as police officers.'

'They wanted to see Chief Sunday Igboho with a letter said to have been addressed to him by the Inspector General of Police. Again, the letter was not received by Chief Sunday's (Igboho's) security team.'

'Chief Sunday would like to know why a letter was sent to him and for what purpose.'

'If the IG of police wants to invite him, we would like him to first send the same letter to all the bandits and Boko Haram members killing our mothers and farmers and those kidnapping them.'

Sunday Igboho declines IGP's invitation via letter

'Since the IG of police wants to invite him, he should make a public statement addressed to Chief Sunday Igboho.

'We should all remember how letters had been sent to previous Yoruba sons like the late Dele Giwa.'

A team reportedly comprising policemen, soldiers and others had in February failed in their attempt to arrest Igboho on the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway.

In a related development, former Aviation Minister Femi Fani-Kayode has cautioned President Buhari-led administration against purported plot to arrest or detain Igboho.

Fani-Kayode gave the warning yesterday in an open letter to the federal government.

He said that Igboho's agitation for the Oduduwa Republic should not warrant any plot to arrest, detain or eliminate him.

He warned that such arrest would be against the peace and stability of the country.

The letter read in part: "I will say this just once. The biggest threat to the peace and stability of Nigeria today is the plan by some hardliners in the Buhari regime to kill, arrest or detain my friend and brother Chief Sunday Adeyemo (aka Sunday Igboho).

'Arresting, detaining or killing this man will be the biggest mistake that the Buhari Govt. can make.

'I say this because firstly, as far as I am aware, he has not broken any law and secondly because he represents the thoughts and aspirations of over 70 million Yoruba people.

'To every single one of those people, he is the greatest hero of the SW since Oduduwa.'

Load-Date: April 5, 2021

---

End of Document

Eminent journalist Ray Ekpu at 75

The Nation (Nigeria)

August 8, 2023 Tuesday

Copyright 2023 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1294 words

Body

---

Ray Ekpu is the reason I'm a journalist. I don't think that tribute captures the truth of what Ray actually means to me! Let me try again. A near adequate tribute is that Ray is why I'm still struggling with the craft of writing, in the hope that one day I would be close to the gold standard in modern magazine and feature writing, where Ray currently leads the pack and belongs in the same pantheon of gods with Stanley Macebuh, Dele Giwa, Sonala Olumhense, Muhammed Haruna, Niyi Osundare, Sam Omatseye and a few other select prose virtuosos.

For me as a young man there was nothing else that held out the kind of irresistible spell like what Ray was doing. I made up my mind early that I would rather end up as a root crop farmer in my rustic village of Ikot Akpan Ebo in Uruk Otong of Adat Ifang clan in Ukanafun local council area if I could not be a journalist like Ray. Ray had made journalism look like the best job in the world, and the journalist as a magician, a guy who could walk on water by his sheer prose power. The man had loomed so large in my impressionable imagination that I actually didn't believe he was anything other than a fairy tale, until the day I saw him in person when he came to visit his senior brother, Okoro (of blessed memory), who lived next door. From my guardian's home I peeked at Ray's huge dark frame and was convinced that he was not a fable, and I reasoned that since he was human, just maybe one day I could learn to write well, if not as well as he did.

Ray was an obsession for me back in the day as a high school student. His writing was the best of verdant prose, earthy and full of quotable quotes. His column every Monday in The Nigerian Chronicle was a keepsake. And it was still so, perhaps with more poignancy, when he moved to Lagos where he continued to delight with sonic prose, and rhythmic free verse in the Sunday Times and the National Concord . Ray does not just write for the eye, he writes for the ear as well. He writes to be read; he writes for pleasure reading!

Some of the entries in his column were so vintage Ray that they were unforgettable. I remember, for instance, 'The Snobbish Sage Called Senghor,' an alliterative head for a prosaic delight meant to answer for an alleged snob handed to Nigeria's military head of state Olusegun Obasanjo by the then Senegalese president, Leopold Sedar Senghor, during Obasanjo's visit to Dakar. I also remember 'A Trip to Golgotha,' a pen portrait of the anguish and tribulation that the Newswatch family endured when the magazine was proscribed for six months by the Babangida junta. I equally remember 'Tai,' a tribute at the passing of the legendary Tai Solarin.

Eminent journalist Ray Ekpu at 75

My affair with Ray as a prose stylist has been a lifelong romance. My final year project in the university-for which I received the maximum point-was a study of Ray's writing, along with that of another legend, Olatunji Dare, now emeritus professor at Bradley University in the US.

Ray has enriched Nigerian journalism with catch phrases that have become the currency of common expression in the popular press. I remember him writing 'where words fail, fist prevails,' a sampler of his pitch for the ear; a phrase that I have adapted for use in one of my poems. I also remember his 'philosophical calmness,' a phrase he used to capture the equanimity with which he bore his vicissitude at the Daily Times .

To use a cliché, Ray has a gift of the gab. He simply makes words behave for him. He is indeed one of the noblest high priests of journalism that the nation is blessed with.

If professional skills have made Ray a living legend, his personality has projected him as a gentleman. Ray is humble. He is a chief priest with a common touch. No airs of prominence about him! I remember the days I struggled in vain with him both at the Ikeja airport and the Ministry of Niger Delta Affairs to help him carry his handbag. On the occasions that I visited him at home in Lagos, Ray served me by himself, clothing me in improbable robes as a VIP guest. Ray reminds me of Dr Ime Umanah (of blessed memory), who was also an epitome of humility, and would personally serve his guests at his Ikoyi home on Bourdillon Road, Lagos. Dr Umanah was at a time the chairman of Newswatch where at the time Ray served as the chief executive of the newspaper. Were the two humble sons of Akwa Ibom brought together by the compatibility of personality types? I think the holy bible seemed to have answered that question 2000 odd years ago: Two cannot work together unless they agree (Amos 3:3).

Ray is generous-with his time and other resources. When I co-founded ProData Limited, a communication company that's engaged in media consultancy, reputation management and provision of market intelligence for paying clients, we needed a powerful brand to chair the board of the company. We did a mental tour of names and settled on Ray, with an outside chance that he would accept to carry our start-up on his sturdy shoulders.

I was assigned the job of contacting Ray for a meeting to broach the request. I put a call through to him and he gave me an appointment. At his home in Ogudu GRA, Lagos, Ray was as personable, as affable as ever. I told him of the request directors of our company asked me to deliver to him. After a meticulous scrutiny and review of our paperwork, Ray agreed to be our chairman. It was a benevolence we have cherished till this day-a five-star international journalist chairing the board of our start-up at that time!

Ray is perhaps the best soft-spoken conversationalist around. When you're engaged with Ray, his scalpel-sharp wit and intellect shows through. And also his learning! I understand that just as Wole Soyinka, Ray reads like a magpie. Soyinka once told an interviewer that he reads everything and anything except mathematics.

Besides reading, the Ray essence is mediated by global influences that have percolated through his pores from international travels. Ray has visited more than 50 countries. His urbane personality and international outlook are forged by both a voracious reading habit and the experiences he has had from other civilisations around the world.

After making a roaring success of the road he had taken as a journalist, earning wages from employers for his work, Ray, along with his friends-Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed and Dan Agbese, Nigeria's Journalism Quartet-decided to move upstairs as an employer of labour. He co-founded Newswatch , a trenchant newsmagazine that soon earned unrivalled industry reputation for investigative journalism and inimitable writing. The Quartet was following in the footsteps of John Payne Jackson, Horatio Agedah, Nnamdi Azikiwe, Sam Amuka Pemu, all of them journalists who at some points in their careers decided to be publishers by founding their own newspapers.

Thus, during his career Ray has been a guru in both the newsroom and the boardroom. When the scorecard is drawn of Ray as a businessman and as a journalist, in which part of his duality would he be adjudged an out and out five-star general? The jury is still out, but I would be surprised if Ray the journalist would not do better than Ray the businessman.

Eminent journalist Ray Ekpu at 75

The honours Ray has received from home and abroad are well-earned. He has impacted the lives of many through his writing and outreach. Last year he did a yeoman's job to promote the existence and activities of Uyo Book Club, of which he holds a diamond membership.

For Raymond Amos Ekpu, it has been 75 years of impact and relevance. It's my pleasure and delight therefore to join his family and friends to wish him happy birthday anniversary celebrations. I look forward to many more birthday celebrations in good health and social wellbeing for Ray, our Ray of luminous, crunchy and relevant journalism.

Load-Date: August 9, 2023

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa - 25 Years of Fruitless Search for Killers

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 19, 2011 Wednesday

Copyright 2011 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 939 words

Body

---

TODAY marks exactly 25 years that iconic journalist and one of the founders of Newswatch magazine, Dele Giwa was parceled out of existence through a parcel bomb, the first of its kind in the history of the country.

Today also marks 25 years of a fruitless search for the mastermind and executors of the deadly deed. In the last two and a half decades, an avalanche of assassinations had followed on the heels of Giwa's murder and each of them, like Giwa's, have remained unresolved raising concerns on the safety of lives and property in the country.

Dele Giwa's murder was like what one saw on high profile movies.

The officer who led the government's investigation of the murder, Alhaji Abubakar Tsav, a senior Police officer now retired submitted a signed statement to the Oputa Panel in July, 2001, detailing how the assassination was carried out.

According to him, "On 19th October, 1986 at about 11am two men drove a white Peugeot 504 saloon car with unidentified registration number to No 25, Talabi Street, Ikeja, the residence of Giwa. One of the men wore black French suit while the second wore white long sleeve French suit.

Dele Giwa's watchman Mallam Musa Ladan was away to the market but left the security of his Master's residence to his neighbor, Mallam Musa Zibo. The man with the white French suit alighted from the car and gave Mallam Zibo a padded brown envelope for delivery to Dele Giwa having confirmed from Zibo that Dele Giwa was in.

They immediately drove off without waiting to confirm that the parcel had reached the addressee. The unsuspecting Musa Zibo collected the parcel and pressed the doorbell to Dele Giwa's residence. "In response thereof, Billy Giwa, the deceased's son opened the door and collected the parcel for his father.

According to Billy Giwa, the brown envelope was heavy and had a white sticker on which Dele Giwa's name and address were written. It was marked 'Secret and Confidential' with a warning that it should only be opened by the addressee.

The sticker also had the Nigerian Coat of Arms with the inscription 'From the office of the C-in-C.' Billy Giwa said he... handed over the parcel to his father who was in the study with Kayode Soyinka, the London Bureau Chief of the (Newswatch) Magazine.

Dele Giwa - 25 Years of Fruitless Search for Killers

He retired to the sitting room to join his stepmother Mrs. Funmi Giwa. A few minutes later, he heard an explosion. They rushed to the scene and found the study engulfed in smoke and fire while his father sustained fatal injuries.

With the assistance of sympathizers, they rushed his father to First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja where he later died." With his death, the stage was set for a search for the killers with a section of the polity especially the human right community fingering a former military ruler.

The Police investigated the matter without uncovering the culprits. With the return of civil rule, the matter was taken to the Justice Chukwudifu Oputa-led rights violation investigation panel in 2001, where Tsav tendered the above statements and still no name was pinned down to the murder.

Born on 16 March 16 1947 to a poor family working in the palace of Oba Adesoji Aderemi, the Ooni of Ife, Dele Giwa attended local Authority Modern School in Lagere, Ile-Ife. When his father moved to Oduduwa College, Ile-Ife as a washer man, he gained admission to that school.

Dele Giwa traveled to the USA for his higher education. After his studies and robust journalism career at the defunct Concord Newspapers owned by late business mogul and politician, Chief M.K.O Abiola, the late Dele Giwa and fellow journalists - Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed founded Newswatch in 1984 with the first edition distributed on January 28, 1985.

Having led a move that revolutionised magazine publication in the country, Dele Giwa's murder shook the polity especially the media and human rights community. And so, 25 years after, the recurring question has remained: Who killed Dele Giwa?

Failure to resolve Dele Giwa's murder and successfully prosecute the perpetrators seem to have paved the way for the commission of more atrocious killings.

And now journalists are gradually becoming endangered species. The lengthening list of unresolved murders include: Bagauda Kaltho, Sunday Gyang Bwede (The Light Bearer April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State, Nathan S. Dabak (The Light Bearer, April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State), Bayo Ohu (The Guardian, September 20, 2009, in Lagos), Samson Boyi, (The Scope November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State), Sam Nimfa-Jan (Details May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan), Fidelis Ikuebe (Freelancer, April 18, 1999, Anambra), Okezie Amaruben (Newsservice September 2, 1998, in Enugu) and Tunde Oladepo, The Guardian February 26, 1998, Abeokuta).

Others include Edo Sule Ugbagwu (The Nation, April 24, 2010, Lagos), Ephraim Audu (Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, October 16, 2008, Lafia), Paul Aboyomi Ogundesi (ThisDay, August 16, 2008, Dopemu, Lagos), Godwin Agbroko (ThisDay December 22, 2006, Lagos), Bolade Fasasi (National Association of Women Journalists, March 31, 1999, Ibadan), Chinedu Offoaro (The Guardian, May 1, 1996 and Baguda Kaltho (TheNEWS March 1, 1996).

Other unresolved murders Apart from journalists, countless others including politicians have suffered similar fate. Among those gunned down were former Justice Minister and Attorney General of the Federation, Chief Bola Ige, Engr Funsho Williams, Chief Alfred Rewane, Alhaja Kudirat Abiola, Dr Harry Marshal, Chief Aminosoari Dikibo, Ogbonnaya Uche, Dipo Dina, Eyo Eyo, Mr and Mrs Barnabas Igwe, Lateef Olaniyan, Bala Mai Haile, Toyin Onagoruwa, Sunday Ugwu and Chief Layi Balogun among others.

Load-Date: October 19, 2011

HATS OFF TO UNCLE RAY

This Day

August 11, 2023 Friday

Copyright 2023 THISDAY NEWSPAPERS LTD. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1253 words

Body

---

ETIM ETIM pays tribute to renowned Journalist Ray Ekpu at 75

One of Nigeria's most respected journalists and elder statesmen, Raymond Amos Ekpu, clocked 75, August 6, and I am particularly pleased to send him and his family my felicitations and best wishes. Uncle Ray, as I call him fondly, has been one of my role models for decades. Nationally, he has strong name recognition, and in Akwa Ibom, his home state, he has become a household name and a folk hero. We all grew up reading his articles in The Calabar-based Nigerian Chronicle, a government-owned newspaper, founded in 1971 as a weekly, but became daily the following year. Mr. Moses Ekpo, the immediate past Deputy Governor of Akwa Ibom State, was its first editor. For us in journalism, Uncle Ray has been as an inspiration, exemplar and standard bearer.

I saw Uncle Ray last in March 2021 at a public function in Port Harcourt. He looked radiant and well. It is gratifying that he's been keeping well since then despite a recent health scare. May Almighty God continue to keep him in good health. Ekpu has had a distinguished career and held almost every conceivable responsibility and position in journalism since his first job as staff writer/reporter in 1974 at the The Nigerian Chronicle. The paper was one of the influential state-owned newspapers in those days that trained some of the best journalists we have today. Others were The Nigerian Observer in Benin; The Renaissance (later renamed Daily Star) in Enugu; The Tide in Port Harcourt; The Statesman in Owerri; The Herald in Ilorin and Daily Sketch in Ibadan. New Nigerian in Kaduna and Daily Times in Lagos, owned by the federal government, circulated nationally. These were all my regular readings every morning as a secondary schoolboy in the 1970s and they shaped my understanding of public affairs and interest in writing. My school library and the public library in Uyo had regular supplies of these newspapers. What are our kids reading now?

In 1977, Ekpu was promoted editor of The Chronicle after passing a competitive examination conducted by the late Prince Tony Momoh who was then the editor of Daily Times. Momoh was brought by the management of Cross River State Newspaper Corporation, publishers of The Chronicle, to help in conducting the selection process. The GM of the newspaper was Chief Efiong Essien, whom I later met at The Guardian when I joined as a reporter in 1988. He was then a member of its Editorial Board. It was from The Chronicle that Ekpu was hired in 1980 to be the editor of Sunday Times, the largest-circulating weekly newspaper in those days. It was a must read for every person in business, government and academia. He joined the Concord Group, owned by the late MKO Abiola, in 1982 as member of the Editorial Board of National Concord, the daily newspaper in the stable. But it was in 1984 when he co-founded Newswatch magazine that the world came to appreciate his quintessence. The first edition of the magazine was published in January 1985.

HATS OFF TO UNCLE RAY

Born on August 6, 1948, in Ikot Udo Ossiom village in Ukanafun LGA in today's Akwa Ibom State, Ekpu is a recipient of several honours and awards, including International Editor of the Year (1987); Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award (2018) and Lifetime Achievement Award by Vanguard newspapers. A former President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria (NPAN), Ekpu had also served as Chairman, Editorial Board, Concord Newspapers before partnering with the late Dele Giwa, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed to establish Newswatch in 1985.

He was also the President of Commonwealth Journalists Association in the 1990s, and has just been named its President Emeritus in recognition of his contributions to the association. The Nation newspaper of Kenya also honoured Ekpu with Lifetime Achievement Award during its 50th anniversary celebration in 2013. The Department of Mass Communication of Akwa Ibom State Polytechnic, Ikot Osura, Ikot Ekpene, has celebrated him by naming its mass communication department after him. It is now called Ray Ekpu Department of Mass Communication. Ray Ekpu is currently a columnist at The Guardian; The Sun and Daily Independent newspapers.

Life gives each person his own lemon. It is up to you to make your own lemonade. Uncle Ray has had his own share of vicissitudes practicing journalism during the dark days of military dictatorships in the country. He was detained six times in different prisons and Newswatch was shut down for over six months by the military junta. But it was the dastardly murder of his business partner and friend, Dele Giwa, through a parcel bomb on Sunday, October 19, 1986, during the IBB regime, that shook Ekpu to the core of his being. It is a shame that the military leaders of the time had not been held to account for the heinous crime.

A grandfather with three children and six grandchildren, Uncle Ray is enjoying retirement in peace and absolute gratitude to God. He spends time reading, writing and enjoying quality time at home. He loves playing with his grandchildren and watching football and boxing as well as listening to music. Ekpu is an avid reader. He enjoys reading all sorts of readable stuffs - books, magazines, columns in newspapers, including agony columns, especially the Bunmi column in the Vanguard. For him, books are repository of wisdom and knowledge. He told me recently: 'I am sure that I have up to 10,000 books and pamphlets. These include three sets of general encyclopaedia; computer science encyclopaedia and encyclopaedia of the oceans; science encyclopaedia; social science encyclopaedia and some rare books'. In his library also are about 100 pamphlet boxes where all kinds of pamphlets and leaflets are kept as reference materials.

With advanced age, Uncle Ray has modified his lifestyle. He doesn't drink any longer (cognac was his thing); doesn't take salt in his food (during the civil war when the commodity was so scarce, he used to walk some 30 kilometers to Ikot Abasi from his village to fetch and evaporate sea water to obtain it) and socializes sparingly (parities were his favourite pastime in those days). But his love for journalism, which he studied at the University of Lagos, is undying. I am pleased that Uncle Ray is writing his memoir. I love to read memoires and I'm always disappointed when a newsmaker fails to write one. Ekpu has a lot to tell and I can't wait to read it. As a whet, I asked him to reminisce about journalism of his days and compare it to what we have now. He chuckled gently: 'The practice of journalism today has been improved by advanced technology. With a smart phone you can record interviews and pictures; you can make phone calls and send text messages. Materials could be delivered to your office from long distances in no time. Research is just a click away. But there is the down side. It has made many journalists lazy because they rely on unverified stories in the social media. When this happens, they end up publishing fake stories in their traditional media which ought to be the major source of authentic stories'.

Uncle Ray has some affection for me. He took me under his wings when I joined The Guardian newspaper in January 1988 as a Finance reporter. When I came out of my own three-month detention in November 1988, he sent a reporter from his magazine to interview me. He later received me at his Ikeja home lavishly.

HATS OFF TO UNCLE RAY

Happy birthday, Uncle Ray!

Etim is a Journalist

Load-Date: August 18, 2023

---

End of Document

FG Urged to Establish Journalism School in of Honour Dele Giwa

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 20, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 407 words

Byline: Kingsley Omonobi

Body

---

Twenty nine years after he was killed by a parcel bomb, the Media Law Centre has called on the Federal Government to establish a school of Journalism in of honour of late Dele Giwa for his contribution to the nation's democracy.

The late founding Editor-In-Chief of Newswatch Magazine met his death in his home on 19 October 1986 courtesy a letter bomb which was handed over to him in his study.

The call was made yesterday in Abuja by Prof. Matthew Atobe at a capacity building seminar and public presentation of two publications by Mr. Richard Akinola, on the media to commemorate the 29th anniversary of the assassination of Dele Giwa.

The event witnessed the presentation of the books; 'the law of defamation and trial by the Media: Saraki's case in perspective' written by a pro-democracy activist and Journalist, Richad Akinnola.

Speaking on 'the contributions of investigative Journalism to national development', Prof. Atobe who is a senior partner Beacom Group, Boston, USA, paid glowing tribute to the late Journalist even as he extoled his virtues as a fearless, courageous, brave and heroic man.

He said the trace of the history of the nation's democracy cannot be complete without the contributions of Dele Giwa, his colleagues and the Newswatch Magazine they founded.

Prof. Atobe called on Nigerian Journalist to emulate his "gallantry, fearless and dauntless courage to reject and shun bad journalistic ethics and payment to compromise accurate and truthful reporting."

"In conclusion and without hesitation, I hereby suggest today that the private sector, federal and state governments should join minds together to honour Dele Giwa with the establishment of Dele Giwa School of Journalism for his contribution to democracy we are all enjoying in Nigeria today.'

In his remarks at the event, former President of Nigerian Union Journalist, Lanre Ogundigbe called on practitioners to declare a state of emergency in media as a way of uplifting the dwindling standard and ethics of the profession.

Also speaking at the occasion, incumbent President of the Nigeria Union of Journalist [NUJ], Waheed Odusile decried the lack of mentorship as a factor militating against bad journalism in the country.

FG Urged to Establish Journalism School in Honour Dele Giwa

He called for more training and exposure for not only practicing journalists, but also the gate keepers like the News Editors and Proof readers who are the last port of call before the news gets out to the public to avoid unnecessary mistakes.

Load-Date: October 20, 2015

---

End of Document

Ray is the reason I'm in journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

August 7, 2023 Monday

Copyright 2023 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1296 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

By Iboro Otongaran

Ray Ekpu is the reason I'm a journalist. I don't think that tribute captures the truth of what Ray actually means to me! Let me try again. A near adequate tribute is that Ray is why I'm still struggling with the craft of writing, in the hope that one day I would be close to the gold standard in modern magazine and feature writing, where Ray currently leads the pack and belongs in the same pantheon of gods with Stanley Macebuh, Dele Giwa, Sonala Olumhense, Muhammed Haruna, Niyi Osundare, Sam Omatseye and a few other select prose virtuosos.

For me as a young man there was nothing else that held out the kind of irresistible spell like what Ray was doing. I made up my mind early that I would rather end up as a root crop farmer in my rustic village of Ikot Akpan Ebo in Uruk Otong of Adat Ifang clan in Ukanafun local council area, if I could not be a journalist like Ray. Ray had made journalism look like the best job in the world, and the journalist as a magician, a guy who could walk on water by his sheer prose power. The man had loomed so large in my impressionable imagination that I actually didn't believe he was anything other than a fairy tale, until the day I saw him in person when he came to visit his senior brother, Okoro (of blessed memory), who lived next door. From my guardian's home I peeked at Ray's huge dark frame and was convinced that he was not a fable, and I reasoned that since he was human, just maybe one day I could learn to write well, if not as well as he did.

Ray was an obsession for me back in the day as a high school student. His writing was the best of verdant prose, earthy and full of quotable quotes. His column every Monday in The Nigerian Chronicle was a keepsake. And it was still so, perhaps with more poignancy, when he moved to Lagos where he continued to delight with sonic prose, and rhythmic free verse in the Sunday Times and the National Concord. Ray does not just write for the eye, he writes for the ear as well. He writes to be read; he writes for pleasure reading!

Ray is the reason I'm in journalism

Some of the entries in his column were so vintage Ray that they were unforgettable. I remember, for instance, "The Snobbish Sage Called Senghor," an alliterative head for a prosaic delight meant to answer for an alleged snob handed to Nigeria's military head of state Olusegun Obasanjo by the then Senegalese President, Leopold Sedar Senghor, during Obasanjo's visit to Dakar. I also remember "A Trip to Golgotha," a pen portrait of the anguish and tribulation that the Newswatch family endured when the magazine was proscribed for six months by the Babangida junta. I equally remember "Tai," a tribute at the passing of the legendary Tai Solarin.

My affair with Ray as a prose stylist has been a lifelong romance. My final-year project in the university—for which I received maximum points—was a study of Ray's writing, along with that of another legend, Olatunji Dare, now emeritus professor at Bradley University in the US.

Ray has enriched Nigerian journalism with catch phrases that have become the currency of common expression in the popular press. I remember him writing "where words fail, fist prevails," a sampler of his pitch for the ear; a phrase that I have adapted for use in one of my poems. I also remember his "philosophical calmness," a phrase he used to capture the equanimity with which he bore his vicissitudes at the Daily Times.

To use a cliché, Ray has a gift of the gab. He simply makes words behave for him. He is indeed one of the noblest high priests of journalism that the nation is blessed with.

If professional skills have made Ray a living legend, his personality has projected him as a gentleman. Ray is humble. He is a chief priest with a common touch. No airs of prominence about him! I remember the days I struggled in vain with him both at the Ikeja airport and the Ministry of Niger Delta Affairs to help him carry his handbag. On the occasions that I visited him at home in Lagos, Ray served me by himself, clothing me in improbable robes of a VIP guest. Ray reminds me of Dr. Ime Umanah (of blessed memory), who was also an epitome of humility, and would personally serve his guests at his Ikoyi home on Bourdillon Road, Lagos. Dr. Umanah was at a time the chairman of Newswatch, where at the time Ray served as the chief executive of the newspaper. Were the two humble sons of Akwa Ibom brought together by the compatibility of personality types? I think the Holy Bible seemed to have answered that question 2,000 odd years ago: Two cannot work together unless they agree (Amos 3:3).

Ray is generous—with his time and other resources. When I co-founded ProData Limited, a communication company that's engaged in media consultancy, reputation management and provision of market intelligence for paying clients, we needed a powerful brand to chair the board of the company. We did a mental tour of names and settled on Ray, with an outside chance that he would accept to carry our start-up on his sturdy shoulders.

I was assigned the job of contacting Ray for a meeting to broach the request. I put a call through to him and he gave me an appointment. At his home in Ogudu GRA, Lagos, Ray was as personable, as affable as ever. I told him of the request directors of our company asked me to deliver to him. After a meticulous scrutiny and review of our paperwork, Ray agreed to be our chairman. It was a benevolence we have cherished till this day—a five-star international journalist chairing the board of our start-up at that time!

Ray is perhaps the best soft-spoken conversationalist around. When you're engaged with Ray, his scalpel-sharp wit and intellect shows through. And also his learning! I understand that just as Wole Soyinka, Ray reads like a magpie. Soyinka once told an interviewer that he reads everything and anything except mathematics.

Besides reading, the Ray essence is mediated by global influences that have percolated through his pores from international travels. Ray has visited more than 50 countries. His urbane personality and international outlook are forged by both a voracious reading habit and the experiences he has had from other civilisations around the world.

After making a roaring success of the road he had taken as a journalist, earning wages from employers for his work, Ray, along with his friends—Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed and Dan Agbese, Nigeria's journalism quartet—decided to move upstairs as an employer of labour. He co-founded Newswatch, a trenchant newsmagazine that soon earned unrivalled industry reputation for investigative journalism and inimitable writing. The Quartet was following in the footsteps of John Payne Jackson, Horatio Agedah, Nnamdi Azikiwe and Sam Amuka-Pemu, all of them journalists who at some points in their careers decided to be publishers by founding their own newspapers.

Ray is the reason I'm in journalism

Thus, during his career, Ray has been a guru in both the newsroom and the boardroom. When the scorecard is drawn of Ray as a businessman and as a journalist, in which part of his duality would he be adjudged an out and out five-star general? The jury is still out, but I would be surprised if Ray the journalist would not do better than Ray the businessman.

The honours Ray has received from home and abroad are well-earned. He has impacted the lives of many through his writing and outreach. Last year he did a yeoman's job to promote the existence and activities of Uyo Book Club, of which he holds a diamond membership.

For Raymond Amos Ekpu, it has been 75 years of impact and relevance. It's my pleasure and delight, therefore, to join his family and friends to wish him happy birthday celebrations. I look forward to many more birthday celebrations for Ray in perfect health and material wellbeing, our Ray of luminous, crunchy and relevant journalism.

Load-Date: August 8, 2023

---

End of Document

Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism - Iboro Otongaran

Naija 247 News

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Naija 247 news Media Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1244 words

Body

---

Ray Ekpu is the reason I'm a journalist. I don't think that tribute captures the truth of what Ray actually means to me! Let me try again. A near adequate tribute is that Ray is why I'm still struggling with the craft of writing, in the hope that one day I would be close to the gold standard in modern magazine and feature writing, where Ray currently leads the pack and belongs in the same pantheon of gods with Stanley Macebuh, Dele Giwa, Sonala Olumhense, Muhammed Haruna, Niyi Osundare, Sam Omatseye and a few other select prose virtuosos.

Thank you for reading this post, don't forget to subscribe!

For me as a young man there was nothing else that held out the kind of irresistible spell like what Ray was doing. I made up my mind early that I would rather end up as a root crop farmer in my rustic village of Ikot Akpan Ebo in Uruk Otong of Adat Ifang clan in Ukanafun local council area if I could not be a journalist like Ray. Ray had made journalism look like the best job in the world, and the journalist as a magician, a guy who could walk on water by his sheer prose power.

The man had loomed so large in my impressionable imagination that I actually didn't believe he was anything other than a fairy tale, until the day I saw him in person when he came to visit his senior brother, Okoro (of blessed memory), who lived next door. From my guardian's home I peeked at Ray's huge dark frame and was convinced that he was not a fable, and I reasoned that since he was human, just maybe one day I could learn to write well, if not as well as he did.

Ray was an obsession for me back in the day as a high school student. His writing was the best of verdant prose, earthy and full of quotable quotes. His column every Monday in The Nigerian Chronicle was a keepsake. And it was still so, perhaps with more poignancy, when he moved to Lagos where he continued to delight with sonic prose, and rhythmic free verse in the Sunday Times and the National Concord. Ray does not just write for the eye, he writes for the ear as well.

He writes to be read; he writes for pleasure reading!

Some of the entries in his column were so vintage Ray that they were unforgettable. I remember, for instance, 'The Snobbish Sage Called Senghor,' an alliterative head for a prosaic delight meant to answer for an alleged snob handed to Nigeria's military head of state Olusegun Obasanjo by the then Senegalese president, Leopold Sedar Senghor, during Obasanjo's visit to Dakar. I also remember 'A Trip to Golgotha,' a pen portrait of the anguish and tribulation that the Newswatch family endured when the magazine was proscribed for six months by the Babangida junta. I equally remember 'Tai,' a tribute at the passing of the legendary Tai Solarin.

Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism - Iboro Otongaran

My affair with Ray as a prose stylist has been a lifelong romance. My final year project in the university-for which I received the maximum point-was a study of Ray's writing, along with that of another legend, Olatunji Dare, now emeritus professor at Bradley University in the US.

Ray has enriched Nigerian journalism with catch phrases that have become the currency of common expression in the popular press. I remember him writing 'where words fail, fist prevails,' a sampler of his pitch for the ear; a phrase that I have adapted for use in one of my poems. I also remember his 'philosophical calmness,' a phrase he used to capture the equanimity with which he bore his vicissitude at the Daily Times.

To use a cliché, Ray has a gift of the gab. He simply makes words behave for him. He is indeed one of the noblest high priests of journalism that the nation is blessed with.

If professional skills have made Ray a living legend, his personality has projected him as a gentleman. Ray is humble. He is a chief priest with a common touch. No airs of prominence about him! I remember the days I struggled in vain with him both at the Ikeja airport and the Ministry of Niger Delta Affairs to help him carry his handbag. On the occasions that I visited him at home in Lagos, Ray served me by himself, clothing me in improbable robes of a VIP guest. Ray reminds me of Dr Ime Umanah (of blessed memory), who was also an epitome of humility, and would personally serve his guests at his Ikoyi home on Bourdillon Road, Lagos.

Dr. Umanah was at a time the chairman of Newswatch where at the time Ray served as the chief executive of the newspaper. Were the two humble sons of Akwa Ibom brought together by the compatibility of personality types? I think the holy bible seemed to have answered that question 2000 odd years ago: Two cannot work together unless they agree (Amos 3:3).

Ray is generous-with his time and other resources. When I co-founded ProData Limited, a communication company that's engaged in media consultancy, reputation management and provision of market intelligence for paying clients, we needed a powerful brand to chair the board of the company. We did a mental tour of names and settled on Ray, with an outside chance that he would accept to carry our start-up on his sturdy shoulders. Ray agreed to be our chairman. It was a benevolence we have cherished till this day-a five-star international journalist chairing the board of our start-up at that time!

Ray is perhaps the best soft-spoken conversationalist around. When you're engaged with Ray, his scalpel-sharp wit and intellect shows through. And also his learning! I understand that just as Wole Soyinka, Ray reads like a magpie. Soyinka once told an interviewer that he reads everything and anything except mathematics.

Besides reading, the Ray essence is mediated by global influences that have percolated through his pores from international travels. Ray has visited more than 50 countries. His urbane personality and international outlook are forged by both a voracious reading habit and the experiences he has had from other civilisations around the world.

After making a roaring success of the road he had taken as a journalist, earning wages from employers for his work, Ray, along with his friends-Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed and Dan Agbese, Nigeria's Journalism Quartet-decided to move upstairs as an employer of labour.

He co-founded Newswatch, a trenchant newsmagazine that soon earned unrivalled industry reputation for investigative journalism and inimitable writing. The Quartet was following in the footsteps of John Payne Jackson, Horatio Agedah, Nnamdi Azikiwe, Sam Amuka-Pemu, all of them journalists who at some points in their careers decided to be publishers by founding their own newspapers.

Thus, during his career Ray has been a guru in both the newsroom and the boardroom. When the scorecard is drawn of Ray as a businessman and as a journalist, in which part of his duality would he be adjudged an out and out five-star general? The jury is still out, but I would be surprised if Ray the journalist would not do better than Ray the businessman.

Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism - Iboro Otongaran

The honours Ray has received from home and abroad are well-earned. He has impacted the lives of many through his writing and outreach. Last year he did a yeoman's job to promote the existence and activities of Uyo Book Club, of which he holds a diamond membership.

For Raymond Amos Ekpu, it has been 75 years of impact and relevance. It's my pleasure and delight therefore to join his family and friends to wish him happy birthday anniversary celebrations. I look forward to many more birthday celebrations for Ray in perfect health and material wellbeing, our Ray of luminous, crunchy and relevant journalism.

Load-Date: August 7, 2023

---

End of Document

Prologue: A diary of wastage

The Nation (Nigeria)

May 30, 2021 Sunday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1001 words

Body

---

He was the very symbol of wastage: frail limbs, premature grey hair and a sagging gait. I had put him down as another specimen from our museum of atrocity. He seemed to have understood. As he took his leave, the wasted young man asked me the million dollar question: 'Why do we waste ourselves so much?' he cried.

The metaphor itself, I'm told, originated during our darkest national moment: the civil war. But its sad antecedents, I'm sure, must be located in the bitter and self-destructive post-independence politics of our founding fathers. Like a malignant cancer, it has overtaken every facet of our national life. Wastage has become the dominant metaphor, the all-embracing formula for the tragedy of our collective existence.

Wole Soyinka, ever the troubled prophet, first drew our attention to the creeping cancer in the mid-seventies. In a newspaper piece titled 'Varieties of Wastage,' Soyinka assailed the invasion of our national life by the culture of human wastage. We waste our best and brightest; our best and brightest politicians; our best and brightest soldiers; our best and brightest intellectuals; our best and brightest bankers; our best and brightest journalists etc. The road, taking its cue from the system, completes the carnage for us.

One year this week, a novel and spectacular variety of wastage made its debut on the national scene. Dele Giwa, brilliant editor and one of the stars of Nigerian journalism, was bombed out of existence in his study. This writer is often amazed these days when people talk glibly about the Nigerian bomb without first conceding that the real 'McCoy' made its sly and devastating entry several months ahead of the idle speculations.

It is pertinent to add here that nobody can fool history and that if care is not taken, that horrifying spectacle of a gifted and virile young man with shattered limbs may itself become an alternative metaphor for our national condition.

As the first anniversary of Giwa's murder approached, I've been thrown into deep mourning and depression. Some days earlier, a good friend, Deji Adegorioye, who had gone to buy some drugs for his indisposed son had his life snuffed out by a bus belonging to the Celestial Church.

Some weeks before this, another friend, Tunde Okeleye, a Customs official, was battered to death by a danfo bus whose driver had perfected the murderous strategy of overtaking in the night with lights switched off. Death had barely closed in on him before some brave new Nigerians saw it fit to remove his money, his shoes, his wristwatch and the drinks he bought for his kids.

Prologue: A diary of wastage

As if all this was not enough burden on the soul, news came of the death by road accident of Professor Iluyomade, Oxford-trained law teacher and Attorney-General of Ondo State. Something always conspires to deny us of even our brief sources of joy, I thought in deep gloom.

I remembered how the Dele Giwa murder had put a dampener on the Wole Soyinka Nobel celebration. And now the cultured and lively people of Ondo town will have to share the joy of one of their illustrious sons winning the National Merit Award with the grief of burying another illustrious son.

These cruel tricks of fortune! Three weeks earlier, I was thinking of sending a telegram of congratulations to Chinua Achebe on his return to high form when I learnt of the death of Dambudzo Marechera, the gifted Zimbabwean writer. I had reckoned that Achebe who had survived a thousand literary cudgels after his immensely frank but immensely impolitic put-down of Obafemi Awolowo surely deserved some congratulations. But the death of Marechera, the supreme artist of hunger whose life must serve as a classic example of the dissolution of the flesh by spirit (whisky and co), halted me in my track.

These deaths make my mind to focus on the damage the notorious Ife-Ibadan road might have done to the intellectual development of this country. One now remembers the Bamiduros, the Kola Adenijis, the Taiye Adebanjos, brilliant men who have gone through all the rituals of education only to have their lives tragically terminated on The Road.

I remember now a tall, dashing young man who would have graduated with our class of '75 at Ife. Onome Ibru would have been an invaluable asset not only to the formidable Ibru Empire but to the entire country. His life was cruelly abridged on this monster of a road.

Now consider this. If one were to resurrect all the people we have put through the ceaseless mill of our unedifying history, all the brilliant men and women that our monstrous system has hurried over to the great beyond! What an endless procession of shame and misery would it have been! What a staggering burden of collective guilt for the living!

Let us end this sad piece with a disturbing but profoundly soothing anecdote. In the gloom and misery that enveloped the nation in the wake of Giwa's murder, I had the honour of briefly participating in one of the planning sessions for his burial. In the atmosphere of consuming sadness, I had asked a journalist friend whether things would ever be the same again in the country. The man looked at me and said philosophically: 'In forty years' time, Dele Giwa will be remembered as a fearless journalist of the eighties'.

Then he told me a story about his father. The old man, sensing that he had only a few more months to spare, decided to take his son down the memory lane on a tour of familiar spots on the Lagos Island.

As they crossed from one alley to another, the old man's face would light with memory as they came upon some familiar land mark. 'That is the house of so and so', he would begin, 'he was a socialite who died mysteriously in 1947'. At another spot the old man would look up and remark: 'This is the house of J.K, he died in his prime in 1958'. And so on...

His message was clear. Life will go on. Life must go on. The only honour we, the dazed survivors, can do to the wasted is to resolve to change a system that is responsible for such colossal waste.

Load-Date: May 31, 2021

30 Years After, Dele Giwa's Pen Remains Mightier

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 18, 2016

Copyright 2016 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1104 words

Byline: Charles Kumolu

Body

---

Regrettably brief but inspirationally eventful! This short acclamation best raises the curtain once again on the life of Dele Giwa, who has justifiably refused to die after being gruesomely denied the right to live on October 19, 1986.

That Giwa, an ace journalist, has remained a phenomenon in the Nigerian narrative 30 years after dying via a letter bomb, is an affirmation of the import of his life, times as well as the implication of his kind of exit.

It was a life sojourn, birthed in humility, expended on national good and cut short by man's inhumanity to man-apologies to Robert Burns.

Having attended local Authority Modern School in Lagere, Ile-Ife; Oduduwa College, Ile-Ife; Brooklyn College ,USA; and Fordham University ,USA, he was princely moulded for the profession that earned him stardom, significance, and death.

In his nearly four decades on earth, the late founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine earned himself professional prominence and national significance through the pursuit of professional goals and commitment to societal good.

Through the introduction of bold and investigative approach to journalism in Nigeria, Giwa , who was born in 1947 in the palace of the Ooni of Ife, altered social anomalies in manners that held the citizen and the state responsive.

Decrees, edicts, boots on the ground

Frontally, his pen confronted decrees, edicts, and boots on the ground with the aim of enthroning public good especially in an era that was not guided by the constitution.

These, the late journalist, who hailed from Edo State, exhibited as Features Editor of Daily Times, Weekend Concord and Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine-the position he held at the time the angels of death delivered the deadly parcel through his then 19-year-old son, Billy, who received it on his behalf.

Indeed, the major resultant effect of that parcel which was Giwa's death may have dealt a devastating blow to journalism in Nigeria, it interestingly failed to suppress the ability to espouse and seek the truth.

30 Years After, Dele Giwa's Pen Remains Mightier

However, the death which took place at the First Foundation Hospital, Ikeja, Lagos, where he was rushed to after the explosion at his No 25, Talabi Crescent, Adeniyi Jones Avenue, Ikeja residence, remains saddening but significant in many ways.

On the one hand, many are still appalled at the failure of requisite institutions at clearing the fog surrounding the death in respective of acclaimed traces, while others see such failure as the absence of capacity by the Nigerian state to protect its citizens.

On the other hand, the incident emboldened the use of free speech as a weapon against societal ills and tyranny to point that the media stood up to the late Gen San Abacha's dictatorship.

That the nation from that moment, has been boldly asking: Who Killed Dele Giwa? affirms that his death rather than suppressing the right to free speech fuelled the feelings of fearlessness the more.

And the event which is still believed to be an affront to press freedom has further amplified the voices for press freedom which many would agree is not sufficiently practicable as enshrined in chapter II section 39 subsection (1) of the 1999 constitution.

The constitution highlighted that part thus: "Every person shall be entitled to freedom of expression, including freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart ideas and information without interference."

Though some have argued that freedom of expression even with the Freedom of Information Act ,FOIA, does not mean absolute freedom, the fact that journalists perform constitutionally backed duties, qualifies them for state protection.

Giwa's gruesome murder and its unresolved status, testify to the need for that considering that some journalists had also died under questionable circumstances since that incident of October 19, 1986.

Certainly, the attendant implications of his death informed the thrust of a colloquium holding today in Lagos in commemoration of the 30 years of his demise.

The event which is entitled: Safety of Journalists and Culture of Impunity in Africa, seeks to reflect on the life of Giwa, his contributions to journalism and the implication of his death to the practice of journalism in Africa.

With participants drawn from the media, armed forces, the executive arm of government, judiciary and civil society, the choice of attendees can't be termed inappropriate considering the role the institutions they represent, played in the aftermath of the death of Giwa, who in his time, epitomised excellence and dynamism in Nigerian journalism.

Expectedly, today's exercise may, on the one hand, produce a consensus for an objective investigation of the matter beyond what has been a thirty-year official indifference, just as many would re-echo this three-decade-old question: Who killed Dele Giwa?

Govt was interested in Dele Giwa's case--Tsav

Reflecting on Giwa's demise yesterday in an exclusive chat with Vanguard, a retired Police Commissioner, who conducted the initial investigation into the matter, Alhaji Abubakar Tsav, urged the media to ensure that such cases are satisfactorily concluded.

He said: "There was gross negligence in the cause of investigating Dele Giwa's death. The negligence was on the part of the instigative authority and the government. I handled the case immediately it happened and sought the permission to search the places I was supposed to but the files left my hand and never came back.

Before then I had already interviewed Soyinka, who was Dele Giwa at the time the incident happened, Dele Giwa's wife and Gani Fawehinmi. The claim that Soyinka knew what happened is not true. When the matter got to Omabeni, he started to say that Soyinka was responsible and deviated from my view.

30 Years After, Dele Giwa's Pen Remains Mightier

That was the end of that case. Any case that the government is interested in will never see the light of the day. That was what happened. The government was interested in the case of Dele Giwa. We saw that happen in the case of Rewane, Bola Ige, and others. That case like Dele Giwa's case showed that any case that the government has an interest in dies a natural death.

As the media remembers Dele Giwa, they should henceforth insist that any murder case is brought to a logical conclusion even if it is the murder of a beggar, it must be investigated with a view to bringing those responsible to book. I handled the case with enthusiasm so that we could know those responsible because that was the first bomb blast in Nigeria but the government was interested in it. It was after then that we started having cases of bomb last like during the NADECO days when the group was wrongly accused of being behind the blasts."

Load-Date: October 19, 2016

---

End of Document

Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism

The Guardian

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1256 words

Body

---

Ray Ekpu is the reason I'm a journalist. I don't think that tribute captures the truth of what Ray actually means to me! Let me try again. A near adequate tribute is that Ray is why I'm still struggling with the craft of writing, in the hope that one day I would be close to the gold standard in modern magazine and feature writing, where Ray currently leads the pack and belongs in the same pantheon of gods with Stanley Macebuh, Dele Giwa, Sonala Olumhense, Muhammed Haruna, Niyi Osundare, Sam Omatseye and a few other select prose virtuosos.

For me as a young man there was nothing else that held out the kind of irresistible spell like what Ray was doing. I made up my mind early that I would rather end up as a root crop farmer in my rustic village of Ikot Akpan Ebo in Uruk Otong of Adat Ifang clan in Ukanafun local council area if I could not be a journalist like Ray. Ray had made journalism look like the best job in the world, and the journalist as a magician, a guy who could walk on water by his sheer prose power.

The man had loomed so large in my impressionable imagination that I actually didn't believe he was anything other than a fairy tale, until the day I saw him in person when he came to visit his senior brother, Okoro (of blessed memory), who lived next door. From my guardian's home I peeked at Ray's huge dark frame and was convinced that he was not a fable, and I reasoned that since he was human, just maybe one day I could learn to write well, if not as well as he did.

Ray was an obsession for me back in the day as a high school student. His writing was the best of verdant prose, earthy and full of quotable quotes. His column every Monday in The Nigerian Chronicle was a keepsake. And it was still so, perhaps with more poignancy, when he moved to Lagos where he continued to delight with sonic prose, and rhythmic free verse in the Sunday Times and the National Concord. Ray does not just write for the eye, he writes for the ear as well.

He writes to be read; he writes for pleasure reading!

Some of the entries in his column were so vintage Ray that they were unforgettable. I remember, for instance, "The Snobbish Sage Called Senghor," an alliterative head for a prosaic delight meant to answer for an alleged snob handed to Nigeria's military head of state Olusegun Obasanjo by the then Senegalese president, Leopold Sedar Senghor, during Obasanjo's visit to Dakar. I also remember "A Trip to Golgotha," a pen portrait of the anguish and tribulation that the Newswatch family endured when the magazine was proscribed for six months by the Babangida junta. I equally remember "Tai," a tribute at the passing of the legendary Tai Solarin.

Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism

My affair with Ray as a prose stylist has been a lifelong romance. My final year project in the university—for which I received the maximum point—was a study of Ray's writing, along with that of another legend, Olatunji Dare, now emeritus professor at Bradley University in the US.

Ray has enriched Nigerian journalism with catch phrases that have become the currency of common expression in the popular press. I remember him writing "where words fail, fist prevails," a sampler of his pitch for the ear; a phrase that I have adapted for use in one of my poems. I also remember his "philosophical calmness," a phrase he used to capture the equanimity with which he bore his vicissitude at the Daily Times.

To use a cliché, Ray has a gift of the gab. He simply makes words behave for him. He is indeed one of the noblest high priests of journalism that the nation is blessed with.

If professional skills have made Ray a living legend, his personality has projected him as a gentleman. Ray is humble. He is a chief priest with a common touch. No airs of prominence about him! I remember the days I struggled in vain with him both at the Ikeja airport and the Ministry of Niger Delta Affairs to help him carry his handbag. On the occasions that I visited him at home in Lagos, Ray served me by himself, clothing me in improbable robes of a VIP guest. Ray reminds me of Dr Ime Umanah (of blessed memory), who was also an epitome of humility, and would personally serve his guests at his Ikoyi home on Bourdillon Road, Lagos.

Dr. Umanah was at a time the chairman of Newswatch where at the time Ray served as the chief executive of the newspaper. Were the two humble sons of Akwa Ibom brought together by the compatibility of personality types? I think the holy bible seemed to have answered that question 2000 odd years ago: Two cannot work together unless they agree (Amos 3:3).

Ray is generous—with his time and other resources. When I co-founded ProData Limited, a communication company that's engaged in media consultancy, reputation management and provision of market intelligence for paying clients, we needed a powerful brand to chair the board of the company. We did a mental tour of names and settled on Ray, with an outside chance that he would accept to carry our start-up on his sturdy shoulders. Ray agreed to be our chairman. It was a benevolence we have cherished till this day—a five-star international journalist chairing the board of our start-up at that time!

Ray is perhaps the best soft-spoken conversationalist around. When you're engaged with Ray, his scalpel-sharp wit and intellect shows through. And also his learning! I understand that just as Wole Soyinka, Ray reads like a magpie. Soyinka once told an interviewer that he reads everything and anything except mathematics.

Besides reading, the Ray essence is mediated by global influences that have percolated through his pores from international travels. Ray has visited more than 50 countries. His urbane personality and international outlook are forged by both a voracious reading habit and the experiences he has had from other civilisations around the world.

After making a roaring success of the road he had taken as a journalist, earning wages from employers for his work, Ray, along with his friends—Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed and Dan Agbese, Nigeria's Journalism Quartet—decided to move upstairs as an employer of labour.

He co-founded Newswatch, a trenchant newsmagazine that soon earned unrivalled industry reputation for investigative journalism and inimitable writing. The Quartet was following in the footsteps of John Payne Jackson, Horatio Agedah, Nnamdi Azikiwe, Sam Amuka-Pemu, all of them journalists who at some points in their careers decided to be publishers by founding their own newspapers.

Thus, during his career Ray has been a guru in both the newsroom and the boardroom. When the scorecard is drawn of Ray as a businessman and as a journalist, in which part of his duality would he be adjudged an out and out five-star general? The jury is still out, but I would be surprised if Ray the journalist would not do better than Ray the businessman.

Ray is the reason I'm in Journalism

The honours Ray has received from home and abroad are well-earned. He has impacted the lives of many through his writing and outreach. Last year he did a yeoman's job to promote the existence and activities of Uyo Book Club, of which he holds a diamond membership.

For Raymond Amos Ekpu, it has been 75 years of impact and relevance. It's my pleasure and delight therefore to join his family and friends to wish him happy birthday anniversary celebrations. I look forward to many more birthday celebrations for Ray in perfect health and material wellbeing, our Ray of luminous, crunchy and relevant journalism.

In this article journalism

Ray Ekpu

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 18, 2023

---

End of Document

Who 'Killed' Gen. Ibrahim Attahiru?

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

May 28, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1078 words

Body

---

94 views | Ozodinukwe Okenwa | May 28, 2021

When the pioneer investigative journalist in Nigeria, Dele Giwa, was blown to smithereens by a letter-bomb delivered to his residence in Lagos by two Babangida loyalists, ex-SSS Director, Kunle Togun and DMI's Halilu Akilu one of the national dailies in Nigeria had asked repeatedly the question: "Who Killed Dele Giwa?". Though the question was never answered everyone had known all along who masterminded the Dele Giwa assassination and why. Between the dictator in power at that time, Gen. Ibrahim Babangida and the mysterious Ms Gloria Okon's narcotics peddling story the truth lies somewhere in-between. If Giwa had not been brutally taken down and out may be Babangida would have since become history.

State terrorism never started in Nigeria with the Giwa murder. Nor ended with the last October's #EndSARS Lekki Toll-Gate Lagos massacre. During the retired General Olusegun Obasanjo dictatorship, decades ago (following the Murtala Mohammed assassination) the late Afrobeat legend, Fela Kuti, suffered state terrorism culminating in the horrible murder of his beloved mother, Fumilayo Ransome-Kuti. When the so-called 'unknown soldiers' came calling they threw the old woman out from a second-floor window! She later died as a result of that heinous attack.

The late 'Abami Eda' was a thorn in the flesh of the military establishment then just as the late Giwa was about to make history by exposing a state secret involving international narcotics trade and its illicit proceeds and money laundering.

The present Buhari regime has committed a lot of state terrorism with impunity. Under PMB's watch the Shiites were massacred in their hundreds in Zaria, Kaduna state, by trigger-happy soldiers under the command of the former Chief of Army Staff, retired General Tukur Buratai, now an Ambassador. Ex-President Olusegun Obasanjo killed hundreds at Zaki-Biam and Odi in Bayelsa state.

The immediate past Chief of Army Staff, (COAS) General Ibrahim Attahiru, along with other military personnel on his entourage and the crew members of an Air Force jet were all recently killed in a fatal air crash in Kaduna. The plane burnt itself to ashes! They were going to Zaria on an official assignment. Their barely-recognisable charred remains were buried in Abuja at the National Military Cemetery.

Who 'Killed' Gen. Ibrahim Attahiru?

Neither the President, the Commander-in-Chief of our Armed Forces, Muhammadu Buhari, nor the Vice-President, Prof. Yemi Osinbajo, were present at the emotional funeral ceremony. The absence of the number one and two citizens sent tongues wagging as to the reason behind it all. Conspiracy theories emerged online as to the cause of the crash and why those at the zenith of power who should ordinarily be there were not there.

The Vice-President, Prof. Osinbajo, could be indisposed hence his conspicuous absence. Days after the burial of the dead military men the VP was seen in Lagos at the premises of Reddington Hospital for his annual medical checkup. While the President often visits London for his medical needs Osinbajo prefers the state of aquatic splendour for his medical evaluations. That is good enough, patronising Nigeria and Nigerian doctors!

For Mallam Garba Shehu, the controversial presidential spokesman, Buhari must have resolved not to pay the last honour to the fallen COAS because "he doesn't like this idea of closing roads, security men molesting people on the road for him to have the right of way". Laughable? And for Ms Lauretta Onochie, another media aide to President Buhari, for the Head of State to be in any national funeral outside the Villa there must be a 48 hours notice ahead of time! Risible?

Though investigation is said to be on-going to unravel the mystery behind the Kaduna air crash that sadly took the life of the COAS and others concerned Nigerians were asking probing questions as to the possible motive behind the crash. Was Gen. Attahiru 'liquidated' by other Generals who saw him as a threat to their Boko Haram 'business' or investments? A whole lot of money is being misappropriated or stolen outright by some high-ranking Army officers in a corrupt web of arms and ammunition purchase contracts.

But given the late COAS professionalism and apparent patriotism the season of the looting spree could have arrived at an abrupt end with him at the helm of the military affairs. As he took over last January he had raised an alarm over the billions of Dollars of military hardware contracts signed and paid for but not accounted for. The arsenal were nowhere to be found!

Besides, the National Security Adviser (NSA), Babagana Monguno, had during an interview with the BBC Hausa service echoed the same missing or undelivered ammunitions only for him to recant after possible pressure from certain quarters. He claimed later that he was quoted out of context on the allegations he made against the immediate past Service Chiefs.

So the crucial question: Was Gen. Attahiru (54) eliminated in order for the embezzlement to be covered up or for it to continue? Was he killed for the prosperous business of the war on terror to continue unabated? Who benefits from his permanent removal from the scene?

Another theory: Was Gen. Attahiru planning a coup against the incumbent President? And flowing from that insinuation and following intelligence reports could it be that he was softly taken out to forestall a manifestation of Abdul Fattah al-Sisi/Mohammed Morsi scenario in Egypt playing out in Nigeria? The late President Mohammed Morsi, it would be recalled, had appointed Gen. al-Sisi as his Army Chief and Defense Minister but the latter overthrew the former and decimated his Muslim Brotherhood group.

Was that the reason President Buhari boycotted the late COAS burial? Nobody knows for sure but there is room for conjecture. Buhari had been beaten before and stabbed in the back by his trusted lieutenants, Generals Ibrahim Babangida and the late Sani Abacha. So he may not want another 'Brutus' to repeat what happened before.

With rumours of coup enveloping the landscape lately could it be that the late General was set up by the cabal running and ruining Nigeria on behalf of President Buhari? There is urgent need for an impartial investigation into the circumstances surrounding the Kaduna crash.

May the soul of Lt-Gen Ibrahim Attahiru, the newly-wedded pilot, and other gallant officers who died in the air mishap rest in peace!

SOC Okenwa

Who 'Killed' Gen. Ibrahim Attahiru?

soco\_abj\_2006\_rci@hotmail.fr

Ibrahim Attahiru

Load-Date: May 28, 2021

---

End of Document

Prologue: A diary of wastage

The Nation (Nigeria)

May 30, 2021 Sunday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 996 words

Body

---

He was the very symbol of wastage: frail limbs, premature grey hair and a sagging gait. I had put him down as another specimen from our museum of atrocity. He seemed to have understood. As he took his leave, the wasted young man asked me the million dollar question: 'Why do we waste ourselves so much?' he cried.

The metaphor itself, I'm told, originated during our darkest national moment: the civil war. But its sad antecedents, I'm sure, must be located in the bitter and self-destructive post-independence politics of our founding fathers. Like a malignant cancer, it has overtaken every facet of our national life. Wastage has become the dominant metaphor, the all-embracing formula for the tragedy of our collective existence.

Wole Soyinka, ever the troubled prophet, first drew our attention to the creeping cancer in the mid-seventies. In a newspaper piece titled 'Varieties of Wastage,' Soyinka assailed the invasion of our national life by the culture of human wastage. We waste our best and brightest; our best and brightest politicians; our best and brightest soldiers; our best and brightest intellectuals; our best and brightest bankers; our best and brightest journalists etc. The road, taking its cue from the system, completes the carnage for us.

One year this week, a novel and spectacular variety of wastage made its debut on the national scene. Dele Giwa, brilliant editor and one of the stars of Nigerian journalism, was bombed out of existence in his study. This writer is often amazed these days when people talk glibly about the Nigerian bomb without first conceding that the real 'McCoy' made its sly and devastating entry several months ahead of the idle speculations.

It is pertinent to add here that nobody can fool history and that if care is not taken, that horrifying spectacle of a gifted and virile young man with shattered limbs may itself become an alternative metaphor for our national condition.

As the first anniversary of Giwa's murder approached, I've been thrown into deep mourning and depression. Some days earlier, a good friend, Deji Adegorioye, who had gone to buy some drugs for his indisposed son had his life snuffed out by a bus belonging to the Celestial Church.

Some weeks before this, another friend, Tunde Okeleye, a Customs official, was battered to death by a danfo bus whose driver had perfected the murderous strategy of overtaking in the night with lights switched off. Death had barely closed in on him before some brave new Nigerians saw it fit to remove his money, his shoes, his wristwatch and the drinks he bought for his kids.

Prologue: A diary of wastage

As if all this was not enough burden on the soul, news came of the death by road accident of Professor Iluyomade, Oxford-trained law teacher and Attorney-General of Ondo State. Something always conspires to deny us of even our brief sources of joy, I thought in deep gloom.

I remembered how the Dele Giwa murder had put a dampener on the Wole Soyinka Nobel celebration. And now the cultured and lively people of Ondo town will have to share the joy of one of their illustrious sons winning the National Merit Award with the grief of burying another illustrious son.

These cruel tricks of fortune! Three weeks earlier, I was thinking of sending a telegram of congratulations to Chinua Achebe on his return to high form when I learnt of the death of Dambudzo Marechera, the gifted Zimbabwean writer. I had reckoned that Achebe who had survived a thousand literary cudgels after his immensely frank but immensely impolitic put-down of Obafemi Awolowo surely deserved some congratulations. But the death of Marechera, the supreme artist of hunger whose life must serve as a classic example of the dissolution of the flesh by spirit (whisky and co), halted me in my track.

These deaths make my mind to focus on the damage the notorious Ife-Ibadan road might have done to the intellectual development of this country. One now remembers the Bamiduros, the Kola Adenijis, the Taiye Adebanjos, brilliant men who have gone through all the rituals of education only to have their lives tragically terminated on The Road.

I remember now a tall, dashing young man who would have graduated with our class of '75 at Ife. Onome Ibru would have been an invaluable asset not only to the formidable Ibru Empire but to the entire country. His life was cruelly abridged on this monster of a road.

Now consider this. If one were to resurrect all the people we have put through the ceaseless mill of our unedifying history, all the brilliant men and women that our monstrous system has hurried over to the great beyond! What an endless procession of shame and misery would it have been! What a staggering burden of collective guilt for the living!

Let us end this sad piece with a disturbing but profoundly soothing anecdote. In the gloom and misery that enveloped the nation in the wake of Giwa's murder, I had the honour of briefly participating in one of the planning sessions for his burial. In the atmosphere of consuming sadness, I had asked a journalist friend whether things would ever be the same again in the country. The man looked at me and said philosophically: 'In forty years' time, Dele Giwa will be remembered as a fearless journalist of the eighties'.

Then he told me a story about his father. The old man, sensing that he had only a few more months to spare, decided to take his son down the memory lane on a tour of familiar spots on the Lagos Island.

As they crossed from one alley to another, the old man's face would light with memory as they came upon some familiar land mark. 'That is the house of so and so', he would begin, 'he was a socialite who died mysteriously in 1947'. At another spot the old man would look up and remark: 'This is the house of J.K, he died in his prime in 1958'. And so on...

His message was clear. Life will go on. Life must go on. The only honour we, the dazed survivors, can do to the wasted is to resolve to change a system that is responsible for such colossal waste.

Load-Date: June 22, 2021

Dele Giwa: Omeben is a liar –Tsav

The Sun (Nigeria)

November 6, 2015 Friday

Copyright 2015 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1402 words

Byline: Our Reporter

Body

---

■ Ex-Lagos CP blasts former DIG BY TUNDE THOMAS Amid raging controversies over police investigations into the murder of the Founding Editor of NEWS-WATCH Magazine, Dele Giwa, a retired Commissioner of Police in Lagos State has described as un-true recent statements credited to a retired Deputy Inspector-General of Police, Chris Omeben that some top directors [...]

■ Ex-Lagos CP blasts former DIG

BY TUNDE THOMAS

Amid raging controversies over police investigations into the murder of the Founding Editor of NEWS-WATCH Magazine, Dele Giwa, a retired Commissioner of Police in Lagos State has described as un-true recent statements credited to a retired Deputy Inspector-General of Police, Chris Omeben that some top directors of NEWSWATCH prevented him from interrogating the then London Correspondent of the magazine, Mr Kayode Soyinka whom he believed had some questions to answer over the murder.

Omeben had last week in an interview accused two Directors of NEWS-WATCH, Messrs Ray Ekpu and Yaku-bu Muhammed of shielding Soyinka from being quizzed and investigated by the police as he was the only person with Giwa when the bomb that killed him exploded. Both men later denied the claims while accusing Omeben of fabricating falsehood.

Speaking with SATURDAY SUN's TUNDE THOMAS over the matter, Tsav who was then an Assistant Commissioner of Police in charge of investigations at the time of the incident described Omeben as a liar and a confused old man.

Dele Giwa: Omeben is a liar –Tsav

According to Tsav, Omeben's recent declaration on Dele Giwa's murder was a mere fallacy. He urged right thinking Nigerians not to take Omeben serious.

"I'm sorry to say this because Omeben happened to be my senior in the Force before both of us retired. But Omeben should be ashamed of himself for purveying falsehood over Giwa's murder. He said nothing but rubbish in his declaration. For a man who called himself a pastor to be lying says a lot about some people who parade themselves as men of God. Omeben should shut up instead of lying all over the place, and accusing others wrongly."

While throwing an open debate challenge to Omeben over the issue, Tsav said: "To set records straight, and for Nigerians to know the truth and nothing but the truth, I'm throwing an open challenge to Omeben over this issue because both of us were involved in investigations into Dele Giwa's murder. But what knowledge of the case does Omeben have than mere supervisory one because then he was an Assistant Inspector General of Police. But I was an Assistant Commissioner of Police then in charge of General Investigations Force CID Ikoyi, Lagos, and was directly and deeply involved in the investigation into Giwa's murder."

While adding that it was much later that Omeben came into the case, Tsav said initial investigation into the murder was carried out by the then Deputy Commissioner of Police, Abdullahi Kaltungo who later handed over to him.

"Kaltungo started the investigation but later handed over to me. But later, the then Assistant Inspector-General of Police in charge of Force CID, Victor Pam who later became Gwon Jos was transferred. Omeben replaced him, and even when he saw my reports he commended me, and that is why I'm surprised by Omeben's latest outbursts. I still maintain it, I'm personally through this medium requesting an open debate between my humble self and Omeben. The debate can take place in Abuja, Lagos or any place of Omeben's choice," he declared.

While insisting that Kayode Soyinka was not a prime suspect or has questions to answer contrary to Omeben's position, Tsav said: "I fear no human being and that is why I will continue to say nothing but the truth. When the bomb explosion that claimed Dele Giwa's life took place, the police of which I was an integral part then interrogated a lot of people including Kayode Soyinka, Billy, Dele Giwa's son, Florence Ita-Giwa including the gatekeeper at Dele Giwa's house. We also interrogated Dele Giwa's lawyer, late Gani Fawehinmi. We did a thorough job, and in the course of that investigation nothing showed us that Kayode Soyinka had a hand in the explosion. For Omeben to say that Soyinka has questions to answer, to me, is very uncharitable.

"Again, the question Nigerians should ask Omeben is this, if Soyinka has anything to do with the bomb or knows anything about it, would he have agreed to sit down in the same room with Dele Giwa when the deceased wanted to open the letter bomb? Only God knows what Omeben wanted to achieve by fabricating this falsehood. But I will say again that I'm shocked and surprised that Omeben who called himself a man of God can be involved in this kind of mischief."

While accusing Omeben of harbouring a hidden agenda over the issue, Tsav accused the ex-DIG of failing to honour Oputa Panel invitation in 2005 when he was summoned to explain what he knew about Giwa's murder while serving in the police force.

"Omeben shunned Oputa panel. He was summoned but he failed to turn up. But I was there on invitation, and I told the panel all I knew relating to police investigations into Dele Giwa's murder. That is to show you that Omeben is a hypocrite. Nigerians should not take him serious," he said.

Describing his experience while investigating the case as very challenging, Tsav said investigation into the case was complex because that was the first time a case of letter bomb explosion would take place in the country.

"Another aspect of the investigation that posed serious problem to the police was our inability to quiz some top military officers then including Colonel Ali Akilu, and Colonel To-gun. I wrote a letter to higher police authorities seeking permission to have these men quizzed, but I didn't get any reply until I retired from the force," he declared.

Dele Giwa: Omeben is a liar –Tsav

On the clamour by some lawyers and human rights activists in the country that federal government should re-open investigation into the murder, Tsav said: "There is nothing wrong with that. Although, it is 30 years after now, it is okay if the culprits can be apprehended. Dele Giwa's family will be happy, and not only that many Nigerians will also be happy. But the first thing they should do is to look for the case file, then after that, the file should be handed over or sent to the Office of the Attorney-General of Lagos State for him to look at it and determine what next line of action to take. The Attorney-General of Lagos State should be the one to handle the case because the crime took place in Lagos, and not only that, Lagos State was also the capital of Nigeria at that time."

Imploring Omeben to take it easy as he is gradually ageing, Tsav said: "On a parting note, old age is good and everybody prays to live to attain old age. But old age should not be used to cause confusion, or division. It is better to keep quiet rather than make statements that are not only untrue but also capable of creating problems. Omeben as an active police officer was not well grounded in investigation matters. He was in the Special Branch of the Police Force for many years before he was redeployed to Investigations Department. He should not lay claim to those things he was not part of, and he should learn to give credit to whom it was due."

Giwa, a renowned journalist and one of the founding editors of NEWSWATCH magazine lost his life through a letter bomb explosion 29 years ago, and the culprits responsible for his untimely death are yet to be apprehended.

Since his gruesome death, members of his family and members of the human rights community have always been expressing the hope that the masterminds would be apprehended one day.

However, renewed public interest in Dele Giwa's murder was triggered two weeks ago following a claim by Omeben that two of the founding editors of NEWSWATCH, Messrs Ray Ekpu and Yakubu Muhammed frustrated his efforts to apprehend the killers following their refusal to release for interrogation, Mr Kayode Soyinka, the London Correspondent of NEWSWATCH magazine, a man he said he considered a prime suspect in the crime.

Omeben who recently turned 80 who spoke with the NEWS AGENCY OF NIGERIA, , accused Ekpu and Muhammed of facilitating Soyinka's escape from Nigeria to London instead of handing him over to the police for interrogation.

However both Ekpu and Soyinka had not only denied Omeben's claims but have also described Omeben as a liar.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/13/144685568051.jpg>

Load-Date: November 6, 2015

---

End of Document

Ugbekpe-Ekperi - Remembering Dele Giwa 29 Years After

Leadership (Abuja)

October 31, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1485 words

Byline: Patrick Ochoga

Body

---

The people of Ugbekpe-Ekperi, the ancestral home of the late Dele Giwa, founding editor-in-chief of Newswatch Magazine who was killed when a parcel bomb was delivered to his home on 19th October, 1986, still mourn his death.

LEADERSHIP Weekend's Patrick Ochoga

who visited the community recently, writes.

Twenty nine years after the murder one of Nigeria's most iconic journalists and the founding editor-in-chief of Newswatch Magazine, Dele Giwa through a parcel bomb on October, 19th October 1986 at the young age of 39, the incident still remains a huge loss for the practice of investigative journalism in Nigeria.

Also, as circumstances surrounding his untimely death remain a mystery, with the security agencies and government yet to bring the culprits behind the murder to book, family members and his kinsmen of Ugbekpe-Ekperi Kingdom in Etsako Central Local Government Area of Edo State are still hurting 29 years after.

For his kinsmen, the anniversary of his death evokes the stark reality of the many unresolved high profile murders by alleged government agents or their proxies.

When LEADERSHIP Weekend visited late Dele's Giwa's family house in Ugbekpe-Ekperi, the compound appeared devoid of its usual bustle, as only a handful of visitors were sighted coming in and out of it.

It was however gathered that most of the immediate relations of the late journalist live in Lagos and overseas. One of the few still living in the compound is a distant relation who identified herself simply as Ramatu. She lamented that despite the failure of government to unmask the killers of Giwa, the family is consoled by the fact that God will expose his killers.

"Each time people come here to speak about our brother I feel very sad because it is exactly 29 years now that he was killed with a bomb because he was doing his job, while the culprits are somewhere living their own lives and enjoying themselves. But we are consoled by the fact that God will one day expose those behind his death. We are not happy at all that our benefactor was taken away from us by evil people," she lamented.

Ugbekpe-Ekperi - Remembering Dele Giwa 29 Years After

When Giwa was assassinated, he left behind an aged mother, who is now 84 years old, two younger brothers and three sisters.

The five siblings of the late pioneer editor-in-chief of Newswatch are Tunde and Biodun (both based in the United States), Hauwa Omomohle, Ronke Habibat Aboaba and Fatima Musa.

He is also survived by Funmi, his widow, three sons and two daughters.

Billy, his first son, who was then a student of the University of Jos, was only 19 years old when his father was brutally killed.

Incidentally, Billy, a graduate of English, who has been resident in the United Kingdom for more than a decade, was the person who received the killer parcel bomb from Musa Zibo, the security guard, and handed it over to Giwa in the study, unknown to him that it was the harbinger of his father's death. Billy's two other younger brothers whose mother is an American are Dele Jnr. and Tunde Jnr., while Giwa's two daughters are Funmi, who is now a lawyer and Ayodele Aishat, who was about a year old when her father was assassinated.

The traditional ruler of the community, the Ijegbai of Ekperi Kingdom, Alhaji Deke Kanoba, while reflecting over the sad incident, said it is only in Nigeria that such a murder could happen without a concerted effort to bring the perpetrators to book, adding "Nigerians know the quarters from which the bomb came from."

Alhaji Kanoba said the late Giwa was an icon for the people of Ekperi land owing to his contribution to the profession of journalism.

He recounted "I must say that the Ekperi people are at loss each time we remember our brother. It is sad that we have a very porous justice system in Nigeria. It is not as if people don't know who sent the bomb to kill Dele Giwa. This cannot happen in other climes without the relevant agencies getting to root of the matter."

While giving a historical background of the Giwa's family as told by his late father who was the Ijegbai of Ekperi Kingdom, Kanoba stated: "We are at least comforted that the Giwas realised that they are from Ekepri. Dele's father actually grew up in the palace of the Ooni of Ife and that was why they nicknamed the father Giwa (the fathers real name was Bagudu). It was in Ife they gave him the name Giwa. We not happy that government has not done anything for the community, it is quite unfortunate," The traditional ruler lamented.

He said that the people of Ekperi are always thrown into mourning whenever they remember his tragic demise because they have not been able to fill the gap his death created.

"Though, we do not know the killers, I know God knows them and one day, God will expose them, because there is nothing God cannot do. We still have faith that one day, the killers will face the full wrath of the law," he said.

A community leader, Steve Momodu who hails from Ekperi, described Giwa as a pride of the people of Ekperi and Nigeria at large.

"He is somebody that was humble, honest and respectable. Dele Giwa meant a lot to us and as we speak now, his person is immortalised in our hearts because he is one of the trailblazers in Ekperi. You cannot write the history of Ugbekpe-Ekperi today without mentioning Dele Giwa. In fact, his name would be in history not only in Ekperi but also in Edo, Delta and, of course Nigeria; because you cannot write anything about journalism in Nigerian without mentioning Dele Giwa. So, he means so much to us and our people will continue to honour him even now that he is no longer alive," he said.

He however, regretted that the late Giwa has been forgotten by those in authority despite the fact that he laid the foundation for the robust journalism practice that has helped enhance democracy in the country today.

"You know that Nigerians hardly celebrate the dead. They are only good at showing sycophancy when you are there but once the person is gone, he will be forgotten.

Ugbekpe-Ekperi - Remembering Dele Giwa 29 Years After

"To be very candid, I think Dele Giwa has not been fairly recognised because he is one of those who promoted the entrenchment of the democracy that we are enjoying today. Part of his drive was to see that there was sanity in the system and that there was political order in the country and that was why his life was terminated. So, I think that the government of the day should begin to look into how to recognise our son who fought and won the democracy we have today, even though he is not alive right now."

On his part, a human rights activist, Aliu Ozioruva, said Dele Giwa represents the new face of journalism in Nigeria, adding the late journalist "brought a new perspective of boldness, knack for in-depth reports and analysis into the journalism profession. He successfully built on the foundation the likes of Lateef Jakande, Pa Ajose and others of that generation had laid."

"He was able to lift the profession to the level where it actually became the mirror of the society especially with its social responsibility of setting agenda for the authority, regulating the society and ability to speak to truth. He represents what I call the bridge between the old and new in journalism, especially with his training in the United States where freedom and equality was their watchword.

"Dele Giwa brought the mentality to the journalism profession where the authority was continuously queried and scrutinised. Though it is believed that such characteristics also contributed to his death, many journalists were also encouraged by that boldness to stand by the truth even in the face of oppression, incarceration, maiming and killings."

He lamented that "the Nigerian state has not been fair to him and his legacies. It is unfortunate that as at today, 29 years after his death, the investigation on the circumstances surrounding his death remain inconclusive.

"All we have heard has been different versions of how the parcel was delivered, how in the process of opening it, it exploded, how Dele Giwa had expressed fears few days earlier that his life was in danger.

But indications point to the fact that his death may have been sponsored by the state, considering that fact that as at the time of the events, Nigeria was under a military dictatorship.

"We have had various reports from former serving police officers on how their investigations were truncated abruptly without reasons been given. What the state should do, especially now that we are in democracy, is for the government to re-open the investigation. You will recall that late Gani Fawehinmi tried until his death to ensure justice for Giwa and the journalism profession. The last effort was his presentation to the Oputa Panel, the report of which remains one of the various documents available for government to work with. I will also charge the leadership of the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) to take it as a responsibility to ensure justice for Dele Giwa, his family, journalists and journalism," he added.

Load-Date: November 2, 2015

---

End of Document

Return of Newswatch, Victory For Dele Giwa Ray Ekpu

PM News

October 21, 2014 Tuesday

Copyright 2014 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 886 words

Body

---

Henry Ojelu, Daniel Ekugo

Ray Ekpu

Veteran journalist and one of the founding members of Newswatch publication title, Ray Ekpu has described the court verdict which upturned the takeover of the publication by Barrister Jimoh Ibrahim, as victory for the late founding editor, Dele Giwa.

The purchase deal of the publication by controversial businessman, Jimoh has been a subject of litigation as some minority shareholders of the publication queried his full takeover of the company.

The minority shareholders who filed the suit were Mr. Nuhu Aruwa and Prof. Jibril Aminu while the respondents were Newswatch Communications Limited, Global Media Mirror Limited, Jimoh Ibrahim, Newswatch Newspapers and Corporate Affairs Commission.

Ruling on the suit yesterday, Justice Buba Ibrahim, of the Federal High Court, sitting in Lagos upturned the Share Purchase Agreement (SPA) which transferred ownership of Newswatch Communications Limited to Global Media Mirror Limited owned by businessman, Jimoh Ibrahim.

The court also awarded N15.7 million damages against Jimoh Ibrahim and other co-defendants as well as an order halting further publications of Newswatch Daily among other reliefs sought by the petitioners.

Jimoh Ibrahim

Reacting to the development Ray Ekpu attributed the judgment to the spirit of their late co-founder Dele Giwa whose dead anniversary was celebrated on Sunday, October 19.

The late Dele Giwa was killed via a letter bomb in home Lagos resident on Sunday of October 19, 1986

Ekpu described Jimoh Ibrahim alleged takeover of the Newswatch title as pure fraud and an attempt to destroy the legacy of the publication founders

What Jimoh did was typical 419. And there is nothing to worry about because this judgement, has nullified what ever judgement he had."

Return of Newswatch , Victory For Dele Giwa Ray Ekpu

Ekpu who further described Jimoh as an insincere person said the businessman had in an advertorial some time last year claimed that he bought The Newswatch 51 per cent share because of the late Dele Giwa.

He said he bought the publication because of Dele Giwa. How could that happen? It's ok for him to lay claims of association with Dele Giwa. But I knew that Dele Giwa would be turning in his grave that this man wasn't what he said he was. We just laughed, because throughout all of those negotiations, he never mentioned Dele Giwa," he said.

Noting that: When we gave our own response it was titled: Mr Jimoh Ibrahim's Litany of Lies which was robust. He chickened out after our response because it was all lies."

Ekpu said he felt sorry for the hundreds of the current Newswatch staff who will be out of job soon as court would soon appoint a receiver manager for the publication.

He has bills to pay to us. Our external auditor said he was making about N5 million per month starting from the October period he shut it down. He is supposed to pay the company, that was part of the judgement," Ekpu stated

In yesterday' judgment, Justice Buba said that the respondents could not prove that they paid up for the shares. The Petitioners gave evidence to show that the second to third Respondents have blatantly failed to pay for the Shares in the Company. They have not showed how and when they paid for the said Shares. Nothing in paragraph 11 and 18A of the Respondents' Statement of Defence shows how they have paid for the Shares. There is no evidence in paragraph 3.0 that the Respondents have paid on or before 5th May, 2011.

The Respondents have only given their interpretation to that paragraph. Whatever monies they spent was spent on Daily Mirror and was confirmed by DW2 during cross examination. The N510million was supposed to be paid for Shares and not for any other purpose, there is no evidence to show that the Shares have been paid for. Besides, it was a company called Global Fleet' that paid the N14million, not any of the respondents who contracted with the first respondent", the judge ruled.

Justice Buba stated that the case of the Petitioners have merits. The court grants all the reliefs as set out on the petition at the inception of this case as follows: an order setting aside the contract entered into between the first and and Respondent Companies by virtue of document titled "Share Purchase Agreement" between Newswatch Communications Limited "Seller" and Global Media Mirror Limited "Buyer" and executed by the parties therein on or about May, 2011.

A Consequential Order setting aside the Form CAC2 Statement of Share Capital and Return of Allotment of Shares of the 1st Respondent company dated the 27th day of August, 2012 presented for filing by one Gloria A. Ukeje.

An Order directing the 2nd and 3rd Respondent jointly and severally to pay special damages in the sum of N15.7million to the 1st Respondent Company being loss of Business profits since August 2012 till October 2012 when the 1st Respondent's operations were unilaterally shut down by the 2nd and 3rd Respondents and to pay an average sum of N5million per month for every month that the 1st Respondent is shut down without production of its weekly magazine until the determination of this Suit."

The court held that it has come to the inevitable conclusion that the petitioners have discharged the burden placed on them and have proved their case while the first to fourth Respondents have failed woefully to discharge the burden placed on them.

Load-Date: October 21, 2014

Dele Giwa: Among Marwa, Amoda and Ogunade

The Sun (Nigeria)

December 20, 2016 Tuesday

Copyright 2016 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1003 words

Byline: Uche Atuma

Body

---

By Durotimi Daramola About three weeks ago, I was home in the evening glued to the television to follow

By Durotimi Daramola

About three weeks ago, I was home in the evening glued to the television to follow developments around the globe when my phone beeped. By the time I checked, it was a broadcast on one of the WhatsApp chat platforms that I belong to. Instantly, the caption of the post got my attention: "30 years after, the long-awaited confirmation about Dele Giwa's death."

As someone who has spent years in the intelligence and law enforcement community, I became inquisitive and wanted to read through the post to see if there were hard facts there. At the end, I was not only disappointed but also angry that the post was based on allegations made in an interview by one Dr. Taiyemiwo Ogunade some years ago.

An attempt by me to do a background check on the said Ogunade did not only yield volumes about his person but I was also able to establish through available materials that he was on a vendetta mission when he granted the interview back in 2009. But what manner of bitterness would make a man make two grievous allegations against two eminent Nigerians, respected professor of Political Economy, Muyibi Amoda, and the acclaimed, brilliant, retired General Buba Marwa, who had distinguished himself in the military and governance?

Ogunade had linked both gentlemen to an alleged $30 million grant deal in New York City College and Marwa to the death of celebrated journalist Dele Giwa, based on a story he claimed he heard from some soldiers several years ago. Both Ogunade and Amoda had worked at New York City College but the institution later sacked Ogunade.

Dele Giwa: Among Marwa, Amoda and Ogunade

Amoda provided the most profound response to Ogunade's obvious lies and as such I would like to quote a portion here before drawing conclusions:

"Ogunade implies that the negotiation between Brig-General Marwa and the City College was mediated by me; that I persuaded the college to receive the grant; but because of his protests, the college fired him and returned the money to Brig-General Marwa. This aspect of the story I can categorically state as a figment of a pathologically confused imagination. I never met Brig-General Marwa at City College or anywhere as the emissary of President Moses.

"Ogunade asserts that money was received by the college and that presumably would be through me. There was no such giving and receiving of $30 million at City College; City College returned no such grant, which should have been a grant to the Department of Black Studies of which I was the chair. There was, therefore, no such $30 million, which was returned to Brig-General Marwa; there was no such money, which was not returned to the treasury of the Nigerian government. "The City College drama in which President Moses, Amoda and Marwa featured was an evil invention of Ogunade. No such thing happened under President Moses and during my tenure as the Chair of Black Studies. If Ogunade could create such a story from his imaginings, can anyone doubt that his story about Dele Giwa is no invention?"

The reappearance of the discredited 2009 interview by Ogunade, in a manner that suggests it as new in December 2016 is worrisome. It is clearly a malicious attempt by person(s) to undermine the credibility of the two eminent personalities, assail the psyche of discerning minds and also malign the reputation of well-meaning Nigerians.

As a Nigerian, this obvious, deliberate and calculated attempt to taint the reputation of fellow citizens bothers me, hence my intervention. These falsehoods are malicious and concerning in equal measure.

Besides, memos published by Amoda also confirmed that he exchanged correspondence with General Chris Garuba and not Marwa, who had by then left as Nigeria's Defence Attaché to the UN.

Place the above side by side with this statement issued by Marwa's aide in 2009: "It is on record that, between 1983 and July 1986, Marwa was away in Harvard and University of Pittsburgh, USA, for post-graduate studies. Upon his return to Nigeria, he was posted to take command of the 233 Tank Battalion, Bauchi, in August 1986. That year, the battalion was selected for a test exercise, which is a rigorous military training that took place between August and November 1986.

"So, it is absurd and unimaginable that Ogunade will link Marwa, who was leading a training exercise for his battalion in faraway Bauchi, to the death of Dele Giwa in Lagos State. This is a callous story and deliberate falsehood.

"Beside his futile attempt to link Marwa to the death of Dele Giwa, Ogunade went ahead to narrate how Marwa signed a $30 million contract with the City University, New York, on behalf of the Nigerian government.

"Again, for the benefit of Nigerians, Marwa has NEVER met Ogunade anywhere neither did he sign any such contract with this college. As such, there was no basis for sharing any money that never existed. This is absolutely a fabrication."

But Ogunade's interview is not simply a botched, malicious attack on Amoda and Marwa's reputation, it is worse. It is moral obscenity and a malicious hijack of a Giwa family tragedy. The facts on the ground include:

Newswatch Magazine, founded by Dele Giwa, awarded Marwa "Nigerian Man of the Year, 1997." There was demonstrably no bad blood.

Even if one were to accept the military's involvement, a Lieutenant Colonel (Marwa's rank at the time) would have been too senior to serve as errand boy. In any case, Marwa was already a public figure and would have been easily recognised by the Giwa household.

Just as consequential, the lead investigator of Giwa's murder case, former Deputy Inspector-General of Police, Chris Omeben, conducted a lineup of suspects at the time, and none had anything with or resemblance to Marwa. Ogunade actually thinks it believable that Nigerian military officials would travel to New York and share what would be classified information with him. Why, as who, as what?

Dele Giwa: Among Marwa, Amoda and Ogunade

- Daramola sent this piece from Area 3, Abuja

Load-Date: December 20, 2016

---

End of Document

What a murderer said

The Nation (Nigeria)

August 9, 2022 Tuesday

Copyright 2022 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 427 words

Body

---

MY Lord, in our country, there are many assassinations, but nobody is doing something about it.' This was an unexpected and thought-provoking remark by Uduak Akpan, following his conviction for murder.

The State High Court in Uyo, Akwa Ibom State, on August 4, sentenced him to death by hanging. He had been accused of raping and killing a female job seeker, Iniubong Umoren, in April last year. The judge said the prosecution had proved the charges beyond doubt.

Akpan was accused of raping and killing Umoren on the outskirts of Uyo after he lured her to his family house with a fake job offer. Her remains were buried in a shallow grave at the place.

A report said the judge had asked Akpan if he would like to say 'something' to the court after his conviction. 'My Lord, I am not guilty,' he was reported to have responded. But the judge was said to have told him that the court had passed that stage, adding that the convict should say 'something' related to the case.

Akpan then made an observation on assassinations in the country. It is unclear why he made the remark, and what he expected to achieve by saying what he said.

It is curious that the convicted murderer seemed to have lamented the number of unresolved assassinations in the country. It was an unlikely lamentation from an unlikely source.

: UPDATED: Court sentences job seeker Umoren's murderer to death

But his comment deserves attention. His status as a condemned criminal does not detract from the credibility of his observation. It is true that there have been many unresolved murders in different parts of the country, including assassinations.

Notably, the Global Initiative Against Transnational Organised Crime, in its 2021 Global Assassination Monitor, said no fewer than 184 persons were assassinated by hit men in Nigeria and some other African countries in the period 2019 and 2020.

What a murderer said

The victims, according to the report, fell into eight target categories: politics and governance; local community; security; illicit markets; media; criminal justice; the private sector and the international community.

In Africa, the report said, 51 persons were killed in the local community; 57 in politics and governance; 28 in security; seven in illicit markets; five in the media; 10 in the criminal justice system; 12 in the private sector; and six in the international community.

Akpan's observation is relevant. Indeed, it can be described as a call to action. Hardball remembers the unresolved assassination of the journalist Dele Giwa, in 1986, and the politician Bola Ige, in 2001, for instance.

Load-Date: August 10, 2022

---

End of Document

Why I turned down IGP's secret invitation - Sunday Igboho

The Sun (Nigeria)

April 2, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 254 words

Byline: Ajiri Daniels

Body

---

From Oluseye Ojo, Ibadan

Popular Yoruba activist, Chief Sunday Adeyemo, fondly called Sunday Igboho, has given reasons why he turned down secret invitation sent to him by the Inspector-General of Police, Mohammed Adamu, to the Force Headquarters in Abuja.

The spokesperson for Igboho, Olayomi Koiki, who spoke via a video clip that has gone viral on the social media, said the invitation from IGP was brought to his principal's residence in Ibadan on Thursday, this week, by six police officers.

Koiki explained that the rejection of the letter was predicated on the grounds that prior experiences in the country showed that it's dangerous to receive such letter privately. He recalled a frontline journalist, Dele Giwa, received a letter bomb in 1986 and lost his life to it when he opened it.

He stated further that some months ago, his house was razed by some unknown arsonists and that he was attacked by some men in uniform on his way to Lagos, few weeks ago. He added that his mother's house was also attacked by some suspected herdsmen few weeks ago.

According to him, some men in military uniform allegedly surveying his house were also caught some days ago. But on Thursday, some police officers stormed his house to give him a letter of invitation to Abuja.

Koiki, however, stated that Igboho would honour the invitation if the IGP makes the invitation public so that members of the public would know whatever is going on.

Why I turned down IGP's secret invitation - Sunday Igboho

The post Why I turned down IGP's secret invitation - Sunday Igboho appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: April 2, 2021

---

End of Document

'Our history is rotting away': the newspaper archivists preserving Nigeria's past

The Guardian (London)

August 10, 2023 Thursday 6:00 AM GMT

Copyright 2023 The Guardian, a division of Transcontinental Media Group Inc. All Rights Reserved

the guardian

Section: GLOBAL DEVELOPMENT; Version:1

Length: 671 words

Byline: Ope Adetayo in Lagos

Highlight: Coups, civil wars, dictators, democracy ... all the headlines that tell the country's story since independence in 1960 are to be saved for posterity by an ambitious archive project

Body

---

In a quiet office in Lekki, an affluent suburb of Lagos, Nigeria, Boyega Adediran gingerly opens a 1997 copy of PM News and places a double-page spread on a large flatbed scanner. The newspaper was founded in 1994 but stopped printing physical copies in 2015.

Scans of the fragile pages are quality checked by Grace Abraham and saved to a server that currently holds more than 50,000 pages of what will become Nigeria's first interactive digital newspaper archive.

A nonprofit startup called Archivi.ng is attempting to digitise every edition of every newspaper – 50 in all – published in Nigeria since 1 January 1960, the year of independence from Britain.

The archive will launch its first tranche of documents in September. Dozens of volunteers have already spent months scouring libraries and meeting with publishers to get copies of old papers.

"Nigerian history is inaccessible online, and the greatest repository of that history is old newspapers," says Fu'ad Lawal, the founder of Archivi.ng. "The newspapers from our history are rotting away in libraries and private archives, and our mission is to stop the erasure and recapture all the history before we lose them for ever."

Allegra Ayida, a Nigerian doctoral researcher in history at Yale University who hopes to use the archive when it launches, says: "This exciting project fills an important gap in both accessibility and centralisation of a large volume of information."

'Our history is rotting away': the newspaper archivists preserving Nigeria's past

"The potential of having a newspaper archive since independence would allow the tracing of Nigerian history across 60 years in a country that has had 15 different leaders, five military coups, a bitter civil war, an annulled election, an interim administration and a brutal dictatorship," she says.

Since independence, history has been removed then reintroduced to the school curriculum, depending on who was in power in Nigeria's revolving door of military dictatorships before democracy was restored in 1999.

In 2009, under President Yar'Adua, history was removed from the curriculum, ostensibly because there were not enough teachers. Last year, the then president, Muhammadu Buhari, made the subject compulsory again.

Lawal has been surprised by the level of detail printed about the military coups and how much resistance there was among editors. Newspaper offices would often be raided or shut down by the government, and journalists faced intimidation, arrest and even death. One celebrated journalist, Dele Giwa, was killed by a parcel bomb in 1986 during Ibrahim Babangida's presidency.

The best that has happened to us is democracy. There is so much we don't know about the fine details of those times

Fu'ad Lawal, Archivi.ng founder

"The biggest discovery is not a single story. It is a series of events, the zeitgeist," Lawal says. "We know so little about the amount of resistance that the military government met. So when Nigerians say, 'We need someone with strong hands', I say we don't. The best thing that has happened to us is democracy. There is so much we don't know about the fine details of those times, and how they shaped our present."

Lawal believes a lack of publicly accessible historical data contributed to Buhari's return to power in 2015. He previously ruled between 1983 and 1985 following a military coup.

"Without documentation, we have false nostalgia because if you looked at Buhari's eight years [in his second term], it's like entering a deep cryogenic sleep in 1985 and waking up in 2015. He just continued where he stopped in terms of policies and governance," says Lawal.

Archivi.ng raised $15,000 in public donations for the archive, but needs $100,000 to complete the project.

The biggest challenge, however, is navigating Nigeria's intellectual property law, which classifies newspapers as "literary works", meaning reproduction of any kind needs the publishers' permission. According to Lawal, some have been reluctant to help.

"We are doing the infrastructural work, we are digging the well [of information] for people to come and fetch," he says.

Load-Date: August 14, 2023

At Babangida's 80th Birthday Lecture, Panelists Address His Challenges

This Day (Lagos)

August 13, 2021

Copyright 2021 This Day Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 1204 words

Byline: Chuks Okocha

Dateline: Abuja

Body

---

Some elder statesmen and eminent Nigerians, many of whom played key roles in the administration of former Military President Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida, have come out to address some of the age-long thoughts about his leadership, with a view to owning their own narrative.

Those who took the pain to explain away some of the issues that have stigmatised Babangida included a former Head of State, Abdulsalami Abubakar; a member of the defunct Armed Forces Ruling Council, Gen. Haliru Akilu, and a member of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) Board of Trustees (BoT), Chief Emmanuel Iwuanyanwu.

They addressed issues as the annulment of the June 12, 1993 presidential election, the mindless killing of a renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, and the killing of Mamman Vasta in the wake of the foiled 1996 coup.

They all spoke at the maiden edition of IBB legacy dialogue, which is one of the products of the IBB and Maryam Babangida Presidential Library. The colloquium was designed as part of events to mark Babangida's 80th birthday coming up next Tuesday, August 17.

Generally, the speakers called on leaders across the country to emulate the inclusive leadership qualities of the former military president in managing Nigeria's multi-ethnic polity and raised concern over the retrogression of intellectualism in governance.

They also expressed concern about poor handling of Nigeria's multi-ethnic nature, and set the agenda for the future. They said future leaders of the country should have a broad network of friends across the country in order to ascertain the true situation of things across Nigeria.

Reflecting on his relationship with Babangida, Iwuanyanwu, who echoed the need for inclusive government, however, defended IBB over June 12 annulment and described the news that he killed Dele Giwa as fake.

Iwuanyanwu stated, "I am not worried about the stories about IBB. A leader must be swift to respond to false comments about him. That story on Dele Giwa is fake news. not properly responded to."

"On the cancellation of the June 12 election, none of the council members protested or resigned, because of the cancellation of the result. Maybe after this, the narrative will improve."

At Babangida's 80th Birthday Lecture, Panelists Address His Challenges

Iwuanyanwu, who said IBB impressed him as a friend and leader in many dimensions, hailed his inclusive leadership abilities in a multi-ethnic country like Nigeria.

While appreciating his leadership qualities, Iwuanyanwu said, "When you assume leadership of a multi-ethnic country, you must carry everybody along."

He urged secessionist groups to desist from stoking the embers of war, noting that having experienced war just like Babangida, it was not a tea party.

Iwuanyanwu said, "We are warning the younger ones causing trouble, it is not a tea party. I fought in the war and he (Babangida) fought and we suffered injuries." He added that when Babangida came to power, he assured those who fought the war on the side of Biafra of inclusion and "he made it real."

Iwuanyanwu explained, "He (Babangida) had people of all parts working for him. It is an example other leaders must learn. He didn't neglect any ethnic group; he carried them all along. To have confidence in a people called rebels is why Igbos have confidence in IBB. He married our daughter. He gave us respect."

The PDP BoT member recalled that Babangida founded the Raw Materials Development Council in order to address the way foreigners were exporting raw materials from the country.

Recalling how the former president spent the whole day at his hometown in Imo State, when he buried his father, Iwuanyanwu said, "He is an excellent leader. He is being misrepresented. All leaders are misrepresented. But it is for the leader to tell his story if he does not tell it others will tell it for him. He should say with joy that I came, saw and conquered."

Akilu, on his part, defended IBB over the killing of Vasta.

He said, "As for those bringing the case of Vasta, they should go and dig deeper and find out what happened. We were there and we had a tribunal that looked into the case. If Gen Vasta were innocent, nobody would have convicted him. Unfortunately, he was the most senior officer behind the attempted coup in 1986. So, people should not jump to conclusions."

Akilu said he was attracted to Babangida during the civil war, when Babangida, as a young military officer, defended a junior officer from a bully military officer.

"There was an incident that attracted me to him. He stood up for a junior officer, who was being bullied. He cared for the junior officers working under him," he said.

He described Babangida as a gifted person, who is kind to a fault. Akilu recalled how the former military president gave out his only car to a friend, who needed it.

Akilu said, "His loyalty to his friends is legendary. He will never betray you no matter what. He will never forsake his friends. If you are his friend, he will never abandon you."

He lamented the failure of successive administrations to follow in the steps of Babangida in building more barracks for the military so that the military will have comfort.

"I thought that successive administrations would build more barracks but no additional barracks have been built for the military."

Akilu decried the lack of maintenance of the federal secretariat, which was built by the Babangida regime.

On the relocation of the federal capital territory from Lagos to Abuja, Akilu said, "He was courageous to take the right decision at the right place and time even when many of us were saying it was not the right time."

In his contribution on "how he built his tribe", Abubakar, extolled the virtues of the former military president and underscored the need for leaders in the country to carry everybody along in a multi-ethnic country like Nigeria.

At Babangida's 80th Birthday Lecture, Panelists Address His Challenges

Abubakar, while underscoring the leadership qualities that endeared Babangida to many Nigerians, said, "Once you are a leader, everybody is yours. You are supposed to look after the welfare of all of them."

Abubakar, who recalled his early childhood years with Babangida, said the former military president displayed leadership qualities from a young age, serving as class monitor in primary school and later as head boy in secondary school.

Regretting that the Babangida was one of the most misunderstood Nigerians, Abubakar noted that Babangida has the love of Nigeria at heart.

He reflected on the institutions established under the Babangida administration, adding that Nigerians are now reaping the fruits of the numerous agencies created under his watch.

The former head of state said, "IBB has the love of the country in his heart. He is one of the most misunderstood Nigerians but by and large, you can see that what he has established over the years; we are seeing the benefits. Abuja is one of the greatest and fastest growing capitals in the world. He is quite accommodating and generous to a fault. He can deprive himself to make sure someone is okay."

Other dignitaries at the event included former governor of Niger State, Babangida Aliyu; former Senate President David Mark; former Minister of Information, Prof. Jerry Gana; former Minister of Education, Prof Tunde Adeniran; media mogul and Chairman of Daar Communication Group, Raymond Dopkesi; and Gen Olagunsoye Oyinlola.

Load-Date: August 13, 2021

---

End of Document

Kaleidoscope: an artist's rite of passage

The Nation (Nigeria)

August 30, 2022 Tuesday

Copyright 2022 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1151 words

Body

---

July 27. Like a general being pulled out after eons on the battle front, Toni Anthony Ogunde began the first stage of his exit from the Yaba Art front, at 65, in 2023.

The curators dubbed the show 'Kaleidoscope: An exhibition and discourse on the practice of Toni Anthony Ogunde'. It was at the Yusuf Grillo Art Gallery, Yaba College of Technology (Yabatech), Nigeria's first-ever tertiary institution.

Kaleidoscope was, indeed, an art exhibition of history, trends, culture, evolution and well, deep and punishing thinking, though expressed in strokes of all moods: colourful and bright; dark and dank.

But on the day, another epic irony played out: a regal custodian of African tradition was a victim of 'African time' - a contemporary vice, though blamed on Africa's past.

Indeed, in Camara Laye's The Raddiance of the King, the author tried to romanticize the flexible African concept of time, in the Euro-African culture clash of that novel.

But here, an African King, real life, chaffed at that notoriety of non-punctuality, which the modern elite nevertheless blithely blame on their 'African' past. On that, they expect everyone to understand.

Well, Oba Adebisi Okubanjo, the Obiri of Ayepe-Ijebu, in Ogun State, didn't - and he showed it with dignified royal unease. To honour the celebrator, a boyhood friend and classmate at the Odogbolu Grammar School, Odogbolu (OGS), he had left his kingdom at around 6:30 am, for an event slated for 11 am.

When Ripples breezed into the venue, roughly around 11 am, the Kabiyesi was already seated. Light music was on; and guests were already filling up the space. Yet, the event was nowhere near starting - the lateness blamed on some clash of meetings.

Oba Okubanjo was billed to attend a 1 pm meeting at the palace of the Awujale of Ijebu Ode, the paramount ruler of the Ijebu. But to accommodate his Lagos Kaleidoscope engagement, he had asked that the meeting be pushed to 3 pm.

Kaleidoscope: an artist's rite of passage

Yet, it was well-nigh 1 pm - almost two hours late - and the Kabiyesi still patiently waited. Meanwhile, Alaba Olusoga and Ripples, made up the OGS early birds. Deji Cole, another old mate, would breeze in much later.

Mercifully, the event started around 1 pm, after Obafemi Omokungbe, an engineer and Yabatech Rector, strode in. It was the sole dark patch on an otherwise glorious day.

But even as the wait wore on, a video clip served the guests what would pass for Toni Anthony's answer to James Joyce's alter-ego biography: A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man.

As soft music played, the clips beamed the many landmarks, personal and career, of the artist and dress non-conformist - the bohemian ethos of the artists' commune.

Even then, one clip stood out: the artist's meeting with the Great Alhaji Lateef Jakande, iconic journalist and visionary 2nd Republic Lagos Governor.

It was ode to glorious symbiosis - the artist impacting his environment as much as the environment had impacted him. That, of course, was the 'meat' of the rich visual exhibition to shortly follow.

From the starting point, though late, Kaleidoscope offered nothing but sumptuous and filling visual feast.

For starters, the exhibitor's many monikers were as kaleidoscopic as his bewildering oeuvre of cross-media art: Ogunde. Otunba. Comrade. King of boys. Toni Anthony. Salt of the soil ... all endearing terms.

To be sure, Ogunde is no alias. That's his real name: Anthony Bandele Ogunde. But perhaps only the Oko-Oke boys, his old classmates, would call him that: just Ogunde.

Not Dele, his first name. Never Anthony, his baptismal - who even knew that, at the bloom of boyhood; at the cusp of teens: the age of questioning and experimentation; the epoch of rebellion?

The monikers belonged to a latter era: the Yaba years. Ogunde's elder brother testified at the event that 'King of Boys' might have dated back to his sibling's student days, when he lived in the boys' quarters of an uncle's official quarters, on the Yabatech campus - a facility the free and feisty soul threw open to all and sundry.

Otunba. Salt of the soil. Toni Anthony would later segue into the artist's large presence, on Yaba Art's very wide canvas, in the unending dialogue between the Gown, from where Toni Anthony's strokes jutted out; and the Town, the community that the painter moulded into endless experimentations and improvisations, as decreed by his creative muse, in bouts after bouts of creative perspiration.

That much was clear from the pieces of audacious art on display.

The very first, 'Kuru pa kuru', beams ram fighting, a sporty yet dangerous treat on the Lagos landscape - cultural kaleidoscope? - each time the Ileya Muslim festival was in the air.

Now, that could be lethal sports! Many a youth preened and crowed over their champion ram, which somehow had out-butted and subdued others. But other youths sometimes turned their festive homes into grief when it all turned fatal - and their ill-fated ram, near-fatally butted, is rushed to the slaughter, with life seeping out of it!

The artist captured that grim, bitter-sweet drama in simple black-and-white strokes.

But perhaps the most densely poetic, yet ultra-simple in colourful strokes, is 'Dele-Cases' - the tragedy of three 'Deles', as creatively captured by another Dele, from his artistic observatory.

He pushed the linguistic pun of: 'Dele' for 'daily', to tell a grim but simple tale: many of Nigeria's daily tragedies need not happen! That remarkable piece of telling symbolism birthed in 1989.

Kaleidoscope: an artist's rite of passage

In 'Dele-Cases', the academic cap symbolized the late Prof. Dele Awojobi, the University of Lagos mechanical engineering whiz, who practically cut short his illustrious life, by 'over-thinking' the Nigerian quagmire, during the 2nd Republic (1979-1983).

The fountain pen symbolized that avant-garde journalist, Dele Giwa, among the quad that introduced weekly newsmagazine journalism into the Nigerian market, with the flagship Newswatch, now defunct. Dele Giwa was parcel-bombed, during the Ibrahim Babaginda junta (1985-1993) - a brazen murder yet to be resolved.

The third symbol, an athlete's spike shoe, sunk in blood-stained grass, belonged to Dele Udoh, a patriot and star athlete, cut short by rogue police bullets!

The three were yoked together in common but avoidable tragedy! But they were lucky to have another 'Dele' sketch out their odyssey in sombre yet brilliant art - 'Dele-Cases'!

'Otunba's flair for crowdedness is brought to bear in the harvest brush strokes of colours,' wrote Pius Ehita Egiolamhen, PhD, Dean, School of Art Design and Printing, Yabatech, in a special commemorative brochure, 'which are composed into a visual language to provoke, instigate and inspire ...'

Kaleidoscope delivered on all these fronts - and more. Toni Anthony proved that he indeed learnt at the feet of Prof. Yusuf Grillo, Dr. Kolade Oshinowo and the very best of Yaba School of Art. But Gown or Town, the artistic feast goes on.

Load-Date: August 31, 2022

---

End of Document

A Rare Ray

Sunday Trust

August 13, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Media Trust Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1501 words

Body

---

Some days could be bleak , cloudy , depressing, dull, sad, traumatic all at once, but once a rare ray of brilliance shines through, the whole atmosphere changes into brightness and joy. This is exactly what happens when one grabs the work of one of the few standing apostles of outstanding journalism in Nigeria at present. As a field marshal in the pen wielding forces of the world, Ray has had an impact far beyond his imagination. At least two men I know have testified publicly that Ray, by the sheer hold he has had on his readers, has disrupted relationships involving them which may or may not have become successful in the long run due to incompatibility or irreconcilable differences.

The first man, a medical doctor, poet and the author of 'The Crumbs Eaters' , a novel, confessed how his beautiful fiancee, then a final year student of Mass Communication in a Nigerian University lost him. She was on a visit and during their small talk, he had asked casually if she had read the latest column written by Ray in _Newswatch_ and the young lady blurted out 'Ray? What's that ?' The man reportedly responded, 'It's not what but who!' The girl retorted, 'So who is that ? Who is this Ray?' She had asked in majestic ignorance. She had thought it was a huge joke but her man could not understand why a student at that level didn't just know the name. When she drew blank on a question whether she had seen a copy of _Newswatch_ ever, the young man lost his cool and appetite for all the endowments of a young lady who had nearly become his life partner. The physician had wondered how on Earth a final year student 'studying' to earn a degree in a discipline which Ray was famous for globally didn't know him by repute nor ever read his incisive, enlightening and oftentimes mind-blowing articles. The doctor walked the girl out of his house and walked out of the relationship for good. Today, he lives happily married to a delectable woman who is a voracious reader of books, newspapers and news magazines like him. 'This one knew who Ray was instantly without long talk or arguments,' the medical doctor would say gleefully like a young man who just fell in love, adding, 'we can engage intellectually on events and ideas about any subject matter under the sun.'

The second told me about how he had exchanged blows with his roommate in the University when that mate angrily snatched a piece of paper used in wrapping groundnut which he had picked along the street and kept in the room. The piece of newspaper carried a column written by Ray Ekpu and the mast head had 'The Nigerian Chronicle' and the year was 1976. The friend had wondered what his mate had found so interesting in an old 'waste paper' which was only useful to groundnut and Akara ball sellers. That is how tight the grip one of Nigeria's most outstanding journalists had and still has on his readers.

A Rare Ray

One is cocksure that just like the rays of the sun, this incomparable Ray from the sleepy backwoods of Ikot Udo Osiom in Ukanafun local Government Area of Akwa Ibom doesn't know that his deep piercing stories broke down some relationships especially those who were unaware of his existence and contributions as a public intellectual spanning half a century since he first happened on the scene in 1974.

Brain Drain: Nigeria should embrace indigenous production of laboratory tools- NBTE

Coup: PDP warns FG on war with Niger

The Inimitable Columnist is one of the few professionals in his field who straddled the different models of ownership in the media industry. He started out in the dangerous industry during the first military rule ; an equally precarious season for those who work in the sector. His sojourn in the Nigerian Chronicle, government owned, published by then South Eastern State government where he rose to become an Editor caught the sustained attention of consumers of his frank interventions and they invited him over to Lagos, the heartbeat of Nigeria and the media sector. He was to sit at the helm of Sunday Times , then , arguably the most respectable medium in Africa. Those who tapped him had thought he was wasting his sweetness in the 'desert air' of Calabar. His now bigger weekly platform churned out mind-stimulating and satisfying menus every Sunday and helped make readers to look forward to the publication. Circulation rose and the Audit Bureau of Circulation reported sales figures of five hundred thousand copies every week ! The nonpareil Editor felt fulfilled that his ink dripped honey and attracted readers as moths to light. However, his non-conformity soon rubbed off on the wrong side of his employers who sent him 'downstairs' to 'Business Times', perhaps, to teach him a lesson but if that was a lesson, his articles boosted the fortunes of the Business weekly and did not diminish his stature a bit.

Given that it is difficult to ignore the sun at its brilliant best, an invitation to join the National Concord stable, a privately owned chain liberated him from bowing to the expectations of politicians of the ruling Party who wanted lap dogs as Editors. The son of a village Court messenger even at The Nigerian Chronicle whose proprietor was a military Governor was not one to bless the mess of authority figures, their surrogates, dependants and accomplices. And that again, led to his departure, with his friends: Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed to team up with Dan Agbese to establish and run Newswatch , perhaps the first experiment by a group of former Editors in Nigeria venturing into and trying to walk the tight rope of the business of journalism. They became Editor Publishers.

Newswatch served to open his eyes and those of his friends that they were 'jogging in the jungle': in an out of prison, in and out of Court rooms, being trailed by agents of government and proscription. In fact, the man still lives in shock of any thundering sound - the effect and scar of the parcel bomb blast which sent his comrade in arms, the equally legendary Dele Giwa to early death.

If there is one professional who holds dear to his heart the purest philosophical ideals of libertarian journalism, Ray fits the bill. The 1986 World Editor of the year , despite the rough and tumble of the seasons has stayed true and remains an uncompromising apostle of the Vigilante, Agenda setting and diligent Gate-keeping role perception of operatives in the fourth estate of the realm. He doesn't believe that charlatans and con artists should find accommodation in the media space.

Born on August 6, 1948, Ray Ekpu, the former Chief Executive Officer of Newswatch Communications Ltd, now of May 5 Media, is a recipient of several honours and awards, including that of International Editor of the Year ( 1987), Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award ( 2018) and Vanguard Man of the Year Award (2022).

He Is also a former President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria, NPAN. However, the quintessential man of letters is enthused about two honours done him in his home State. The first being the offer to name the Department of Mass Communication of the State owned Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua, Ikot Ekpene after him and the most recent institution by one of his admirers, Mr Udom Inoyo, of the Annual Ray Ekpu prize for Investigative journalism worth five hundred thousand Naira for journalists practicing in Akwa Ibom State. This last award seems to embody Ray's lifetime commitment to promote excellence and ethics in media practice. He loves it because of its currency. Previous honours belong in the past. The Award on Investigative journalism is in perpetuity , a sustainable legacy to his strides and stripes in the field.

A Rare Ray

The odyssey of this rare ray that pierced through the sleepy backwoods of Ukanafun, shone through Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, illuminated the Department of Mass Communication of the University of Lagos, lit up the pages of the Newspapers in the Chronicle stable and who captured the imagination of an entire nation is a story of heroes. Although his country still moves 'in circles', Ray Ekpu should be satisfied that he has done his bit in the best way possible.

If Ray Ekpu were to be a bird, methinks he would have been a nightingale - 'the bird with the most number of powerful and sweet songs' . Ray has written several thousands of deep, inspiring , enjoyable but serious , scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times.The bold activist journalist is a survivor. Although bereft of the flamboyant lifestyle of those who have compromised the high ideals of his chosen profession , his trail still glows and cannot be extinguished.

On this day of the rare Ray of Journalism, one wishes a happy birthday to an amazing 'pen pusher' who caught national and global attention and for whom the world beat a bush path to find.

Shine steadily, and Happy 75th birthday, Raymond Amos Ekpu.

DR UDEME NANA, a Media Scholar is the FOUNDER, UYO BOOK CLUB.

Load-Date: August 13, 2023

---

End of Document

A Rare Ray

This Day

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 THISDAY NEWSPAPERS LTD. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1482 words

Body

---

By Udeme Nana

Some days could be bleak , cloudy , depressing, dull, sad, traumatic all at once, but once a rare ray of brilliance shines through, the whole atmosphere changes into brightness and joy. This is exactly what happens when one grabs the work of one of the few standing apostles of outstanding journalism in Nigeria at present. As a field marshal in the pen wielding forces of the world, Ray has had an impact far beyond his imagination. At least two men I know have testified publicly that Ray, by the sheer hold he has had on his readers, has disrupted relationships involving them which may or may not have become successful in the long run due to incompatibility or irreconcilable differences.

The first man, a medical doctor, poet and the author of 'The Crumbs Eaters' , a novel, confessed how his beautiful fiancee, then a final year student of Mass Communication in a Nigerian University lost him. She was on a visit and during their small talk, he had asked casually if she had read the latest column written by Ray in Newswatch and the young lady blurted out "Ray? What's that ?" The man reportedly responded, "It's not what but who!" The girl retorted, "So who is that ? Who is this Ray?" She had asked in majestic ignorance. She had thought it was a huge joke but her man could not understand why a student at that level didn't just know the name. When she drew blank on a question whether she had seen a copy of Newswatch ever, the young man lost his cool and appetite for all the endowments of a young lady who had nearly become his life partner. The physician had wondered how on Earth a final year student 'studying' to earn a degree in a discipline which Ray was famous for globally didn't know him by repute nor ever read his incisive, enlightening and oftentimes mind-blowing articles. The doctor walked the girl out of his house and walked out of the relationship for good. Today, he lives happily married to a delectable woman who is a voracious reader of books, newspapers and news magazines like him. "This one knew who Ray was instantly without long talk or arguments," the medical doctor would say gleefully like a young man who just fell in love, adding, "we can engage intellectually on events and ideas about any subject matter under the sun."

A Rare Ray

The second told me about how he had exchanged blows with his room mate in the University when that mate angrily snatched a piece of paper used in wrapping groundnut which he had picked along the street and kept in the room. The piece of newspaper carried a column written by Ray Ekpu and the mast head had 'The Nigerian Chronicle' and the year was 1976. The friend had wondered what his mate had found so interesting in an old 'waste paper' which was only useful to groundnut and Akara ball sellers. That is how tight the grip one of Nigeria's most outstanding journalists had and still has on his readers.

One is cocksure that just like the rays of the sun, this incomparable Ray from the sleepy backwoods of Ikot Udo Osiom in Ukanafun local Government Area of Akwa Ibom doesn't know that his deep piercing stories broke down some relationships especially those who were unaware of his existence and contributions as a public intellectual spanning half a century since he first happened on the scene in 1974.

The Inimitable Columnist is one of the few professionals in his field who straddled the different models of ownership in the media industry. He started out in the dangerous industry during the first military rule ; an equally precarious season for those who work in the sector. His sojourn in the Nigerian Chronicle, government owned, published by then South Eastern State government where he rose to become an Editor caught the sustained attention of consumers of his frank interventions and they invited him over to Lagos, the heartbeat of Nigeria and the media sector. He was to sit at the helm of Sunday Times , then , arguably the most respectable medium in Africa. Those who tapped him had thought he was wasting his sweetness in the 'desert air' of Calabar. His now bigger weekly platform churned out mind-stimulating and satisfying menus every Sunday and helped make readers to look forward to the publication. Circulation rose and the Audit Bureau of Circulation reported sales figures of five hundred thousand copies every week ! The nonpareil Editor felt fulfilled that his ink dripped honey and attracted readers as moths to light. However, his non-conformity soon rubbed off on the wrong side of his employers who sent him 'downstairs' to "Business Times", perhaps, to teach him a lesson but if that was a lesson, his articles boosted the fortunes of the Business weekly and did not diminish his stature a bit.

Given that it is difficult to ignore the sun at its brilliant best, an invitation to join the National Concord stable, a privately owned chain liberated him from bowing to the expectations of politicians of the ruling Party who wanted lap dogs as Editors. The son of a village Court messenger even at The Nigerian Chronicle whose proprietor was a military Governor was not one to bless the mess of authority figures, their surrogates, dependants and accomplices. And that again, led to his departure, with his friends: Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed to team up with Dan Agbese to establish and run Newswatch, perhaps the first experiment by a group of former Editors in Nigeria venturing into and trying to walk the tight rope of the business of journalism. They became Editor Publishers.

Newswatch served to open his eyes and those of his friends that they were 'jogging in the jungle': in an out of prison, in and out of Court rooms, being trailed by agents of government and proscription. In fact, the man still lives in shock of any thundering sound - the effect and scar of the parcel bomb blast which sent his comrade in arms, the equally legendary Dele Giwa to early death.

If there is one professional who holds dear to his heart the purest philosophical ideals of libertarian journalism, Ray fits the bill. The 1986 World Editor of the year , despite the rough and tumble of the seasons has stayed true and remains an uncompromising apostle of the Vigilante, Agenda setting and diligent Gate-keeping role perception of operatives in the fourth estate of the realm. He doesn't believe that charlatans and con artists should find accommodation in the media space.

Born on August 6, 1948, Ray Ekpu, the former Chief Executive Officer of Newswatch Communications Ltd, now of May 5 Media, is a recipient of several honours and awards, including that of International Editor of the Year ( 1987), Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award (2018) and Vanguard Man of the Year Award (2022).

He Is also a former President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria, NPAN. However, the quintessential man of letters is enthused about two honours done him in his home State. The first being the offer to name the Department of Mass Communication of the State owned Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua, Ikot Ekpene after him and the most recent institution by one of his admirers, Mr Udom Inoyo, of the Annual Ray Ekpu prize for Investigative journalism worth five hundred thousand Naira for journalists practicing in Akwa Ibom State. This last award seems to embody Ray's lifetime commitment to promote excellence and ethics in media practice. He loves it because of its currency. Previous honours belong in the past. The Award on Investigative journalism is in perpetuity , a sustainable legacy to his strides and stripes in the field.

A Rare Ray

The odyssey of this rare ray that pierced through the sleepy backwoods of Ukanafun, shone through Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, illuminated the Department of Mass Communication of the University of Lagos, lit up the pages of the Newspapers in the Chronicle stable and who captured the imagination of an entire nation is a story of heroes. Although his country still moves "in circles", Ray Ekpu should be satisfied that he has done his bit in the best way possible.

If Ray Ekpu were to be a bird, methinks he would have been a nightingale - 'the bird with the most number of powerful and sweet songs' . Ray has written several thousands of deep, inspiring , enjoyable but serious , scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times.The bold activist journalist is a survivor. Although bereft of the flamboyant lifestyle of those who have compromised the high ideals of his chosen profession , his trail still glows and cannot be extinguished.

On this day of the rare Ray of Journalism, one wishes a happy birthday to an amazing 'pen pusher' who caught national and global attention and for whom the world beat a bush path to find.

Shine steadily, and Happy 75th birthday, Raymond Amos Ekpu.

*Dr. Udeme Nana, a media scholar, is the founder of Uyo Book Club

Load-Date: August 18, 2023

---

End of Document

A Rare Ray

Weekly Trust

August 12, 2023 Saturday

Copyright 2023 Media Trust Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1501 words

Body

---

Some days could be bleak , cloudy , depressing, dull, sad, traumatic all at once, but once a rare ray of brilliance shines through, the whole atmosphere changes into brightness and joy. This is exactly what happens when one grabs the work of one of the few standing apostles of outstanding journalism in Nigeria at present. As a field marshal in the pen wielding forces of the world, Ray has had an impact far beyond his imagination. At least two men I know have testified publicly that Ray, by the sheer hold he has had on his readers, has disrupted relationships involving them which may or may not have become successful in the long run due to incompatibility or irreconcilable differences.

The first man, a medical doctor, poet and the author of 'The Crumbs Eaters' , a novel, confessed how his beautiful fiancee, then a final year student of Mass Communication in a Nigerian University lost him. She was on a visit and during their small talk, he had asked casually if she had read the latest column written by Ray in _Newswatch_ and the young lady blurted out 'Ray? What's that ?' The man reportedly responded, 'It's not what but who!' The girl retorted, 'So who is that ? Who is this Ray?' She had asked in majestic ignorance. She had thought it was a huge joke but her man could not understand why a student at that level didn't just know the name. When she drew blank on a question whether she had seen a copy of _Newswatch_ ever, the young man lost his cool and appetite for all the endowments of a young lady who had nearly become his life partner. The physician had wondered how on Earth a final year student 'studying' to earn a degree in a discipline which Ray was famous for globally didn't know him by repute nor ever read his incisive, enlightening and oftentimes mind-blowing articles. The doctor walked the girl out of his house and walked out of the relationship for good. Today, he lives happily married to a delectable woman who is a voracious reader of books, newspapers and news magazines like him. 'This one knew who Ray was instantly without long talk or arguments,' the medical doctor would say gleefully like a young man who just fell in love, adding, 'we can engage intellectually on events and ideas about any subject matter under the sun.'

The second told me about how he had exchanged blows with his roommate in the University when that mate angrily snatched a piece of paper used in wrapping groundnut which he had picked along the street and kept in the room. The piece of newspaper carried a column written by Ray Ekpu and the mast head had 'The Nigerian Chronicle' and the year was 1976. The friend had wondered what his mate had found so interesting in an old 'waste paper' which was only useful to groundnut and Akara ball sellers. That is how tight the grip one of Nigeria's most outstanding journalists had and still has on his readers.

A Rare Ray

One is cocksure that just like the rays of the sun, this incomparable Ray from the sleepy backwoods of Ikot Udo Osiom in Ukanafun local Government Area of Akwa Ibom doesn't know that his deep piercing stories broke down some relationships especially those who were unaware of his existence and contributions as a public intellectual spanning half a century since he first happened on the scene in 1974.

Brain Drain: Nigeria should embrace indigenous production of laboratory tools- NBTE

Coup: PDP warns FG on war with Niger

The Inimitable Columnist is one of the few professionals in his field who straddled the different models of ownership in the media industry. He started out in the dangerous industry during the first military rule ; an equally precarious season for those who work in the sector. His sojourn in the Nigerian Chronicle, government owned, published by then South Eastern State government where he rose to become an Editor caught the sustained attention of consumers of his frank interventions and they invited him over to Lagos, the heartbeat of Nigeria and the media sector. He was to sit at the helm of Sunday Times , then , arguably the most respectable medium in Africa. Those who tapped him had thought he was wasting his sweetness in the 'desert air' of Calabar. His now bigger weekly platform churned out mind-stimulating and satisfying menus every Sunday and helped make readers to look forward to the publication. Circulation rose and the Audit Bureau of Circulation reported sales figures of five hundred thousand copies every week ! The nonpareil Editor felt fulfilled that his ink dripped honey and attracted readers as moths to light. However, his non-conformity soon rubbed off on the wrong side of his employers who sent him 'downstairs' to 'Business Times', perhaps, to teach him a lesson but if that was a lesson, his articles boosted the fortunes of the Business weekly and did not diminish his stature a bit.

Given that it is difficult to ignore the sun at its brilliant best, an invitation to join the National Concord stable, a privately owned chain liberated him from bowing to the expectations of politicians of the ruling Party who wanted lap dogs as Editors. The son of a village Court messenger even at The Nigerian Chronicle whose proprietor was a military Governor was not one to bless the mess of authority figures, their surrogates, dependants and accomplices. And that again, led to his departure, with his friends: Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed to team up with Dan Agbese to establish and run Newswatch , perhaps the first experiment by a group of former Editors in Nigeria venturing into and trying to walk the tight rope of the business of journalism. They became Editor Publishers.

Newswatch served to open his eyes and those of his friends that they were 'jogging in the jungle': in an out of prison, in and out of Court rooms, being trailed by agents of government and proscription. In fact, the man still lives in shock of any thundering sound - the effect and scar of the parcel bomb blast which sent his comrade in arms, the equally legendary Dele Giwa to early death.

If there is one professional who holds dear to his heart the purest philosophical ideals of libertarian journalism, Ray fits the bill. The 1986 World Editor of the year , despite the rough and tumble of the seasons has stayed true and remains an uncompromising apostle of the Vigilante, Agenda setting and diligent Gate-keeping role perception of operatives in the fourth estate of the realm. He doesn't believe that charlatans and con artists should find accommodation in the media space.

Born on August 6, 1948, Ray Ekpu, the former Chief Executive Officer of Newswatch Communications Ltd, now of May 5 Media, is a recipient of several honours and awards, including that of International Editor of the Year ( 1987), Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award ( 2018) and Vanguard Man of the Year Award (2022).

He Is also a former President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria, NPAN. However, the quintessential man of letters is enthused about two honours done him in his home State. The first being the offer to name the Department of Mass Communication of the State owned Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua, Ikot Ekpene after him and the most recent institution by one of his admirers, Mr Udom Inoyo, of the Annual Ray Ekpu prize for Investigative journalism worth five hundred thousand Naira for journalists practicing in Akwa Ibom State. This last award seems to embody Ray's lifetime commitment to promote excellence and ethics in media practice. He loves it because of its currency. Previous honours belong in the past. The Award on Investigative journalism is in perpetuity , a sustainable legacy to his strides and stripes in the field.

A Rare Ray

The odyssey of this rare ray that pierced through the sleepy backwoods of Ukanafun, shone through Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, illuminated the Department of Mass Communication of the University of Lagos, lit up the pages of the Newspapers in the Chronicle stable and who captured the imagination of an entire nation is a story of heroes. Although his country still moves 'in circles', Ray Ekpu should be satisfied that he has done his bit in the best way possible.

If Ray Ekpu were to be a bird, methinks he would have been a nightingale - 'the bird with the most number of powerful and sweet songs' . Ray has written several thousands of deep, inspiring , enjoyable but serious , scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times.The bold activist journalist is a survivor. Although bereft of the flamboyant lifestyle of those who have compromised the high ideals of his chosen profession , his trail still glows and cannot be extinguished.

On this day of the rare Ray of Journalism, one wishes a happy birthday to an amazing 'pen pusher' who caught national and global attention and for whom the world beat a bush path to find.

Shine steadily, and Happy 75th birthday, Raymond Amos Ekpu.

DR UDEME NANA, a Media Scholar is the FOUNDER, UYO BOOK CLUB.

Load-Date: August 12, 2023

---

End of Document

Why I Couldn't Investigate Dele Giwa's Death--Ex-DIG

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 27, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 253 words

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

Twenty-nine years after the murder of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, a retired police chief, Chris Omeben, who conducted the investigation, said the unresolved assassination was the most frustrating case he handled in his career.

Giwa, Founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine, was killed through a parcel bomb at his Ikeja, Lagos residence on October 19, 1986.

Omeben, a former Deputy Inspector-General of Police, DIG, who turns 80 on October 27, said, yesterday, that the high profile investigation was marred by interferences from "high places."

The DIG explained that even when he had narrowed in on the principal suspect, who could have thrown more light on the riddle, the suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria.

Omeben, now an Archbishop at Jesus Families Ministries, Iyana Ipaja, Lagos, said Giwa was also careless in maintaining a relationship with his estranged wife.

He said: "They said somebody brought a parcel and his son, Billy, received the parcel and took it to his father (Dele Giwa), who was having his breakfast that morning.

"On the breakfast table with Dele was a man called Kayode Soyinka. I heard that when Billy handed over the parcel, Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

"It was while he was there that the parcel detonated. Dele was injured and eventually died. The metal partition separating the dining room and the kitchen was destroyed.

"Beyond that, everything in the kitchen was destroyed. If metal could be mangled this way by the bomb, what happened to Soyinka Nobo

Load-Date: October 27, 2015

Why I Couldn't Investigate Dele Giwa's Death—Ex-DIG

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

October 27, 2015 Tuesday

Copyright 2015 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 255 words

Body

---

Twenty-nine years after the murder of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, a retired police chief, Chris Omeben, who conducted the investigation, said the unresolved assassination was the most frustrating case he handled in his career.

Giwa, Founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine, was killed through a parcel bomb at his Ikeja, Lagos residence on October 19, 1986.

Omeben, a former Deputy Inspector-General of Police, DIG, who turns 80 on October 27, said, yesterday, that the high profile investigation was marred by interferences from "high places."

The DIG explained that even when he had narrowed in on the principal suspect, who could have thrown more light on the riddle, the suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria.

Omeben, now an Archbishop at Jesus Families Ministries, Iyana Ipaja, Lagos, said Giwa was also careless in maintaining a relationship with his estranged wife.

He said: "They said somebody brought a parcel and his son, Billy, received the parcel and took it to his father (Dele Giwa), who was having his breakfast that morning.

"On the breakfast table with Dele was a man called Kayode Soyinka. I heard that when Billy handed over the parcel, Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

"It was while he was there that the parcel detonated. Dele was injured and eventually died. The metal partition separating the dining room and the kitchen was destroyed.

"Beyond that, everything in the kitchen was destroyed. If metal could be mangled this way by the bomb, what happened to Soyinka? Nobo-

-vanguard

Why I Couldn't Investigate Dele Giwa's Death—Ex-DIG

Load-Date: October 28, 2015

---

End of Document

A Rare Ray!

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1479 words

Byline: UDEME NANA

Body

---

UDEME NANA

Some days could be bleak, cloudy, depressing, dull, sad, traumatic all at once, but once a rare ray of brilliance shines through, the whole atmosphere changes into brightness and joy. This is exactly what happens when one grabs the work of one of the few standing apostles of outstanding journalism in Nigeria at present. As a field marshal in the pen wielding forces of the world, Ray has had an impact far beyond his imagination. At least two men I know have testified publicly that Ray, by the sheer hold he has had on his readers, has disrupted relationships involving them which may or may not have become successful in the long run due to incompatibility or irreconcilable differences.

The first man, a medical doctor, poet and the author of 'The Crumbs Eaters', a novel, confessed how his beautiful fiancee, then a final year student of Mass Communication in a Nigerian University, lost him. She was on a visit and during their small talk, he had asked casually if she had read the latest column written by Ray in Newswatch and the young lady blurted out "Ray? What's that?" The man reportedly responded, "It's not what but who!" The girl retorted, "So who is that? Who is this Ray?" She had asked in majestic ignorance. She had thought it was a huge joke but her man could not understand why a student at that level didn't just know the name. When she drew blank on a question whether she had seen a copy of Newswatch ever, the young man lost his cool and appetite for all the endowments of a young lady who had nearly become his life partner. The physician had wondered how on earth a final year student 'studying' to earn a degree in a discipline which Ray was famous for globally didn't know him by repute nor ever read his incisive, enlightening and oftentimes mind-blowing articles. The doctor walked the girl out of his house and walked out of the relationship for good. Today, he lives happily married to a delectable woman who is a voracious reader of books, newspapers and news magazines like him. "This one knew who Ray was instantly without long talk or arguments," the medical doctor would say gleefully like a young man who just fell in love, adding, "we can engage intellectually on events and ideas about any subject matter under the sun."

A Rare Ray!

The second told me about how he had exchanged blows with his room mate in the University when that mate angrily snatched a piece of paper used in wrapping groundnut which he had picked along the street and kept in the room. The piece of newspaper carried a column written by Ray Ekpu and the mast head had 'The Nigerian Chronicle' and the year was 1976. The friend had wondered what his mate had found so interesting in an old 'waste paper' which was only useful to groundnut and Akara ball sellers. That is how tight the grip one of Nigeria's most outstanding journalists had and still has on his readers.

One is cocksure that just like the rays of the sun, this incomparable Ray from the sleepy backwoods of Ikot Udo Osiom in Ukanafun Local Government Area of Akwa Ibom doesn't know that his deep piercing stories broke down some relationships especially those who were unaware of his existence and contributions as a public intellectual spanning half a century since he first happened on the scene in 1974.

The inimitable columnist is one of the few professionals in his field who straddled the different models of ownership in the media industry. He started out in the dangerous industry during the first military rule; an equally precarious season for those who work in the sector. His sojourn in the Nigerian Chronicle, government owned, published by then South Eastern State government where he rose to become an Editor caught the sustained attention of consumers of his frank interventions and they invited him over to Lagos, the heartbeat of Nigeria and the media sector. He was to sit at the helm of Sunday Times, then, arguably the most respectable medium in Africa. Those who tapped him had thought he was wasting his sweetness in the 'desert air' of Calabar. His now bigger weekly platform churned out mind-stimulating and satisfying menus every Sunday and helped make readers to look forward to the publication. Circulation rose and the Audit Bureau of Circulation reported sales figures of five hundred thousand copies every week! The nonpareil Editor felt fulfilled that his ink dripped honey and attracted readers as moths to light. However, his non-conformity soon rubbed off on the wrong side of his employers who sent him 'downstairs' to "Business Times", perhaps, to teach him a lesson but if that was a lesson, his articles boosted the fortunes of the Business weekly and did not diminish his stature a bit.

Given that it is difficult to ignore the sun at its brilliant best, an invitation to join the National Concord stable, a privately owned chain liberated him from bowing to the expectations of politicians of the ruling party who wanted lap dogs as Editors. The son of a village Court messenger even at The Nigerian Chronicle whose proprietor was a military Governor was not one to bless the mess of authority figures, their surrogates, dependants and accomplices. And that again led to his departure, with his friends: Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed to team up with Dan Agbese to establish and run Newswatch, perhaps the first experiment by a group of former Editors in Nigeria venturing into and trying to walk the tight rope of the business of journalism. They became Editor Publishers.

Newswatch served to open his eyes and those of his friends that they were 'jogging in the jungle': in an out of prison, in and out of Court rooms, being trailed by agents of government and proscription. In fact, the man still lives in shock of any thundering sound - the effect and scar of the parcel bomb blast which sent his comrade in arms, the equally legendary Dele Giwa to early death.

POLL

If there is one professional who holds dear to his heart the purest philosophical ideals of libertarian journalism, Ray fits the bill. The 1986 World Editor of the year, despite the rough and tumble of the seasons, has stayed true and remains an uncompromising apostle of the Vigilante, Agenda setting and diligent Gate-keeping role perception of operatives in the fourth estate of the realm. He doesn't believe that charlatans and con artists should find accommodation in the media space.

Born on August 6, 1948, Ray Ekpu, the former Chief Executive Officer of Newswatch Communications Ltd, now of May 5 Media, is a recipient of several honours and awards, including that of International Editor of the Year (1987), Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award (2018) and Vanguard Man of the Year Award (2022).

He is also a former President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria, NPAN. However, the quintessential man of letters is enthused about two honours done him in his home State. The first being the offer to name the Department of Mass Communication of the State owned Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua, Ikot Ekpene after him and the most recent institution by one of his admirers, Mr Udom Inoyo, of the Annual Ray Ekpu prize for Investigative Journalism worth five hundred thousand Naira for journalists practicing in Akwa Ibom State. This last award seems to embody Ray's lifetime commitment to promote excellence and ethics in media practice. He loves it because of its currency. Previous honours belong in the past. The Award on Investigative Journalism is in perpetuity, a sustainable legacy to his strides and stripes in the field.

A Rare Ray!

The odyssey of this rare ray that pierced through the sleepy backwoods of Ukanafun, shone through Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, illuminated the Department of Mass Communication of the University of Lagos, lit up the pages of the newspapers in the Chronicle stable and which captured the imagination of an entire nation is a story of heroes. Although his country still moves "in circles", Ray Ekpu should be satisfied that he has done his bit in the best way possible.

If Ray Ekpu were to be a bird, methinks he would have been a nightingale - 'the bird with the most number of powerful and sweet songs'. Ray has written several thousands of deep, inspiring, enjoyable but serious, scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times. The bold activist journalist is a survivor. Although bereft of the flamboyant lifestyle of those who have compromised the high ideals of his chosen profession, his trail still glows and cannot be extinguished.

On this day of the rare Ray of Journalism, one wishes a happy birthday to an amazing 'pen pusher' who caught national and global attention and for whom the world beat a bush path to find.

Shine steadily, and happy 75th birthday, Raymond Amos Ekpu.

Dr Nana, a media scholar, is the founder of Uyo Book Club

Load-Date: August 6, 2023

---

End of Document

How Dele Giwa's mum died, by daughter

The Sun (Nigeria)

January 9, 2013 Wednesday

Copyright 2013 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate.info, an Albawaba.com company All Rights Reserved

Length: 590 words

Body

---

... Says mama forgave his killers before she passed on

By WOLE BALOGUN

Elekia Ayisat Giwa, mother of the veteran journalist and founder/editor, Newswatch magazine who was gruesomely murdered via a letter bomb on October 19, 1986, is dead. Giwa died at about 5a.m yesterday in a private hospital during a brief illness.

Born on July 7, 1927 in Ugbekpe-Ekperi village in Auchi, Edo State, the late Giwa trained as a tailor and got married to Dele's father, the late Pa Giwa, to whom she bore six children. Dele Giwa was her first born. After her marriage to Pa Giwa, she moved to Ile-Ife in Osun State and there she had all her six children.

However, when her husband died in 1977, she relocated to her village and lived there until Dele was killed. According to Madam Giwa's last child, Mrs. Ronke Abibat Giwa Aboaba, she was devastated when the news of Dele's death was broken to her in 1986. The shock was so terrible that she (Aboaba) had to take the old woman with her: "My mother was a great woman, loving, caring and had a large heart for everyone."

She was a great encouragement to all her children. It was the gruesome murder of her first son, Dele Giwa, that punctured her joy, and since that unfortunate incident, she had become a very sad woman." Aboaba recalled in a chat with Daily Sun yesterday. "I took her with me when I discovered how bad she was feeling."

It was like she had lost everything because she loved everyone of us so greatly and she never wished or thought of losing any of us. So, for the past 13 years I have made her stay with me. As the lastborn and a daughter, we were very close. I always look forward to seeing her whenever I am returning home from anywhere I go and now I can't even imagine not seeing her when I get back home today," Aboaba said, fighting back tears.

How Dele Giwa's mum died, by daughter

Daily Sun wanted to know what Madam Giwa's greatest wish was before she passed on and Aboaba said: "Our mother's greatest wish was to know the killers of her son, Dele Giwa, before she died. She also wished to see that Dele's killers were brought to book. But before she eventually gave up the ghost, on her death bed, she prayed fervently for Nigeria and said that she has forgiven Babangida and whoever has hand in the death of her son.

She told us, her children, that she has handed Dele's killers over to God." Daily Sun also wanted to know Madam Giwa's happiest moment while on earth, and Aboaba said: "Our mother lived a fulfilled life. Her happiest moments were seeing her children and grand children doing well. She was always glad that God kept the rest of her children and more importantly, many of her grand children alive and that gave her enormous joy." Aboaba said she would miss her mother more than any of the other children: "I will miss her so much. She has been part of me as we were very close and dear to each other.

She was gentle, very tolerant even with neighbours. We all did our best for her. At a point, we moved her from the general hospital to a private hospital for proper treatment. She just had a brief illness before she passed on. We all love her and wish her perfect rest in the Lord's bosom." Aboaba said. Dele Giwa's deputy, Mr. Ray Ekpu, also expressed his condolence to the Giwas. He told Daily Sun in a telephone chat: "I have got the news and we are really saddened by it. I have also called one of her daughters, Abibat, and sent her my condolences when I spoke to her this morning. And we are wishing her soul a peaceful rest in the Lord's bosom. She was a compassionate woman, somebody who loved children."

Load-Date: January 22, 2013

---

End of Document

A Rare Ray

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1481 words

Byline: Udeme Nana

Body

---

By Udeme Nana

Some days could be bleak , cloudy , depressing, dull, sad, traumatic all at once, but once a rare ray of brilliance shines through, the whole atmosphere changes into brightness and joy. This is exactly what happens when one grabs the work of one of the few standing apostles of outstanding journalism in Nigeria at present.

As a field marshal in the pen wielding forces of the world, Ray has had an impact far beyond his imagination. At least two men I know have testified publicly that Ray, by the sheer hold he has had on his readers, has disrupted relationships involving them which may or may not have become successful in the long run due to incompatibility or irreconcilable differences.

The first man, a medical doctor, poet and the author of 'The Crumbs Eaters' , a novel, confessed how his beautiful fiancee, then a final year student of Mass Communication in a Nigerian University lost him. She was on a visit and during their small talk, he had asked casually if she had read the latest column written by Ray in Newswatch and the young lady blurted out "Ray? What's that ?" The man reportedly responded, "It's not what but who!" The girl retorted, "So who is that ? Who is this Ray?" She had asked in majestic ignorance.

She had thought it was a huge joke but her man could not understand why a student at that level didn't just know the name. When she drew blank on a question whether she had seen a copy of Newswatch ever, the young man lost his cool and appetite for all the endowments of a young lady who had nearly become his life partner. The physician had wondered how on Earth a final year student 'studying' to earn a degree in a discipline which Ray was famous for globally didn't know him by repute nor ever read his incisive, enlightening and oftentimes mind-blowing articles.

The doctor walked the girl out of his house and walked out of the relationship for good. Today, he lives happily married to a delectable woman who is a voracious reader of books, newspapers and news magazines like him. "This one knew who Ray was instantly without long talk or arguments," the medical doctor would say gleefully like a young man who just fell in love, adding, "we can engage intellectually on events and ideas about any subject matter under the sun."

A Rare Ray

The second told me about how he had exchanged blows with his room mate in the University when that mate angrily snatched a piece of paper used in wrapping groundnut which he had picked along the street and kept in the room. The piece of newspaper carried a column written by Ray Ekpu and the mast head had 'The Nigerian Chronicle' and the year was 1976. The friend had wondered what his mate had found so interesting in an old 'waste paper' which was only useful to groundnut and Akara ball sellers. That is how tight the grip one of Nigeria's most outstanding journalists had and still has on his readers.

One is cocksure that just like the rays of the sun, this incomparable Ray from the sleepy backwoods of Ikot Udo Osiom in Ukanafun local Government Area of Akwa Ibom doesn't know that his deep piercing stories broke down some relationships especially those who were unaware of his existence and contributions as a public intellectual spanning half a century since he first happened on the scene in 1974.

POLL

The Inimitable Columnist is one of the few professionals in his field who straddled the different models of ownership in the media industry. He started out in the dangerous industry during the first military rule ; an equally precarious season for those who work in the sector. His sojourn in the Nigerian Chronicle, government owned, published by then South Eastern State government where he rose to become an Editor caught the sustained attention of consumers of his frank interventions and they invited him over to Lagos, the heartbeat of Nigeria and the media sector.

He was to sit at the helm of Sunday Times , then , arguably the most respectable medium in Africa. Those who tapped him had thought he was wasting his sweetness in the 'desert air' of Calabar. His now bigger weekly platform churned out mind-stimulating and satisfying menus every Sunday and helped make readers to look forward to the publication. Circulation rose and the Audit Bureau of Circulation reported sales figures of five hundred thousand copies every week!

The nonpareil Editor felt fulfilled that his ink dripped honey and attracted readers as moths to light. However, his non-conformity soon rubbed off on the wrong side of his employers who sent him 'downstairs' to "Business Times", perhaps, to teach him a lesson but if that was a lesson, his articles boosted the fortunes of the Business weekly and did not diminish his stature a bit.

Given that it is difficult to ignore the sun at its brilliant best, an invitation to join the National Concord stable, a privately owned chain liberated him from bowing to the expectations of politicians of the ruling Party who wanted lap dogs as Editors. The son of a village Court messenger even at The Nigerian Chronicle whose proprietor was a military Governor was not one to bless the mess of authority figures, their surrogates, dependants and accomplices. And that again, led to his departure, with his friends: Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed to team up with Dan Agbese to establish and run Newswatch, perhaps the first experiment by a group of former Editors in Nigeria venturing into and trying to walk the tight rope of the business of journalism. They became Editor Publishers.

Newswatch served to open his eyes and those of his friends that they were 'jogging in the jungle': in an out of prison, in and out of Court rooms, being trailed by agents of government and proscription. In fact, the man still lives in shock of any thundering sound - the effect and scar of the parcel bomb blast which sent his comrade in arms, the equally legendary Dele Giwa to early death.

If there is one professional who holds dear to his heart the purest philosophical ideals of libertarian journalism, Ray fits the bill. The 1986 World Editor of the year, despite the rough and tumble of the seasons has stayed true and remains an uncompromising apostle of the Vigilante, Agenda setting and diligent Gate-keeping role perception of operatives in the fourth estate of the realm. He doesn't believe that charlatans and con artists should find accommodation in the media space.

A Rare Ray

Born on August 6, 1948, Ray Ekpu, the former Chief Executive Officer of Newswatch Communications Ltd, now of May 5 Media, is a recipient of several honours and awards, including that of International Editor of the Year ( 1987), Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award ( 2018) and Vanguard Man of the Year Award (2022).

He is also a former President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria, NPAN. However, the quintessential man of letters is enthused about two honours done him in his home State. The first being the offer to name the Department of Mass Communication of the State owned Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua, Ikot Ekpene after him and the most recent institution by one of his admirers, Mr Udom Inoyo, of the Annual Ray Ekpu prize for Investigative journalism worth five hundred thousand Naira for journalists practicing in Akwa Ibom State. This last award seems to embody Ray's lifetime commitment to promote excellence and ethics in media practice. He loves it because of its currency. Previous honours belong in the past. The Award on Investigative journalism is in perpetuity , a sustainable legacy to his strides and stripes in the field.

The odyssey of this rare ray that pierced through the sleepy backwoods of Ukanafun, shone through Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, illuminated the Department of Mass Communication of the University of Lagos, lit up the pages of the Newspapers in the Chronicle stable and who captured the imagination of an entire nation is a story of heroes. Although his country still moves "in circles", Ray Ekpu should be satisfied that he has done his bit in the best way possible.

If Ray Ekpu were to be a bird, methinks he would have been a nightingale - 'the bird with the most number of powerful and sweet songs' . Ray has written several thousands of deep, inspiring , enjoyable but serious , scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times.The bold activist journalist is a survivor. Although bereft of the flamboyant lifestyle of those who have compromised the high ideals of his chosen profession , his trail still glows and cannot be extinguished.

On this day of the rare Ray of Journalism, one wishes a happy birthday to an amazing 'pen pusher' who caught national and global attention and for whom the world beat a bush path to find.

Shine steadily, and Happy 75th birthday, Raymond Amos Ekpu.

Dr Nana, a Media Scholar, is the Founder of Uyo Book Club

Load-Date: August 6, 2023

---

End of Document

A rare Ray

The Guardian

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1495 words

Body

Some days could be bleak, cloudy, depressing, dull, sad, traumatic all at once, but once a rare ray of brilliance shines through, the whole atmosphere changes into brightness and joy. This is exactly what happens when one grabs the work of one of the few standing apostles of outstanding journalism in Nigeria at present. As a field marshal in the pen wielding forces of the world, Ray has had an impact far beyond his imagination.

At least two men I know have testified publicly that Ray, by the sheer hold he has had on his readers, has disrupted relationships involving them which may or may not have become successful in the long run due to incompatibility or irreconcilable differences.

The first man, a medical doctor, poet and the author of 'The Crumbs Eaters', a novel, confessed how his beautiful fiancee, then a final year student of Mass Communication in a Nigerian University lost him.

She was on a visit and during their small talk, he had asked casually if she had read the latest column written by Ray in Newswatch and the young lady blurted out "Ray? What's that?" The man reportedly responded, "It's not what but who!" The girl retorted, "So who is that? Who is this Ray?" She had asked in majestic ignorance. She had thought it was a huge joke but her man could not understand why a student at that level didn't just know the name. When she drew blank on a question whether she had seen a copy of Newswatchever, the young man lost his cool and appetite for all the endowments of a young lady who had nearly become his life partner.

The physician had wondered how on Earth a final year student 'studying' to earn a degree in a discipline which Ray was famous for globally didn't know him by repute nor ever read his incisive, enlightening and oftentimes mind-blowing articles. The doctor walked the girl out of his house and walked out of the relationship for good. Today, he lives happily married to a delectable woman who is a voracious reader of books, newspapers and news magazines like him.

"This one knew who Ray was instantly without long talk or arguments," the medical doctor would say gleefully like a young man who just fell in love, adding, "we can engage intellectually on events and ideas about any subject matter under the sun."

A rare Ray

The second told me about how he had exchanged blows with his room mate in the University when that mate angrily snatched a piece of paper used in wrapping groundnut which he had picked along the street and kept in the room. The piece of newspaper carried a column written by Ray Ekpu and the mast head had 'The Nigerian Chronicle' and the year was 1976. The friend had wondered what his mate had found so interesting in an old 'waste paper' which was only useful to groundnut and Akara ball sellers.

That is how tight the grip one of Nigeria's most outstanding journalists had and still has on his readers.

One is cocksure that just like the rays of the sun, this incomparable Ray from the sleepy backwoods of Ikot Udo Osiom in Ukanafun Local Council of Akwa Ibom doesn't know that his deep piercing stories broke down some relationships especially those who were unaware of his existence and contributions as a public intellectual spanning half a century since he first happened on the scene in 1974.

The Inimitable Columnist is one of the few professionals in his field who straddled the different models of ownership in the media industry. He started out in the dangerous industry during the first military rule; an equally precarious season for those who work in the sector.

His sojourn in the Nigerian Chronicle, government owned, published by then South Eastern State government where he rose to become an Editor caught the sustained attention of consumers of his frank interventions and they invited him over to Lagos, the heartbeat of Nigeria and the media sector. He was to sit at the helm of Sunday Times, then, arguably the most respectable medium in Africa. Those who tapped him had thought he was wasting his sweetness in the 'desert air' of Calabar. His now bigger weekly platform churned out mind-stimulating and satisfying menus every Sunday and helped make readers to look forward to the publication.

Circulation rose and the Audit Bureau of Circulation reported sales figures of five hundred thousand copies every week!

The nonpareil Editor felt fulfilled that his ink dripped honey and attracted readers as moths to light. However, his non-conformity soon rubbed off on the wrong side of his employers who sent him 'downstairs' to "Business Times", perhaps, to teach him a lesson but if that was a lesson, his articles boosted the fortunes of the Business weekly and did not diminish his stature a bit.

Given that it is difficult to ignore the sun at its brilliant best, an invitation to join the National Concord stable, a privately owned chain liberated him from bowing to the expectations of politicians of the ruling Party who wanted lap dogs as Editors.

The son of a village Court messenger even at The Nigerian Chronicle whose proprietor was a military Governor was not one to bless the mess of authority figures, their surrogates, dependants and accomplices. And that again, led to his departure, with his friends: Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed to team up with Dan Agbese to establish and run Newswatch, perhaps the first experiment by a group of former Editors in Nigeria venturing into and trying to walk the tight rope of the business of journalism.

They became Editor Publishers.

Newswatch served to open his eyes and those of his friends that they were 'jogging in the jungle': in and out of prison, in and out of Court rooms, being trailed by agents of government and proscription. In fact, the man still lives in shock of any thundering sound - the effect and scar of the parcel bomb blast which sent his comrade in arms, the equally legendary Dele Giwa to early death.

If there is one professional who holds dear to his heart the purest philosophical ideals of libertarian journalism, Ray fits the bill. The 1986 World Editor of the year , despite the rough and tumble of the seasons has stayed true and remains an uncompromising apostle of the Vigilante, Agenda setting and diligent Gate-keeping role perception of operatives in the fourth estate of the realm. He doesn't believe that charlatans and con artists should find accommodation in the media space.

A rare Ray

Born on August 6, 1948, Ray Ekpu, the former Chief Executive Officer of Newswatch Communications Ltd, now of May 5 Media, is a recipient of several honours and awards, including that of International Editor of the Year (1987), Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award (2018) and Vanguard Man of the Year Award (2022).

He is also a former President of the Newspapers Proprietors Association of Nigeria, NPAN. However, the quintessential man of letters is enthused about two honours done him in his home State. The first being the offer to name the Department of Mass Communication of the State owned Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua, Ikot Ekpene after him and the most recent institution by one of his admirers, Mr Udom Inoyo, of the Annual Ray Ekpu prize for investigative journalism worth five hundred thousand Naira for journalists practicing in Akwa Ibom State. This last award seems to embody Ray's lifetime commitment to promote excellence and ethics in media practice. He loves it because of its currency.

Previous honours belong in the past. The award on investigative journalism is in perpetuity, a sustainable legacy to his strides and stripes in the field.

The odyssey of this rare ray that pierced through the sleepy backwoods of Ukanafun, shone through Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, illuminated the Department of Mass Communication of the University of Lagos, lit up the pages of the Newspapers in the Chronicle stable and who captured the imagination of an entire nation is a story of heroes. Although his country still moves "in circles", Ray Ekpu should be satisfied that he has done his bit in the best way possible.

If Ray Ekpu were to be a bird, methinks he would have been a nightingale - 'the bird with the most number of powerful and sweet songs'. Ray has written several thousands of deep, inspiring, enjoyable but serious, scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times. The bold activist journalist is a survivor. Although bereft of the flamboyant lifestyle of those who have compromised the high ideals of his chosen profession, his trail still glows and cannot be extinguished.

On this day of the rare Ray of Journalism, one wishes a happy birthday to an amazing 'pen pusher' who caught national and global attention and for whom the world beat a bush path to find.

Shine steadily, and Happy 75th birthday, Raymond Amos Ekpu.

•Dr Udeme Nana, a Media Scholar is the Founder, Uyo Book Club.

In this article A rare ray

Ray Ekpu

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 18, 2023

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Naija 247 News

January 10, 2023 Tuesday

Copyright 2023 Naija 247 news Media Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1438 words

Body

---

What is the story of Nigeria's failure as a nation? It is the the story of the failure of journalism which refused to watch over the power players but rather watch over the pockets of the journalists.

By Tunde Akande

My friend and workmate, Professor Jimi Kayode, now of Lagos State University, teaching mass communication but formerly director of the Nigerian Institute of Journalism in Lagos where we worked together told me a story about the decadence that has become of journalism and journalists in Nigeria. He was somewhere on the Lekki Ajah axis in Lagos standing at a bus stop waiting for public transport, usually bone shakers; he had no car. After waiting for some time under the intense heat he got tired but then a state-of-the-art car parked at the bus stop and the driver beckoned to him. The driver of the beautiful car happens to be a student he had trained. Jimi Kayode hopped in but was amazed at the speed of things happening in Nigeria. The student was just a few years out of the NIJ, and now he rode one of the best car models in town. 'How did you get this car?' he asked the former student. 'What do you do? Aren't you a journalist?' By that last question, Jimi was sounding the training he had received which he had also given to generations of his students; if you want money go to business, don't come to journalism but if you want fame, journalism should be your forte. If you want power, go to the civil service.

In his well-cooled car, the former student took a look at his old teacher and giggled. 'Oga,' Yoruba word for boss, he replied in a very soft tone, 'journalism has changed from your time. Today, journalism is cash and carry. Those who need the services of the journalist pay him or her in cash and kind.' He reeled out names of his editors who have landed properties in choice parts of Lagos, the nation's commercial capital, and Abuja, the nation's political capital. 'When editors collect houses and money and are sponsored on holidays abroad, what sir, do you expect the reporters to do?' Professor Jimi Kayode was dumbfounded; poverty was written all over him; he graduated in 1980 and with his donkey years as both practitioner and teacher, he was still not anywhere near his student of just a few years on the job. He was not complaining but he wondered what will happen to the profession and the society it serves.

'Journalism has become cash and carry.' That is the story of the current public spat between the journalists of Nduka Obaigbena of the ThisDay and Arise media and the journalists of Bola Ahmed Tinubu, the presidential candidates of the APC. You wonder why they are described as journalists of Obaigbena and journalists of Bola Tinubu. It is because with their money these humans have bought these journalists and they use the organs not for the public good but for the private and selfish interest of the slave merchants. The story of journalism and journalists reflect the sad story of the decline of Nigeria. It should be like that. Journalists and journalism are very important factors in the development of nations. Journalism was the major instrument that scared the colonial power out of Nigeria. Journalists are purveyors of information. They are to make the comfortable uncomfortable and to comfort the uncomfortable. The journalist is involved in the class war between the poor and the rich, the haves and the have not. His duty is to publish what power holders try to hide and to give voice to the voiceless in society. Journalism is very important to democracy. Democracy is about the free choice of the people. The people must constitute the government and even after that constitution, the people must hold those who form the government to account for how they manage the commonwealth. In Nigeria especially, where the law is either nonexistent or made weak to suit the power holders who made them or interpreted in the courts to pander to the power holders, the men and women of means have found a way to control the massive power of the media. They employ them and they bribe them.

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Bayo Onanuga and Dele Alake in the stable of Bola Tinubu are fantastic journalists. Their first buyer was the late MKO Abiola, the late president of Nigeria that was not allowed to be by the power holders. Abiola won a popular election which was scuttled by a self-proclaimed military president, Ibrahim Babangida. The story of why IBB annulled the election of his friend is still a not fully known secret, some allege that Abiola had a drug issue in the US that made the Americans pressure IBB not to allow the richest black man then in the world to be president of Nigeria. But when Abiola had his eyes on the presidency, he procured the best journalists in the country and gave them very good salaries and good working tools. For the first time a flamboyant journalist, the late Dele Giwa rode a Mercedes Benz 200 and wore designer shirts and suits. Dele Giwa was a fine writer, and he became a model for all journalists in the country. Dele Alake, Bayo Onanuga, and a host of others joined Abiola's Concord train. They were so fierce in their duty that the Concord newspapers became the enemy of the military with whom Abiola was friendly. The journalists looked like they were fighting for the downtrodden but in real terms, they were fighting for the interest of Abiola. Bayo Onanuga refused to apologize to the military over a story and he and his team resigned from Concord to set up their own media empire, The News which became a torn in the flesh of the military.

But while The News was firing from all cylinders, it was the money of Bola Tinubu that was oiling the engine. A friend who is a journalist and a close friend of Onanuga and his team told me that constantly Tinubu was giving out cars and a huge chunk of money at different times to Bayo Onanuga and his team at The News. Dele Alake who had become Tinubu's commissioner for communication and strategy in Lagos is said to be the intermediary between Tinubu and Bayo Onanuga and his team. The truth of this relationship was brought out plainly when Onanuga and The News refused to publish anything on the story of Tinubu's drug deal allegations. In an interview, Bayo said frontally that they did not because 'we have a relationship with Tinubu'. Bayo Onanuga and his team are said to be proud owners of houses in Abuja and Lagos. Today, The News is dead, but Bayo is surviving playing a big role in Tinubu's quest to become the next president of Nigeria. Why did The News die? It had served the purpose of promoting Bayo into wealth and prominence and was not needed again. Babafemi Ojodu, one of the Bayo Onanuga's team parted ways with Tinubu and was the chief promoter of the failed Yemi Osinbajo presidency. Ojodu is a special assistant at the presidency.

Coincidentally, it is the story of the alleged drug dealing of Tinubu which The News refused to publish that is now causing a public spat between the Tinubu journalists and the Nduka Obaigbena journalists. Nduka Obaigbena came to the country with a big bang from the US, he set up a magazine, This Week, and became a big player in the media industry. But the journalists of This Week, many of them very good professionals and ethical were not smiling. Salaries may not be paid for months while with the same money earned by the sweat of these journalists, Obaigbena junketed all over the world. The story of unpaid salaries, inglorious and expensive lifestyle, and blackmailing with which the Tinubu journalists are now pinning down Nduka Obaigbena did not start with the ThisDay Arise media, they were so much talked about even in the days of This Week. This Week eventually died; some say because of these unethical behaviors. It gave rise first to ThisDay, then Arise, still with the character of This Week.

What then is the story of Nigeria's failure as a nation? It is the story of the failure of journalism which refused to watch over the power players but rather watch over the pockets of the journalists. It is the story of a Tinubu, an MKO Abiola, a Michael Ibru, an Emmanuel Iwuanyanwu, a Nduka Obaigbena, an Orji Kalu, all of them rent seekers who discovered that the souls of Nigerian journalists can be bought; bought them and derailed the dream of Nigeria using their massive media power. Let the Tinubu - Obaigbena public spat continue so the Nigerian public will know what has happened in the secret that has affected their lives for the worse. Perhaps the public might change their voting behavior.

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Tunde Akande is both a journalist and pastor. He obtained a Master's degree in Mass Communication from the University of Lagos

Load-Date: January 11, 2023

---

End of Document

Boko Haram Started With Bombing of Dele Giwa - - Prof Odinkalu

Vanguard (Lagos)

November 20, 2014

Copyright 2014 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 249 words

Byline: Luka Binniyat

Body

---

KADUNA--The Chairman, National Human Rights Commission, NHRC, Professor Anselem Odinkalu, said yesterday that the violence that led to the current insurgent activities of Boko Haram Islamic sect in the country actually started in 1986 with killing of the renowned journalist, Mr Dele Giwa with a parcel bomb, just as he lamented over what he described as democratisation of violence since the return to civil rule in 1999.

Odinkalu spoke during the commissioning of Moluma Loma Centre for Medical Law, and the MIVE Legals Matrimonial Centre, Kaduna.

In his keynote address on the occasion Odinkalu said, "Contrary to what people think, the phenomenon that has now become Boko Haram actually started in an Ikeja Street, on October 18, 1986. That day the first Improvised Explosive Device, IED, was used to blow up Dele Giwa. Everyone knew that it was a state-sponsored murder. That was the first time that an IED went off on Nigerian soil.

"Series of events would later lead to Boko Haram today. At that time, late Gani Fawehinmi had the courage to challenge the state on that murder. But he was in turn persecuted until his death.

"The Police officer who was investigating the murder was also killed in an un-explained circumstances in Mokwa, Niger State. He was the immediate younger brother of the celebrated writer and critic of government, Tunji Dare.

"When a state sponsors the illegal murder of its citizens, it loses its legitimacy as a government. So today's terrorism started as state sponsored.

Load-Date: November 21, 2014

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Naija 247 News

January 8, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Naija 247 news Media Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1438 words

Body

---

What is the story of Nigeria's failure as a nation? It is the the story of the failure of journalism which refused to watch over the power players but rather watch over the pockets of the journalists.

By Tunde Akande

My friend and workmate, Professor Jimi Kayode, now of Lagos State University, teaching mass communication but formerly director of the Nigerian Institute of Journalism in Lagos where we worked together told me a story about the decadence that has become of journalism and journalists in Nigeria. He was somewhere on the Lekki Ajah axis in Lagos standing at a bus stop waiting for public transport, usually bone shakers; he had no car. After waiting for some time under the intense heat he got tired but then a state-of-the-art car parked at the bus stop and the driver beckoned to him. The driver of the beautiful car happens to be a student he had trained. Jimi Kayode hopped in but was amazed at the speed of things happening in Nigeria. The student was just a few years out of the NIJ, and now he rode one of the best car models in town. 'How did you get this car?' he asked the former student. 'What do you do? Aren't you a journalist?' By that last question, Jimi was sounding the training he had received which he had also given to generations of his students; if you want money go to business, don't come to journalism but if you want fame, journalism should be your forte. If you want power, go to the civil service.

In his well-cooled car, the former student took a look at his old teacher and giggled. 'Oga,' Yoruba word for boss, he replied in a very soft tone, 'journalism has changed from your time. Today, journalism is cash and carry. Those who need the services of the journalist pay him or her in cash and kind.' He reeled out names of his editors who have landed properties in choice parts of Lagos, the nation's commercial capital, and Abuja, the nation's political capital. 'When editors collect houses and money and are sponsored on holidays abroad, what sir, do you expect the reporters to do?' Professor Jimi Kayode was dumbfounded; poverty was written all over him; he graduated in 1980 and with his donkey years as both practitioner and teacher, he was still not anywhere near his student of just a few years on the job. He was not complaining but he wondered what will happen to the profession and the society it serves.

'Journalism has become cash and carry.' That is the story of the current public spat between the journalists of Nduka Obaigbena of the ThisDay and Arise media and the journalists of Bola Ahmed Tinubu, the presidential candidates of the APC. You wonder why they are described as journalists of Obaigbena and journalists of Bola Tinubu. It is because with their money these humans have bought these journalists and they use the organs not for the public good but for the private and selfish interest of the slave merchants. The story of journalism and journalists reflect the sad story of the decline of Nigeria. It should be like that. Journalists and journalism are very important factors in the development of nations. Journalism was the major instrument that scared the colonial power out of Nigeria. Journalists are purveyors of information. They are to make the comfortable uncomfortable and to comfort the uncomfortable. The journalist is involved in the class war between the poor and the rich, the haves and the have not. His duty is to publish what power holders try to hide and to give voice to the voiceless in society. Journalism is very important to democracy. Democracy is about the free choice of the people. The people must constitute the government and even after that constitution, the people must hold those who form the government to account for how they manage the commonwealth. In Nigeria especially, where the law is either nonexistent or made weak to suit the power holders who made them or interpreted in the courts to pander to the power holders, the men and women of means have found a way to control the massive power of the media. They employ them and they bribe them.

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Bayo Onanuga and Dele Alake in the stable of Bola Tinubu are fantastic journalists. Their first buyer was the late MKO Abiola, the late president of Nigeria that was not allowed to be by the power holders. Abiola won a popular election which was scuttled by a self-proclaimed military president, Ibrahim Babangida. The story of why IBB annulled the election of his friend is still a not fully known secret, some allege that Abiola had a drug issue in the US that made the Americans pressure IBB not to allow the richest black man then in the world to be president of Nigeria. But when Abiola had his eyes on the presidency, he procured the best journalists in the country and gave them very good salaries and good working tools. For the first time a flamboyant journalist, the late Dele Giwa rode a Mercedes Benz 200 and wore designer shirts and suits. Dele Giwa was a fine writer, and he became a model for all journalists in the country. Dele Alake, Bayo Onanuga, and a host of others joined Abiola's Concord train. They were so fierce in their duty that the Concord newspapers became the enemy of the military with whom Abiola was friendly. The journalists looked like they were fighting for the downtrodden but in real terms, they were fighting for the interest of Abiola. Bayo Onanuga refused to apologize to the military over a story and he and his team resigned from Concord to set up their own media empire, The News which became a torn in the flesh of the military.

But while The News was firing from all cylinders, it was the money of Bola Tinubu that was oiling the engine. A friend who is a journalist and a close friend of Onanuga and his team told me that constantly Tinubu was giving out cars and a huge chunk of money at different times to Bayo Onanuga and his team at The News. Dele Alake who had become Tinubu's commissioner for communication and strategy in Lagos is said to be the intermediary between Tinubu and Bayo Onanuga and his team. The truth of this relationship was brought out plainly when Onanuga and The News refused to publish anything on the story of Tinubu's drug deal allegations. In an interview, Bayo said frontally that they did not because 'we have a relationship with Tinubu'. Bayo Onanuga and his team are said to be proud owners of houses in Abuja and Lagos. Today, The News is dead, but Bayo is surviving playing a big role in Tinubu's quest to become the next president of Nigeria. Why did The News die? It had served the purpose of promoting Bayo into wealth and prominence and was not needed again. Babafemi Ojodu, one of the Bayo Onanuga's team parted ways with Tinubu and was the chief promoter of the failed Yemi Osinbajo presidency. Ojodu is a special assistant at the presidency.

Coincidentally, it is the story of the alleged drug dealing of Tinubu which The News refused to publish that is now causing a public spat between the Tinubu journalists and the Nduka Obaigbena journalists. Nduka Obaigbena came to the country with a big bang from the US, he set up a magazine, This Week, and became a big player in the media industry. But the journalists of This Week, many of them very good professionals and ethical were not smiling. Salaries may not be paid for months while with the same money earned by the sweat of these journalists, Obaigbena junketed all over the world. The story of unpaid salaries, inglorious and expensive lifestyle, and blackmailing with which the Tinubu journalists are now pinning down Nduka Obaigbena did not start with the ThisDay Arise media, they were so much talked about even in the days of This Week. This Week eventually died; some say because of these unethical behaviors. It gave rise first to ThisDay, then Arise, still with the character of This Week.

What then is the story of Nigeria's failure as a nation? It is the story of the failure of journalism which refused to watch over the power players but rather watch over the pockets of the journalists. It is the story of a Tinubu, an MKO Abiola, a Michael Ibru, an Emmanuel Iwuanyanwu, a Nduka Obaigbena, an Orji Kalu, all of them rent seekers who discovered that the souls of Nigerian journalists can be bought; bought them and derailed the dream of Nigeria using their massive media power. Let the Tinubu - Obaigbena public spat continue so the Nigerian public will know what has happened in the secret that has affected their lives for the worse. Perhaps the public might change their voting behavior.

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Tunde Akande is both a journalist and pastor. He obtained a Master's degree in Mass Communication from the University of Lagos

Load-Date: January 9, 2023

---

End of Document

A Rare Ray at 75

This Day

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 THISDAY NEWSPAPERS LTD. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1548 words

Body

---

Ray Ekpu, an inimitable columnist, held sway as a journalist during the military rule, a precarious period for those who work in the media industry. As one of the few professionals in field who straddled different models of ownership, he has written thousands of deep, inspiring, incisive, but scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times. As Ekpu marks his 75th birthday today,

Udeme Nana says his trail still glows and refuses to be extinguished

some days could be bleak, cloudy, depressing, dull, sad, traumatic all at once, but once a rare ray of brilliance shines through, the whole atmosphere changes into brightness and joy. This is exactly what happens when one grabs the work of one of the few standing apostles of outstanding journalism in Nigeria at present. As a field marshal in the pen wielding forces of the world, Ray has had an impact far beyond his imagination. At least two men I know have testified publicly that Ray, by the sheer hold he has had on his readers, has disrupted relationships involving them which may or may not have become successful in the long run due to incompatibility or irreconcilable differences.

The first man, a medical doctor, poet and the author of 'The Crumbs Eaters,' a novel, confessed how his beautiful fiancee, then a final year student of Mass Communication in a Nigerian university, lost him. She was on a visit and during their small talk, he had asked casually if she had read the latest column written by Ray in Newswatch and the young lady blurted out "Ray? What's that?" The man reportedly responded, "It's not what but who!" The girl retorted, "So, who is that? Who is this Ray?" She had asked in majestic ignorance. She had thought it was a huge joke but her man could not understand why a student at that level didn't just know the name. When she drew blank on a question whether she had seen a copy of Newswatch ever, the young man lost his cool and appetite for all the endowments of a young lady who had nearly become his life partner. The physician had wondered how on earth a final year student 'studying' to earn a degree in a discipline which Ray was famous for globally didn't know him by repute nor ever read his incisive, enlightening and oftentimes mind-blowing articles. The doctor walked the girl out of his house and walked out of the relationship for good. Today, he lives happily married to a delectable woman who is a voracious reader of books, newspapers and news magazines like him.

A Rare Ray at 75

"This one knew who Ray was instantly without long talk or arguments," the medical doctor would say gleefully like a young man who just fell in love. "We can engage intellectually on events and ideas about any subject matter under the sun."

The second told me about how he had exchanged blows with his room mate in the university when that mate angrily snatched a piece of paper used in wrapping groundnut which he had picked along the street and kept in the room. The piece of newspaper carried a column written by Ray Ekpu and the mast head had 'The Nigerian Chronicle' and the year was 1976. The friend had wondered what his mate had found so interesting in an old 'waste paper' which was only useful to groundnut and Akara ball sellers. That is how tight the grip one of Nigeria's most outstanding journalists had and still has on his readers.

One is cocksure that just like the rays of the sun, this incomparable Ray from the sleepy backwoods of Ikot Udo Osiom in Ukanafun Local Government Area of Akwa Ibom doesn't know that his deep piercing stories broke down some relationships especially those who were unaware of his existence and contributions as a public intellectual spanning half a century since he first happened on the scene in 1974.

The inimitable columnist is one of the few professionals in his field who straddled the different models of ownership in the media industry. He started out in the dangerous industry during the first military rule; an equally precarious season for those who work in the sector. His sojourn in the Nigerian Chronicle, government-owned, published by then South Eastern State government where he rose to become an editor caught the sustained attention of consumers of his frank interventions and they invited him over to Lagos, the heartbeat of Nigeria and the media sector. He was to sit at the helm of Sunday Times, then, arguably the most respectable medium in Africa. Those who tapped him had thought he was wasting his sweetness in the 'desert air' of Calabar. His now bigger weekly platform churned out mind-stimulating and satisfying menus every Sunday and helped make forward to the publication. Circulation rose and the Audit Bureau of Circulation reported sales figures of five hundred thousand copies every week! The nonpareil Editor felt fulfilled that his ink dripped honey and attracted readers as moths to light. However, his nonconformity soon rubbed off on the wrong side of his employers who sent him 'downstairs' to "Business Times", perhaps, to teach him a lesson but if that was a lesson, his articles boosted the fortunes of the Business weekly and did not diminish his stature a bit.

Given that it is difficult to ignore the sun at its brilliant best, an invitation to join the National Concord stable, a privately-owned chain, liberated him from bowing to the expectations of politicians of the ruling party who wanted lap dogs as Editors. The son of a village court messenger even at The Nigerian Chronicle whose proprietor was a military Governor was not one to bless the mess of authority figures, their surrogates, dependants and accomplices. And that again, led to his departure, with his friends: Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed to team up with Dan Agbese to establish and run Newswatch, perhaps the first experiment by a group of former Editors in Nigeria venturing into and trying to walk the tightrope of the business of journalism. They became Editor Publishers. Newswatch served to open his eyes and those of his friends that they were 'jogging in the jungle': in and out of prison, in and out of court rooms, being trailed by agents of government and proscription. In fact, the man still lives in shock of any thundering sound - the effect and scar of the parcel bomb blast which sent his comrade in arms, the equally legendary Dele Giwa to early death.

If there is one professional who holds dear to his heart the purest philosophical ideals of libertarian journalism, Ray fits the bill. The 1986 World Editor of the Year, despite the rough and tumble of the seasons has stayed true and remains an uncompromising apostle of the vigilante, agenda setting and diligent date-keeping role perception of operatives in the fourth estate of the realm. He doesn't believe that charlatans and con artists should find accommodation in the media space.

Born on August 6, 1948, Ray Ekpu, the former Chief Executive Officer of Newswatch Communications Limited, now of May 5 Media, is a recipient of several honours and awards, including that of International Editor of the Year

A Rare Ray at 75

(1987), Outstanding Young Person of the World (1988), Diamond Award for Media Excellence (DAME) Lifetime Achievement Award (2018) and Vanguard Man of the Year Award (2022).

He is also a former President of the Newspaper Proprietors' Association of Nigeria (NPAN). However, the quintessential man of letters is enthused about two honours done to him in his home state. The first being the offer to name the Department of Mass Communication of the state-owned Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua, Ikot Ekpene after him and the most recent institution by one of his admirers, Mr Udom Inoyo, of the Annual Ray Ekpu prize for Investigative journalism worth N500,000 for journalists practicing in Akwa Ibom State. This last award seems to embody Ray's lifetime commitment to promote excellence and ethics in media practice. He loves it because of its currency. Previous honours belong in the past. The Award on Investigative journalism is in perpetuity, a sustainable legacy to his strides and stripes in the field.

The odyssey of this rare ray that pierced through the sleepy backwoods of Ukanafun, shone through Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, illuminated the Department of Mass Communication of the University of Lagos, lit up the pages of the newspapers in the Chronicle stable and who captured the imagination of an entire nation is a story of heroes. Although his country still moves "in circles", Ray Ekpu should be satisfied that he has done his bit in the best way possible.

If Ray Ekpu were to be a bird, he would have been a nightingale - 'the bird with the most powerful and sweet songs'. Ray has written several thousands of deep, inspiring, enjoyable but serious, scathing and interesting interventions on critical issues of the season and times. The bold activist journalist is a survivor. Although bereft of the flamboyant lifestyle of those who have compromised the high ideals of his chosen profession, his trail still glows and cannot be extinguished.

On this day of the rare Ray of Journalism, one wishes a happy birthday to an amazing 'pen pusher' who caught national and global attention and for whom the world beat a bush path to find.

Shine steadily and Happy 75th birthday, Raymond Amos Ekpu.

Dr. Nana, a media scholar, is the Founder, Uyo Book Club

Load-Date: August 18, 2023

---

End of Document

NMMA honours PUNCH, others - Punch Newspapers

The Punch

September 22, 2022 Thursday

Copyright 2022 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 508 words

Body

---

The PUNCH newspaper has been honoured by the Nigeria Media Merit Award for endowing the Olu Aboderin Prize for Entertainment Reporter in support of media development in the country.

The newspaper was honoured at the NMMA's 30th anniversary flag-off and corporate recognition dinner, attended by media experts, captains of industry and other dignitaries in Lagos on Tuesday.

The award was received by the newspaper's General Manager, Digitals and Publications, Mr Ademola Oni; General Manager, Corporate Affairs, Mrs Olufolakemi Gbemuotor; and the Editor, Weekend Titles, Mr Olusola Fabiyi.

The Chief Host of the event was the governor of Lagos State, Babajide Sanwo-Olu, who was represented by the Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Information, Olumide Shogunle.

The event was flagged off by the Chairman of the NMMA Board of Trustees, Dr Haroun Adamu, while NMMA Trustee and Administrator, Samuel Akeju, thanked God for how far the organisation had come since its inception.

The keynote speech was delivered by the Chief Executive Officer of the Nigerian Communications Commission, Umar Danbatta, who spoke on "Current Issues in the Telecommunications Industry in Nigeria".

He was represented at the event by the commission's Director of Public Affairs, Reuben Muoka.

Related News

Punch requests forfeited assets' details from EFCC, ICPC

PUNCH appoints Joseph Managing Director/Editor-in-Chief as Osinubi retires

US Mission congratulates PUNCH's new editor, Oketola

According to the NCC boss, the commission is proud of the NMMA and would appreciate more collaboration between the media and the commission towards achieving Nigeria's communication goals.

NMMA honours PUNCH, others - Punch Newspapers

He said, "There is no gainsaying that the quality of our society's media system is significant to its ability to harness and harvest its resources for growth and development. That explains why the NCC guards its relationship with the media very jealously.

"In other words, our relationship with the media is a partnership that is both collaborative and strategic. This relationship is not underlined by the fact that the media is a constitutionally recognised social institution in all societies; it is underscored by the fact that the Nigerian media's systems of communications have lived up to other responsibilities as special enablers of Nigerians' aspirations and development.

"So, the NCC has never taken the media for granted, and the commitment to nurturing the relationship is the reason the commission has dedicatedly honoured the request by the media for engagement towards nation building and development."

Special recognition was given to a veteran broadcast journalist, Mohammed Ibrahim, who was also celebrating his 82nd birthday on the same day.

Also, the founder of Arise Television, Nduka Obaigbena, was recognised by the NMMA for his over 30 years of commitment to the media industry.

The Guardian and ThisDay Newspapers were honoured for endowing the Alex Ibru Prize for Investigative Reporter and the Dele Giwa Prize for Editor Reporter, respectively.

Load-Date: September 22, 2022

---

End of Document

Ex-Police Chief Opens Up On Dele Giwa Assassination

Daily Trust (Abuja)

October 26, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 322 words

Body

---

Twenty-nine years after the murder of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, a retired police chief, Chris Omeben, who conducted the investigation says the unresolved assassination is the most frustrating case he handled in his career.

Giwa, the founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, was killed through a parcel bomb at his Ikeja, Lagos residence on October 19, 1986.

Omeben, a former Deputy Inspector-General of Police (DIG), who turns 80 today, told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) yesterday that the high profile investigation was marred by interferences from "high places."

The DIG explained that even when he had narrowed in on the principal suspect, who could have thrown more light on the riddle, the suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria.

"They said somebody brought a parcel and his son Billy received the parcel and took it to his father (Dele Giwa), who was having his breakfast that morning.

"On the breakfast table was a man called Kayode Soyinka, he was there; Dele was there and then the son Billy handed over the parcel.

"And as he did so, I heard Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

"It was while he was there that the parcel detonated. Dele was injured and eventually died. The metal partition separating the dining room and the kitchen was destroyed.

"Beyond that, everything in the kitchen was destroyed. If metal could be mangled this way by the bomb, what of human flesh, what happened to Soyinka? Nobody could give me an answer.

"My conclusion was that Soyinka knew what was coming and he left the room to hide behind the wall.

"I took note of all these, went back to conduct an identification parade. We had an identification parade and got people of different physical attributes to be identified by the day watch.

"Eventually, when one of those paraded was said to bear a resemblance to the person that delivered the bomb, in spite of my insistence to have the man quizzed, we could not.

NAN

Ex-Police Chief Opens Up On Dele Giwa Assassination

Load-Date: October 27, 2015

---

End of Document

A master-reporter on top of his game

The Nation (Nigeria)

February 28, 2021 Sunday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 2370 words

Body

---

In Born into Journalism: Memoir of a Newspaper Reporter, Kayode Soyinka has penned a memorable and unforgettable memoir, destined to become a classic of its genre. The great memoir requires three vital ingredients: excellent writing skills, a vivid imagination and fantastic memory. This memoir boasts of all the three qualities. Arguably Nigeria's best known and best-connected international journalist, Soyinka can now be said to have joined its pantheon of remarkable writers.

Written in crisp, lucid prose and with the fastidious elegance of a man who cannot afford to make mistakes, this is the moving story of growing up and maturing in full public glare. Having started out as a boy-reporter, barely eighteen years of age, Soyinka has become an elder-statesman of Nigerian journalism and himself a grandfather to boot.

How time flies, we may say. But flying time also carries storms and biting dunes. The journey has not been easy. It requires hard work, persistence and integrity. Soyinka is an epitome of all these. Despite his perpetual boyish looks and spontaneous affability, he can be as tough and hard as a palm kernel. At the appropriate time, the hardy no-nonsense Owu man in him always comes to the fore hinting the unwary that this is not a person to needlessly or heedlessly toy or tangle with.

The road to excellence and human distinction always requires hard work and unremitting toil. From humble beginnings, Soyinka has clawed his way up to the summit of his profession. He has collected a few scars along the way. But then, the road to stardom and distinction is not for the weak, the feeble and the faint-hearted. As this rich memoir unfolds, you have a sense of destiny and inexorable fate and of a career guided by providence.

So racy is the pace of this book, so riveting are the revelations of the intrigue-soaked nature of contemporary Nigerian journalism, and such is the remarkable clarity of exposition, that it was after a first reading that a reader drew the this writer's attention to the copious praises of admiration and appreciation heaped upon him by the author.

Soyinka was not born with a golden spoon. Although his parents could not be described as dirt poor, they were far from affluent. Life began in a room and parlour apartment of a garrison-like block belonging to Alhaja Humani

A master-reporter on top of his game

Alaga, the famed Ibadan women leader and staunch Action Group supporter. The occupants of each apartment were identified by the number. The Soyinkas were known to the co-denizens as No2.

Even when they moved to their own buildings at the low-keyed suburbs of Odo Ona, things were far from rosy. The father was mid-ranking storekeeper at the Nigerian Tobacco Company while the mother was a dutiful and devoted seamstress.

Like many members of the southern educated class thrown up by colonial intervention, the Soyinka parents subsumed their own ambition in the ambition of their children selflessly giving up whatever aspirations they had for the sustenance and upbringing of their offspring. Soyinka's mother made sure that her children stood out from the crowd and were always elegantly turned out while the father made sure they never lacked anything within what his meagre resources could afford.

It was a childhood of happiness and contentment. An extant picture of the time shows a swankily suited Kayode and his older brother, Adesina, flanking their equally comely mother. Another shows the two brothers finely attired like royal princes peering at the outside world in satisfaction and unruffled delight.

It was a confidence and capacity-boosting upbringing. Kayode grew up a confident and self-assured person. This began to show right from primary school. It was as if the young boy was marked by a star quality. In 1967 at the age of nine he was chosen to lead the entire Western state's troops of the Boys' Scout to welcome to their camp the military governor of the state, the then Brigadier-General Adeyinka Adebayo.

He had followed up on this star performance at the Primary School with an equally impressive string of laurels in Secondary School. The famous Baptist Boys High School was his father's alma mater and he felt very much at home in the Egba ambience. Soyinka was an organist, a soprano and a champion debater for the school. At this point, any lingering doubt that the young man was marked out for greater things would have been dispelled.

But no one knew where and how the pendulum would swing. The young Soyinka had wanted to be a lawyer, a journalist or a political scientist. In the event, a combination of totally unforeseen developments conspired to push him in the direction of journalism. A friend of his uncle and a power broker in the old Sketch establishment had come visiting and had encouraged him to apply to the organization whenever they advertised for the job of a reporter.

One thing led to another and shortly afterwards, Soyinka found himself ensconced as a cub reporter at the head office of the Sketch Publishing Company in Ibadan. As usual, he proved himself a fast and diligent learner. His courtroom reports from Iyaganku soon attracted the attention of the authorities and he was celebrated as a young man of great promise. Some of the lowly staff began hailing him as editor in the making.

There can be no doubt that given the remarkable flair he had shown for the job within a short period and his outstanding competence, Kayode would eventually have made the editorship cadre of the newspaper. But that was only if things had remained stable and events had remained constant and unchanging.

But in human affairs the only constant thing is the sheer inconstancy of events and the random contingencies of life itself. What seemed like an open door could lead to a cul de sac while a cul de sac could suddenly become a wide thoroughfare. Impressed by Soyinka's star performance, the authorities at Sketch Publishing Company decided to send him for further training at the famous Fleet Street College of Journalism in London.

The deal was that after his training, the budding journalist would be bonded to the company for the number of years. To cap it all, soon after he arrived in London, Soyinka was appointed as the London correspondent of the newspaper. In effect, he had become the overall head of the London Bureau of the newspaper, a very big post for a young man of twenty three.

For the young man what appeared to be a glittering entrée into the powerful world of global opinion brokers actually turned out to be a gruelling rite of initiation into the often paranoid, cloak and dagger milieu of journalism .Six months before he could finish his course both his appointment as London correspondent and his sponsorship got the big boot.

A master-reporter on top of his game

After the installation of the new civilian administrator in Oyo state and the emergence of Segun Osoba, the veteran journalist and administrator, as the new helmsman, a gale of furious recriminations and terminations of appointment swept through the newspaper. According to his memoir, Osoba himself had been at the receiving end of the intrigues and high-wire politics even before his appointment.

But now that he was in charge, it was obvious that he was not going to allow people of unsure and divided loyalty to sabotage his efforts at rebuilding and repositioning the paper. Despite his excellent performance on the job, Soyinka must have been fingered as a protégé and beneficiary of Dayo Duyile who was Osoba's principal rival for the job and a known sympathiser of the NPN, a party that had been resoundingly trounced at the polls.

All entreaties that Soyinka was a neutral and independent player fell on deaf ears. Even the hint that the Sketch Publishing Company was legally bound to fulfil its side of the contract to sponsor the young journalist cut no ice with the authorities. Rather than going back to Sketch in an atmosphere of hostility and humiliation, Soyinka was faced with no alternative than to resign his position and seek his fortunes elsewhere.

His next port of call was the Concord Group under Henry Odukomaiya who appointed him as the London correspondent of the newspaper owned by the business magnate, MKO Abiola. It was a very rewarding time professionally for the young journalist. He was to serve under the tutelage of some of the best editors the country had thrown up as at that time: Doyin Abiola, Yakubu Mohammed, Ray Ekpu, Duro Onabule and Dele Giwa who took to the young journalist as if he was a blood relation.

But MKO Abiola's management style was as eccentric as it was unpredictable. He could hire and fire with remorseless alacrity, depending on which side of the bed he had woken up. He once ordered Kayode through a phone call from Lagos to fire his own blood brother as Financial Director of the company. Sule Abiola was on holiday in London and was staying with the newly wedded Soyinkas.

It was an unmistakable sign of inevitable mishap and it came sooner than later. What began as a chummy father and son relationship in which Abiola ceded to Kayode the right to sign cheques on his behalf and the authority to disburse enormous sums of money without any clearance eventually degenerated into a traumatic tiff with the young foreign correspondent shortly after his wedding.

When Abiola could not get any of his top management team to fire Soyinka, he undertook to write and sign the letter of dismissal himself. This was after a tense faceoff. The newly wedded journalist whose wife was expecting their first baby had appeared tardy and reluctant to comply with an earlier instruction to report forthwith to the Lagos Headquarters on the legitimate ground that he was not recruited from Nigeria.

After a brief stint with Peter Enahoro's Africa Now, Soyinka was appointed the founding London Bureau Chief of the newly established trendsetting Newswatch magazine. It was a reunion of professional soul mates. The trio of Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu and Yakubu Mohammed finally got their own comeuppance from the implacable business mogul after a celebrated public spat.

It was at Newswatch that fate played its cruellest joke on Soyinka. On the morning of October 19, 1986, Dele Giwa was blown out of existence after a huge envelope which turned out to be a parcel bomb was handed over to him in his study by Soyinka having been delivered by some mysterious people who were said to have come on a motor bike. It was a novel and daring method of elimination which sent shock waves through the nation.

Soyinka was in Lagos on routine consultation with his bosses at Newswatch. As anybody who knew him well enough would attest, Dele Giwa lived virtually in his study where he loved to have his meals and hold intense intellectual conversations while showing off his rich collections of books, records and other memorabilia. As the first non-staff columnist of Newswatch, had yours sincerely been in Lagos on one of those trips, he would certainly have been in the study.

A master-reporter on top of his game

In order to obliterate traces of the heinous crime and fob off genuine investigations, Soyinka became a victim of a cruel and vicious game of disinformation so beloved of the intelligence community. Despite the fact that he lay critically wounded with concussions and perforated eardrums next room to where Dele Giwa's shattered body was laid out, he was fingered as a prime suspect in the dastardly murder.

As Soyinka himself puts the absurdity of the development in this gripping memoir: 'This could only have happened if I was a suicide bomber. Otherwise, how could anyone explain someone carrying a parcel bomb and knowingly detonating it in his own presence?' (p296) Yet this notwithstanding, a rogue organization actually took him to court on the ground of being the principal suspect and for years his name was fed into all entry and exit points as an assassin on the loose. Nigeria had become an Orwellian nightmare.

After being smuggled out of Nigeria in a disoriented and dishevelled heap, Kayode Soyinka was to give the country a wide berth for six years until the Babangida military junta fell in utter disgrace and terminal disorientation as a result of the annulment of the June 12 1993 presidential election emphatically won by MKO Abiola, Soyinka's old boss. Soyinka was later to team up with Abiola in London in the battle to reverse the annulment of the election.

For Soyinka, it was the hour of gold as well as the hour of lead. While the spectacular success of Newswatch magazine brought him considerable international attention, the even more spectacular despatch of its charismatic founding editor in his presence brought him global name recognition. Fate had once again played a cruel card. This was not the kind of immortality anyone would crave and it concentrated his mind about securing his own lasting legacy.

After almost two decades of tumultuous apprenticeship, Soyinka decided to strike out on his own. In May, 1995, the international magazine, Africa Today, debuted with Soyinka as publisher and editor in chief to much hoopla and considerable attention. It had carried a rare full interview with the iconic Nelson Mandela who also graced the cover. The boy from Odo Ona has come into his own.

This was where fate conjoined the two of us once again. Yours sincerely was designated columnist and editor at large, a relationship which subsists till the moment. Our first piece was an October 1st survey of Nigeria, titled: A Giant Toddler At Thirty Five. It is left to morbid anatomists to conclude whether twenty six years after Nigeria remains a toddler or a monster man-child.

It is a tribute to Soyinka's courage and audacity that Africa Today is still standing where many others have faltered and fallen. The magazine has weathered some severe storms including two seizures by the Abacha junta over articles written by yours sincerely. At a point, the exasperated dark goggled tyrant was known to have exploded: 'Who is .....?' (Name withheld) But that is a story for another day.

This is a moving story of quiet heroism and dignified generosity of spirit. At every turn, Soyinka heaps effusive praises on his comely and personable wife, Titilope. Born into Journalism is the work of a master journalist at the very summit of his trade. Kayode Soyinka has come a long way indeed.

Load-Date: March 1, 2021

---

End of Document

How Nzeribe helped IBB annul Abiola's election

PM News

May 8, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1128 words

Body

---

One major atrocity credited to Arthur Nzeribe who died Sunday was the formation of the Association for Better Nigeria, used to annul Nigeria's best election held June 1993.

Nzeribe, born in Oguta Imo State was the mastermind of the group, which was not in anyway a mass movement.

It was set up by the military intelligence to perpetuate General Ibrahim Babangida's rule till 1997.

Nzeribe's ABN came in handy in 1993, when it was used to scuttle the June 12, 1993 election won overwhelmingly by Chief MKO Abiola's.

P.M. News found an essay by Michael Orodare of Neusroom in June 2021 a fair account of the somewhat treasonable role of the ABN, with Nzeribe as the mastermind.

Read all:

Classified in many reports as a shadowy group and a willing tool in the hands of Nigeria's former military head of state General Ibrahim Babangida, the role played by the Association for Better Nigeria (ABN) in the annulment of the June 12, 1993, presidential election remains indelible.

Although the personality of Babangida may have dwarfed the many atrocities of ABN and its promoters, the group prepared the ground for the declaration that scuttled what has been described as the most credible election in Nigeria's history: The presidential contest between MKO Abiola of the Social Democratic Party (SDP) and Bashir Tofa of the National Republican Convention (NRC).

How ABN was formed.

ABN was formed after the Babangida regime abolished all political parties and created two national parties - NRC and SDP in 1991.

How Nzeribe helped IBB annul Abiola's election

The New York Times described ABN as 'a lobbying group of wealthy businessmen, politicians and military officers who had led a highly visible campaign urging General Babangida to remain in office at least four more years'.

Although it claimed it had millions of members, ABN's only known leaders were Arthur Nzeribe, Brigadier Haliru Akilu and Abimbola Davies.

'The primary objective of the ABN was to keep Ibrahim Babangida in power and maintain the military administration that has governed Nigeria for so long,' a report by the Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada says.

To achieve its objective, the ABN put up billboards in Abuja with the message 'Four More Years', implying that Babangida should stay in power for another four year term.

'The intensity of the ABN's pro-government campaigns led many observers to conclude that the federal military government was behind the activities of the association,' another report says.

ABN and the 1993 Election.

After years of military rule, Babangida promised to hand over power to a civilian president on August 27, 1993. He set up the National Electoral Commission (NEC) and appointed a Professor, Humphrey Nwosu as Chairman..

The Presidential election between Abiola and Tofa was billed for June 12, 1993. Two days before the election, members of the ABN filed a suit before the Abuja High Court asking NEC not to hold the election.

On the eve of the election (June 11) Justice Bassey Ikpeme ordered the suspension of the election but NEC ignored the order and went ahead citing Decree 13 of 1993 which ousted the courts' jurisdiction with regard to creating impediments to the transition to civil rule programme.

Related News

Arthur Nzeribe will forever be remembered - Uzodimma

Maverick politician Arthur Nzeribe is dead

While the results were trickling in, ABN members approached an Abuja High Court again asking it to stop the announcement of results.

'Justice Dahiru Saleh was around to handle it, he didn't assign it to any other judge. He decided to hear the matter himself,' journalist Richard Akinnola wrote in his book 'A Mandate Buried Alive'. 'Though the suit filed was Motion on Notice, where the other party, that is, NEC would be heard, Saleh decided to hear the matter ex parte in Chambers, stopping further announcements of the results.'

Saleh ordered NEC to halt the release of the election results on the grounds that the election ought not to have been held in the first place. NEC complied with the ruling but headed for the Court of Appeal to challenge the order.

'In that appeal, we attached all the results of the election...showing that Abiola overwhelmingly won the election,' Nwosu wrote in his book 'Laying the Foundation for Nigeria's Democracy: My Account of June 12, 1993, Presidential Election and Its Annulment'.

On June 23, 1993, a day after NEC filed its appeal, Babangida nullified the election, and suspended NEC.

'These steps were taken to save our judiciary from being ridiculed and politicized locally and internationally,' Babangida said.

The ABN suit was the foundation upon which Babangida's annulment of the election was based.

The promoters of ABN.

How Nzeribe helped IBB annul Abiola's election

Arthur Nzeribe, a former Senator from Imo state, was the leader of ABN. He was Senator from October 1983 to December 1983. After the transition to democracy in 1999, Nzeribe contested as Senator again and spent eight years at the Senate from 1999-2007.

'I am proud that we cancelled the election. I wanted the election cancelled and it was cancelled,' Nzeribe, 82, told the New Telegraph newspaper in 2014 when asked about his role in the annulment of the June 12, 1993 election.

Abimbola Davies - ABN's National Director of Organisation, was 36 years old in 1993 when he played an active role in the annulment of the election.

In a 2018 article, Dele Momodu who is regarded as one of Abiola's confidants revealed that Davies later dumped the group and fled the country after addressing a press conference renouncing his membership of ABN and exposing some of its activities.

'Nigerians, we are guilty, but forgive us! Pride will not allow some of us to come out, but this I am doing on behalf of myself and other States,' Davies, now 63, reportedly said at the press conference.

Hamisu Gambo - in his July 1994 press conference, Davies named Gambo as one of ABN promoters. Gambo, a former lawmaker, is a chieftain of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) in Katsina state.

He contested for the Senate under the PDP in 2019 but lost to the APC.

Haliru Akilu was a Director at the Directorate of Military Intelligence under the Babangida regime. He is a very close ally of Babangida and his wife and Maryam Babangida (Babangida's late wife) are cousins.

He is believed to have given the ABN all the support that emboldened its members including influencing the controversial court orders that scuttled the election.

In 2003, the Oputa Panel accused him of having a hand in the death of journalist Dele Giwa.

'On General Ibrahim Babangida, we are of the view that there is evidence to suggest that he and the two security chiefs, Brigadier General Halilu Akilu and Col. A. K. Togun, are accountable for the death of Dele Giwa by a letter bomb. We recommend that this case be re-open for further investigation in the public interest,' the panel said in its rep

Load-Date: May 9, 2022

---

End of Document

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Naija 247 News

December 21, 2022 Wednesday

Copyright 2022 Naija 247 news Media Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1438 words

Body

---

What is the story of Nigeria's failure as a nation? It is the the story of the failure of journalism which refused to watch over the power players but rather watch over the pockets of the journalists.

By Tunde Akande

My friend and workmate, Professor Jimi Kayode, now of Lagos State University, teaching mass communication but formerly director of the Nigerian Institute of Journalism in Lagos where we worked together told me a story about the decadence that has become of journalism and journalists in Nigeria. He was somewhere on the Lekki Ajah axis in Lagos standing at a bus stop waiting for public transport, usually bone shakers; he had no car. After waiting for some time under the intense heat he got tired but then a state-of-the-art car parked at the bus stop and the driver beckoned to him. The driver of the beautiful car happens to be a student he had trained. Jimi Kayode hopped in but was amazed at the speed of things happening in Nigeria. The student was just a few years out of the NIJ, and now he rode one of the best car models in town. 'How did you get this car?' he asked the former student. 'What do you do? Aren't you a journalist?' By that last question, Jimi was sounding the training he had received which he had also given to generations of his students; if you want money go to business, don't come to journalism but if you want fame, journalism should be your forte. If you want power, go to the civil service.

In his well-cooled car, the former student took a look at his old teacher and giggled. 'Oga,' Yoruba word for boss, he replied in a very soft tone, 'journalism has changed from your time. Today, journalism is cash and carry. Those who need the services of the journalist pay him or her in cash and kind.' He reeled out names of his editors who have landed properties in choice parts of Lagos, the nation's commercial capital, and Abuja, the nation's political capital. 'When editors collect houses and money and are sponsored on holidays abroad, what sir, do you expect the reporters to do?' Professor Jimi Kayode was dumbfounded; poverty was written all over him; he graduated in 1980 and with his donkey years as both practitioner and teacher, he was still not anywhere near his student of just a few years on the job. He was not complaining but he wondered what will happen to the profession and the society it serves.

'Journalism has become cash and carry.' That is the story of the current public spat between the journalists of Nduka Obaigbena of the ThisDay and Arise media and the journalists of Bola Ahmed Tinubu, the presidential candidates of the APC. You wonder why they are described as journalists of Obaigbena and journalists of Bola Tinubu. It is because with their money these humans have bought these journalists and they use the organs not for the public good but for the private and selfish interest of the slave merchants. The story of journalism and journalists reflect the sad story of the decline of Nigeria. It should be like that. Journalists and journalism are very important factors in the development of nations. Journalism was the major instrument that scared the colonial power out of Nigeria. Journalists are purveyors of information. They are to make the comfortable uncomfortable and to comfort the uncomfortable. The journalist is involved in the class war between the poor and the rich, the haves and the have not. His duty is to publish what power holders try to hide and to give voice to the voiceless in society. Journalism is very important to democracy. Democracy is about the free choice of the people. The people must constitute the government and even after that constitution, the people must hold those who form the government to account for how they manage the commonwealth. In Nigeria especially, where the law is either nonexistent or made weak to suit the power holders who made them or interpreted in the courts to pander to the power holders, the men and women of means have found a way to control the massive power of the media. They employ them and they bribe them.

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Bayo Onanuga and Dele Alake in the stable of Bola Tinubu are fantastic journalists. Their first buyer was the late MKO Abiola, the late president of Nigeria that was not allowed to be by the power holders. Abiola won a popular election which was scuttled by a self-proclaimed military president, Ibrahim Babangida. The story of why IBB annulled the election of his friend is still a not fully known secret, some allege that Abiola had a drug issue in the US that made the Americans pressure IBB not to allow the richest black man then in the world to be president of Nigeria. But when Abiola had his eyes on the presidency, he procured the best journalists in the country and gave them very good salaries and good working tools. For the first time a flamboyant journalist, the late Dele Giwa rode a Mercedes Benz 200 and wore designer shirts and suits. Dele Giwa was a fine writer, and he became a model for all journalists in the country. Dele Alake, Bayo Onanuga, and a host of others joined Abiola's Concord train. They were so fierce in their duty that the Concord newspapers became the enemy of the military with whom Abiola was friendly. The journalists looked like they were fighting for the downtrodden but in real terms, they were fighting for the interest of Abiola. Bayo Onanuga refused to apologize to the military over a story and he and his team resigned from Concord to set up their own media empire, The News which became a torn in the flesh of the military.

But while The News was firing from all cylinders, it was the money of Bola Tinubu that was oiling the engine. A friend who is a journalist and a close friend of Onanuga and his team told me that constantly Tinubu was giving out cars and a huge chunk of money at different times to Bayo Onanuga and his team at The News. Dele Alake who had become Tinubu's commissioner for communication and strategy in Lagos is said to be the intermediary between Tinubu and Bayo Onanuga and his team. The truth of this relationship was brought out plainly when Onanuga and The News refused to publish anything on the story of Tinubu's drug deal allegations. In an interview, Bayo said frontally that they did not because 'we have a relationship with Tinubu'. Bayo Onanuga and his team are said to be proud owners of houses in Abuja and Lagos. Today, The News is dead, but Bayo is surviving playing a big role in Tinubu's quest to become the next president of Nigeria. Why did The News die? It had served the purpose of promoting Bayo into wealth and prominence and was not needed again. Babafemi Ojodu, one of the Bayo Onanuga's team parted ways with Tinubu and was the chief promoter of the failed Yemi Osinbajo presidency. Ojodu is a special assistant at the presidency.

Coincidentally, it is the story of the alleged drug dealing of Tinubu which The News refused to publish that is now causing a public spat between the Tinubu journalists and the Nduka Obaigbena journalists. Nduka Obaigbena came to the country with a big bang from the US, he set up a magazine, This Week, and became a big player in the media industry. But the journalists of This Week, many of them very good professionals and ethical were not smiling. Salaries may not be paid for months while with the same money earned by the sweat of these journalists, Obaigbena junketed all over the world. The story of unpaid salaries, inglorious and expensive lifestyle, and blackmailing with which the Tinubu journalists are now pinning down Nduka Obaigbena did not start with the ThisDay Arise media, they were so much talked about even in the days of This Week. This Week eventually died; some say because of these unethical behaviors. It gave rise first to ThisDay, then Arise, still with the character of This Week.

What then is the story of Nigeria's failure as a nation? It is the story of the failure of journalism which refused to watch over the power players but rather watch over the pockets of the journalists. It is the story of a Tinubu, an MKO Abiola, a Michael Ibru, an Emmanuel Iwuanyanwu, a Nduka Obaigbena, an Orji Kalu, all of them rent seekers who discovered that the souls of Nigerian journalists can be bought; bought them and derailed the dream of Nigeria using their massive media power. Let the Tinubu - Obaigbena public spat continue so the Nigerian public will know what has happened in the secret that has affected their lives for the worse. Perhaps the public might change their voting behavior.

Journalism Is Now Cash And Carry

Tunde Akande is both a journalist and pastor. He obtained a Master's degree in Mass Communication from the University of Lagos

Load-Date: December 22, 2022

---

End of Document

Who Replaces Adedayo Among Nigerian Journalists?

Nigerian Tribune

June 26, 2019 Wednesday

Copyright 2019 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 216 words

Body

---

Last week, it was widely reported that the Senate President, Senator Ahmad Lawan had withdrawn the appointment earlier given to Dr. Festus Adedayo as his Senior Media and Publicity Adviser following the reactions from critics on Social Media that Dr. Adedayo was Anti-Buhari.

Over the years, Dr. Adedayo has been using his pen to inform those in position of authority to put the right pegs in the right holes and to do good. I know Dr. Adedayo very well as a fearless veteran and brilliant journalist. This is what impressed Senator Lawan to appoint him as his media adviser. Dr. Adedayo should thank Allah for this. This a great moment in his life. After all, you are still alive. It is the appointment given to you that your critics came out on social media to take from you, not your life.

Dr. Adedayo, you and I were alive when the evil men sent a letter bomb to Mr. Dele Giwa and he lost his life in the process of opening the letter. God will not give them your life to take. Be assured that better days are coming when Allah in His infinite mercy will take you to the seat of vice president of Nigeria when your enemies will come around to beg for food Insha Allah.

Senator Lawan has proven to be a true democrat by giving you an appointment. I wish Senator Lawan a successful tenure in office.

Load-Date: June 27, 2019

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Death and Investigation - Why the Truth Cannot Be Told [opinion]

This Day (Lagos)

December 11, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 3300 words

Byline: Godwin Etakibuebu

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

Mustafa Adebayo Balogun, more known as Tafa Balogun, was appointed Inspector General of the Nigeria Police Force on 6th of March 2002, from the rank of Assistant Inspector General of Police (Zone One in Kano), shortly after the brutal assassination of an incumbent Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Nigeria; Chief Bola Ige, on December 23, 2001. Tafa Balogun, in his first public address to the Media as IGP, vowed to "fish out those who killed Chief Bola Ige". Many Nigerians believed him, maybe because Muhammadu Gambo (a feared and smart former inspector general of police) brought Tafa Balogun up in the Police Force or just because Musiliu Smith; the non-performing Inspector General of Police Balogun succeeded, could not do anything tangible throughout his tenure, including the killing of Bola Ige.

I was not one of those Nigerians that believed Tafa, not because he could not do what he vowed he would do but because he would not be allowed to do it even if he were to throw all he had into the investigation. So, when I got him on phone to congratulate him on his appointment as IGP, I asked him a pertinent question. "Oga IG, I read about your vow to 'fish out killers of Bola Ige', will you really be able to fish them out, arrest them and prosecute them with whatever evidence to secure conviction in the Nigerian courts of law if the killers are the same people that appointed you as IGP?". Whatever the answer was and the discussion that followed cannot be menu on the table of this work.

Above preamble is chosen deliberately to help us secure better understanding to the subject-matter on the quality of investigations that took place when Dele Giwa; a Co-founder and Editor-in-Chief of the Newswatch Magazine, was killed on 19th October 1986, through parcel-bomb in his house on No. 25 Talabi Street, off Adeniyi Jones Avenue, Ikeja, Lagos. The Dele Giwa matter has proved further the fact that truth is very hard to kill. Or, how else can it be justified that almost 30 years after blowing the journalist out of life, with the first-ever parcel-bomb manifestation in Nigeria, the argument on the path-way of the investigation is suddenly taking a front-burner? It is because, the truth, like smoke of any type, cannot be covered forever. Yet the present debate is not anything about identifying and arresting the killer (or killers) of Dele Giwa but what we have instead is dramatics and furious noises of accusations and counter-accusations among the 'so-called' personae dramatis of investigators and close associates/relations of the victim.

Dele Giwa's Death and Investigation - Why the Truth Cannot Be Told [opinion]

Chris Omoben; a retired Deputy Inspector General of Police, now a Pastor and eighty years of age, opened the can of worn recently when he gave reasons for his failure; as the most top police officer in charge of the Dele Giwa investigation in 1986, in getting to the root of the matter, inclusive of not being able to apprehend the killers of Dele Giwa. There was no doubt that the old retired police officer exaggerated his story.

Yes, he did, mostly in his claim about how he was "frustrated by the Newswatch leadership for not being able to interrogate Kayode Soyinka". He also might not have used the proper language when he painted the "not-too-good relationship" between "Dele Giwa and his estranged wife" but that is not to say that a former wife of Dele Giwa's role in the "instrument that delivered the parcel to the victim's house that fateful day" did not come under scrutiny while the investigation lasted. I shall come to this later. Let us understand a fact clearly here that Chris Omoben, in his revelation, did not mention Senator Florence Ita-Giwa as the "estranged" former wife and it could not have been fait accompli on the respected Senator, who was married to Giwa for only ten months or even less, because Dele Giwa had more than "one ex-wife".

Another point that needed to be quickly established before we move ahead is that as much as the retired DIG did not present all the "facts" of the case, which he had (or could it be he has forgotten most of those facts due to old age?), all those antagonising and calling him unworthy names today are as guilty as the old man because they are holding back more facts of events that happened then than they knew. Most of these Dele Giwa's "friends, colleagues and relations" plus some of these "vocal and fearless police investigators" are being economical with truth of events on the case. I happened to know "very little" about a "few things" around the episode of Dele Giwa's death. How did I know what I knew need to be established quickly if this presentation is to be judiciously evaluated and accepted as narration of "someone with limited knowledge" of the issue.

I was then reporting and writing for the Punch Newspapers in two major fields of Maritime and Crime, with very good contacts and connections in both sectors. In addition to reporting, I maintained regular columns; Maritime on every Tuesday and on Current Affairs every Wednesdays (OPED page). It may be in appreciation of my knowledge of the Nigerian crime community and the Nigerian Security Agencies (especially the Police Organisation) probably, that the Editor of Punch Newspapers (Daily); Najeem Jimoh, made me "Head of Crime Bureau" for the Punch. I must admit that the title itself was strange to me but nevertheless, in that capacity, I anchored most of the first-generation stories on Cocaine and other related hard drugs for the Punch Newspapers than any other Nigerian newspapers and magazines. And all those reports were as result of directly meeting and interviewing those involved - both police officers and arrested suspected couriers.

Sometimes I spoke to hard crime promoters, including drug barons, whom I cultivated during the course of my active practise as a Crime reporter and these were influential people within the Nigerian society - people who understood the game-play of "gentlemen agreement". One of those barons introduced me to Gloria Okon (her real names are different) in Lagos, long before the alleged arrest and death of this beautiful woman in Kano was announced by the security agency. Let us look at few of my encounters to appreciate the level of my involvement cum the derivable knowledge from the (my) participation.

With the explicit permission of the Police Authority, I sat with the first three Nigerians ever executed for drug (cocaine) pushing in Nigerian history, namely: Lawal Ojuolape, Bernard Ogedengbe and Bartholomew Owoh for comprehensive interview that lasted four days, while we played the game of draft, at Alagbon Close's office of the Criminal Investigation Department (CID). They told me all they knew about the "business" and how it would be "foolish for the government to talk of death in a business that we are all involved" - these were their words. This took place while they were waiting for trial and during the trial itself because they were kept in Alagbon all through the trial and only transferred to Kirikiri Maximum prison after death sentence was passed on them and the Punch Newspaper was the only media in the country that reported this detailed account.

Punch Newspapers published three centre-spread on Gladys Iyamah; the first female cocaine trafficker sentenced to death by firing squad in 1985 (but was never executed, not at least publicly), after this writer conducted a seven-day exclusive interview with her at Alagbon (again by the authorisation of the Police Force], an exercise that included visiting her husband (name with-held) in his CMS-Marina's First Bank office before meeting with her two midget sons (Gladys claimed that she did not know the substance she was caught with at the airport was cocaine but was misled to believing that it was a medicine substance she was to deliver to a doctor in London for the treatment of her two midgets sons) I took pictures of the midgets in their house in Ketu, Lagos, and these were published in the Punch Newspaper along the story.

Dele Giwa's Death and Investigation - Why the Truth Cannot Be Told [opinion]

When the story of Gloria Okon; the alleged drug courier arrested in Kano and said to have died in Police custody happened, it was the Punch Newspapers that broke the story on the first day and yours sincerely travelled to Kano to "verify things". I also knew that the dead body presented in Kano was not that of the beautiful Gloria Okon I have always known and whom I later met and had drink with in London at a later date. But unlike Dele Giwa who discussed(as alleged) his meeting with the same Gloria Okon in London with some people in government, I remained mute on neither knowing any Gloria Okon nor meeting with her till this write-up.

The Bible says "wisdom is profitable to direct" in the book of Proverbs. I am saying this to highlight a fact that one's knowledge of the crime industry, albeit cocaine movement per se, does not kill. Instead, it is in trying to make money through "some unholy alliances" of what one knows about the industry that was a sure way of signing one's death warrant, as it was then. I don't know what the rules entail now.

I need to say this as it may help in deepening our understanding of the subject-matter more so when the suspected basis of killing Dele Giwa, as mostly rumoured and accepted generally, was "his knowledge of cocaine and some highly placed couriers of the product", mostly the Gloria Okon angle. This may be true but there could be extension beyond just the knowledge for the conspiracy of "killing him" to have been enacted and prosecuted. Even in the crime world there are respected rules of engagement. Let us now go to the death and investigation of Dele Giwa.

I saw the mutilated (at the upper part of his two legs, just before the torso) body of Dele 'raw', as he laid on that stretcher naked, at the First Foundation Hospital on Opebi Road in Ikeja, Lagos, at about noon of that Sunday. Dr Tosin conducted four of us, Najeem Jimoh (Punch Editor), Umoren (Punch Chief Photographer), Titi Oshodi (Concord Crime Reporter) and me, into the room where Dele breathed his last. Looking at the face of a man I had drink with some days back in the house of David Isang (David Isang, a commissioner of Police in charge of Police Public Relations Department, hosted a few trusted journalist-friends of his), I was over-whelmed by anger against the killers because what I saw was a brutal and heinous way to terminate life.

I was in Dele's residence on 25, Talabi Street, off Adeniyi Jones Avenue, Ikeja, Lagos, in the evening of the same day, 19th October, at about 5pm and to my greatest joy, I met a very senior police officer in the person of CT Duwon. Duwon; a personal friend and ally (we had collaborated on many crime investigations in the past), then a Deputy Commissioner of Police at the CID in Alagbon, undoubtedly was the most accomplished police detective of his time, by all standard of rating, well respected both at 'home and abroad' for his uncommon efficiency in crime investigation.

Though he was the first most senior police officer to visit the "scene of crime" with his other colleague-officers and men, the situation he met was not palatable as there were more of personnel from the Directorate of Military Intelligence (DMI) and State Security Services (SSS) on ground and these two groups started, without announcing it, dictating the path of investigation, even on that very first day. We (Duwon and me) moved to a corner and discussed the matter for about five minutes before I left to the Punch office. Permit me to add quickly that this thorough officer, who was an authority on crime issues, was later to be 'killed' in his office at Force Headquarters when he was processing final details on cocaine report through "capsule detonation" by some "gentlemen visitors" - a fact the Police Authority would rather consign to oblivion.

The Crime Reporters' Association of Nigeria, had an office at the second floor of the Kam Salem Police Headquarters building on Molony Street, Lagos, (a facility I facilitated and so approved by the Inspector General of Police late in 1984) where we met weekly on Wednesdays but on Monday 21st, a day after the killing, we met there to peruse the tragic situation and adopt a methodology of fully being involved in the investigation.

My colleagues assigned me the responsibility of "coordinating" with the security agencies; we however gave responsibility of covering the military to a female colleague (not mentioning her name is deliberate in her own interest) who had such commanding influence of most top military of officers of that era, while we agreed that "no individual of us would go to press until total clearance is obtained". Our finding, as we were to discover earlier, could not help much in getting to the bottom of the investigation or assist in getting to "home of justice" as long as some individuals remained alive in the country. Yet, we continued on it until many things happened, which cautioned us to "do other things" - and here are few of them.

Dele Giwa's Death and Investigation - Why the Truth Cannot Be Told [opinion]

One, the man who drove the Peugeot 404 car; the very car that brought the parcel-bomb, with three other occupants in the car, to Dele Giwa's residence was arrested by the police and brought to Alagbon and the man (driver of the car) was alleged to be a driver of "a former wife of Dele Giwa". I did not know which of the "former wife of Dele Giwa" this particular influential woman was but what I did know was that "pressure from above" compelled police investigators to release the man (the driver) within twenty four hours without taking his written statement - what he verbatim confessed earlier was thrown into the dustbin of history.

Two, on the day when the driver (of the Peugeot 404) was picked up by the police, Lieutenant Colonel AK Togun, then Assistant Director with the SSS, visited one very influential woman who was "very close to Dele Giwa" and spent almost "three hours" with this woman somewhere in Lagos. Investigators believed that the purpose of that visit "was to blackmail the woman to compromise as regards the participation of the driver in delivering the parcel-bomb" because the involvement of the driver as regards the part he played was never in doubt.

Three, the closest that our (Crime Reporters' Association of Nigeria) investigation went was that "two serving Nigerian Army Majors" participated in putting the parcel-bomb together and there was another back-up car behind the Peugeot 404 on the journey to deliver the parcel-bomb and this back-up car had four occupants, three Nigerians and one foreigner. One of these four occupants (a serving officer of the Nigerian Army) was to die few months later, allegedly of "heart attack" while driving with his wife somewhere in Kaduna. Too many dirty things happened in the military then - these were captured vividly and factually by the female colleague in the Crime Reporters' Association of Nigeria I earlier mentioned.

Chris Omoben sent for me, after the release of the "big madam's driver", and I met him in his office Alagbon. He jokingly accused me of not "coming around to say hello to me, yet I know you are always around". I replied him saying, "you are now a very big man with higher responsibility before this Dele matter, hence I must not be seen as disturbing you sir". I had known him closely for many years before his movement to Federal Investigation & Intelligence Bureau as a DIG. He wanted to know how much I could help him, "it is me, your brother and friend, and not the police, that you are helping Godwin", were his exact words.

I told him that the Crime Reporters' Association had even mandated me to secure an interview appointment with him on this Dele Giwa matter. He objected vehemently to the request yet, we spoke lengthily, off record though, on the investigation. In concluding, he demanded of me not to "report all you hear or know about this case because it is more complicated than any individual can handle". I accepted his advice because I related with him as my senior brother and as I left his office after thanking him preciously, I knew that investigation to the death of Dele Giwa shall remain a closed case perpetually. I told my colleagues in the Crime Reporters' Association of Nigeria this that afternoon and I told my Editor same in the evening.

The question of who killed Dele Giwa shall never be in contention as retired Major Debo Bashorun (Military Press Secretary to President Ibrahim Babangida between 1985 and 1988) has made that task of identification easier in his book - Honour for sale: an inside account of the murder of Dele Giwa -where he accused his boss (IBB) of killing Dele. His failure to itemise the methodology, process and ingredients of execution of the crime removed glamour from his story. In addition, he waited for twenty seven years before blowing his whistle, and only after he had been aggrieved by his principal; the same suspected killer of Dele. His testimony might be truthful and totally dependable but for two reasons.

Yes, he was a press secretary to IBB from 1985 to 1988 but that did not make him one of the most trusted inner caucus loyalists of the dictator. If he had been, he would have either participated in the plan or have the details of those two Majors. Two, for waiting until he was aggrieved before speaking out has nothing to do with his "clean conscience" as he would make us believe in his narration, except again, he had told us "those few dirty assignments" he prosecuted for IBB. Finally, retired Major Debo Bashorun's "collaboration in silence" for twenty seven years adds no beauty to his revelation.

Dele Giwa's Death and Investigation - Why the Truth Cannot Be Told [opinion]

Why did Ibrahim Babangida and his men kill Dele Giwa therefore? The answer to this question was in the hands of Lieutenant Colonel AK Togun and he gave it to some selected journalists he spoke with at Ikeja airport on the 27th or thereabout of October, 1986. Listen to him. "One person cannot come out to blackmail us. I am an expert in blackmail. I can blackmail very well. I studied propaganda, so no one person can come and blackmail us after agreement".

The man told you here that there was an agreement on "forbidden area" of a particular discussion he and some people reached with Dele Giwa and that Dele did not respect the "gentleman" agreement. Either non-respect for that "agreement - whatever the agreement was - was enough to kill him should be a subject for another exercise of another day. The deducible fact of intention to commit the crime - to wit killing Dele Giwa, going by Lt-Col Togun evidence-in-chief, was "going back on agreement reached" or attempting making gains, either in monetary form or in patronage form, from "the road agreed not pass". He simply but indirectly admitted to the killing to the extent of giving reason, albeit blackmail.

Final question would be why using such most sophisticated and unconventional instrument of parcel-bomb, which was new to Nigeria, with its attendant's expected suspicion and curiosity when the same job could have been done with simple and non-questionable method of "road accident or even robbery attack"? The answer to this question is simple, and it was for the same reason that Lt-Col AK Togun announced it with all audacity at the airport interview quoted above that "one person cannot come out to blackmail us . . . I am an expert in blackmail".

The use of an unprecedented parcel-bomb and the public admission of "being expert in blackmail", are the mafia way of sending the message clearer to those who might want to dare in the future that "life is the I.O.U of the loser" in that "particular game". May God forgive Dele Giwa whatever sins (if there were any) that were accounted to him by his killers so that his soul can rest in perfect peace, while God should please; give us leaders and helpers in place of dealers and killers. Amen!

Godwin Etakibuebu, a commentator on current affairs, wrote from Lagos

Load-Date: December 11, 2015

---

End of Document

Uncle Ray is 75

PM News

August 6, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1612 words

Body

---

By Sam Akpe Sylvanus Ukaafia, a medical doctor and pastor, has fun memories of his first encounter with Ray Ekpu. His father, the late Owen Ukaafia, an accomplished journalist in his own right, worked at the once bubbling Nigerian Chronicle in Calabar, where Ekpu started his journalism career.

The senior Ukaafia kept feeding his son daily with juicy stories of excellent journalism, exemplified by the man we love to call Uncle Ray. Meanwhile, Sylvanus took to reading Ray's stories and weekly column in the Nigerian Chronicle avidly, hoping to, one day, meet him in flesh.

Then it happened, unexpectedly. Although he told me the full story years back, I cannot recall the exact circumstances, except that Sylvanus had attended an event as a student, and Uncle Ray was there.

When Sylvanus introduced himself, Ray took interest, because the surname sounded familiar. He stretched his arm and Sylvanus eagerly grabbed the hand.

It was a historic handshake. On reaching home, Sylvanus kept his right hand in his pocket.

He refused to either shake anybody, wash the hand or engage in any domestic chores. Concerned about the strange behaviour, his father asked what could have happened to him.

The answer stunned the old man: "I met Ray Ekpu today. We had a handshake, and I'm not washing this hand."

" Well, he couldn't keep it that way forever. That's the kind of magnetic impact Uncle Ray and his journalism have had on people.

William Michael, in his book, Secrets of Personal Magnetism, states that potential charm or magnetism is the heritage of every human. Through it, people can accomplish missions which would otherwise be impossible.

However, only a few know about it. You just cannot encounter Uncle Ray -- either physically or through his writings -- and walk away non-confiscated by the aura of his persona.

Uncle Ray is 75

Something will either turn you on towards him or make you feel like saying: who the heck does he think he is! Whichever way your impression goes, you must notice him. On meeting Uncle Ray, even for the first time, you will either get mesmerised by his uncommon baritone, be captivated by his unhindered, gripping, friendly and mentoring smile, or be stupefied by his blunt responses to issues.

I find him to be simple and humble. He demonstrated this with regard to me twice -- in 2014 and 2022. In 2014, he was a delegate to the National Conference called by President Goodluck Ebele Jonathan.

I was part of the administrative structure of the Conference, courtesy of my boss, Akpandem James, who was a principal officer there. After being drafted in as a rapporteur and later given the glorified title of media advisor to James, I met Uncle Ray just after the inauguration of the Conference.

I boldly walked up to him and introduced myself. Suddenly, he turned on his trademark charisma.

It still remains difficult to know whether he recalled my previous casual encounters with him or he was just his usual friendly self towards total strangers. With a hand on my shoulder, he pulled me aside with a fatherly smile and a conversation started.

Uncle Ray has a way with words. I have dreamt of being his remote journalism student.

Several decades later, I am yet to secure admission into his exclusive journalism school of bold expressions; smooth language full of metaphors and euphemisms; impeccable, factual presentations; and audacious short sentences and punchy words, pulled from his inexhaustible store-house of rich vocabulary. Both of us sat in James' office for over an hour.

The Conference was yet to kick-off fully, so he had all the time for this curious small boy. I mentioned to him my internship at the Nigerian Chronicle in 1985 -- a place he cut his journalism teeth in.

I told him how I loved to read his weekly column, and reminded him of an article he wrote entitled, "Enter Col. Ahmadu Adah Ali.

" This ignited a big laughter from him. He opened up.

I asked questions about his exploits in journalism. He responded.

He talked about his brotherhood with Dele Giwa and the impact of Dele's death on him personally; his (Ray's) journalism exploits at the Nigerian Chronicle, the Sunday Times, Business Times and how he joined and left the National Concord. Then he spoke about an idea that became Newswatch.

All along, I kept asking myself: is this the fire-spitting legend himself so humble, so accommodating talking to an ordinary me? It was a dream privilege. Then someone far above my level came and dragged him away.

In June 2022, I had another privileged opportunity of sitting down with Uncle Ray for a brief chat. James and I had just completed a book: The National Conversation: Intrigues and Interests that Shaped the 2014 National Conference.

Before its public presentation, I was in Lagos to deliver a copy of the book to two people. Uncle Ray was one of them.

Related News On arriving at his apartment, he was at the gate to receive me personally. I felt humbled by this gesture.

He ushered me into his modest dwelling place with such eagerness and undisguised attention that renewed my positive impression of him. For the next 40 minutes or so, we chatted like old friends.

He created such an atmosphere that made me long for a repeat visit. Uncle Ray has a way with words.

Uncle Ray is 75

I have dreamt of being his remote journalism student. Several decades later, I am yet to secure admission into his exclusive journalism school of bold expressions; smooth language full of metaphors and euphemisms; impeccable, factual presentations; and audacious short sentences and punchy words, pulled from his inexhaustible store-house of rich vocabulary.

As I write this tribute, I am again looking at that article on Ahmadu Ali, published in the Nigerian Chronicle style book as an example of what a feature story should look like -- full of lucid, seasoned, non-abusive, authoritative, non-libelous and instructive language. At that time, Colonel Ali, a medical doctor, was Education Minister.

As early as then (1978), Uncle Ray had developed a writing style that has remained everlasting -- witty and bold. This is one of the paragraphs with a description of Ali: "A short stumpy man, always spotting a full-stop moustache, pipe-puffing, Col Ali has a round boyish face that tells a lie about his age.

Col. A.

A. A.

was 42 last March 1." Another paragraph: "I do not know whether Ali is a soldier or a physician, a soldier-physician or a physician-soldier.

His ambivalence is that of a man whose vocation teaches the preservation of life, but whose occupation teaches how to destroy it. It's the ambivalence of a man who is trying to make his psyche obey two sets of laws, two sets of ethics, two sets of behavioural norms, and to foster two images in one person.

It cannot be easy." Uncle Ray could be quite picturesque in his writing.

Recalling the death of Giwa in a column published in Newswatch of 17 November, 1986, he captured in prose the picture of a shirt that was ironed for Giwa to wear that day, but which would never be worn because the bomber arrived just before noon, when Giwa would have put on the shirt: "The shirt hangs there, doing a gentle dance whenever the breeze blows its little flute. The shirt hangs there, mute and isolated like an orphan" Talk about style, here is the first paragraph of a column he wrote in Newswatch magazine on 4 February, 1985, entitled, "Snorters, Swiggers, Shooters.

" He states: "Oil boom. The big contracts.

Billions. Billions.

Then millions. Then a burst.

And the contracts vanished. Since Nigeria abhors a vacuum in the money-making business, the coke man came along.

At first slowly, imperceptibly, then furiously. A new life had happened, a style of drugs' smuggling and sniffing.

" Uncle Ray could be quite picturesque in his writing. Recalling the death of Giwa in a column published in Newswatch of 17 November, 1986, he captured in prose the picture of a shirt that was ironed for Giwa to wear that day, but which would never be worn because the bomber arrived just before noon, when Giwa would have put on the shirt: "The shirt hangs there, doing a gentle dance whenever the breeze blows its little flute.

The shirt hangs there, mute and isolated like an orphan" Ray Ekpu undoubtedly remains one of the revered high priests of the practice of journalism, both within and outside Africa. He practices the profession with a consistent touch of excellence.

Most of the times, it is not what he writes that thrills; but how he writes it. Sometimes, it is both.

Unfortunately, it is the same cherished, bold style that has put him in and out of jail several times -- without a conviction. It was unquestionably based on these bold strides in journalism that an award on investigative reporting was instituted for Akwa Ibom-based journalists in July 2021 by Udom Inoyo, a former executive vice chairman of ExxonMobil, in honour of Uncle Ray.

Uncle Ray is 75

The award, which comes with a princely N500,000 prize, has already been won twice. It is administered by an independent body of tested journalists, headed by Nsikak Essien, former editor of the defunct National Concord.

The body also has as members Kayode Komolafe (KK), a columnist and deputy managing director of ThisDay newspaper; Akpandem James, an old boy of Concord, Punch and Daily Independent; Professor Ini Uko of the University of Uyo; Amos Etuk, the NUJ chairman and Mrs Emem Nkereuwem, from Inoyo Toro Foundation. My mission today is simply to say happy birthday to Uncle Ray.

Pardon me for taking you on a journey. It is difficult to say anything about Uncle Ray without a little x-ray on his writing style.

Ray Ekpu is journalism and journalism is him. Happy Birthday, Sir.

(To be continued). Sam Akpe is a journalist and editor.

Load-Date: August 7, 2023

---

End of Document

Vanguard Reporter: Police Must Produce Killers Of Tordue Salem, Says Omo-Agege

Nigerian Tribune

November 12, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 426 words

Body

---

The Deputy President of the Senate, Senator Ovie Omo-Agege has tasked the Nigerian Police and other security agencies to conduct a thorough investigation that would expose the individuals behind the killing of Vanguard reporter, Tordue Henry Salem.

Tordue, who was last seen last month was found dead in Abuja in the late hours of Thursday, after allegedly being knocked down by a hit-and-run vehicle.

Before the unfortunate incident, he was a reporter with Vanguard Newspaper covering the House of Representatives.

Reacting to the development in a statement signed by Yomi Odunuga, Special Adviser, Media and Publicity the Deputy President of the Senate, the Senator representing Delta Central called 'for conclusive investigations that'll unmask all those involved in Tordue's death.'

While he acknowledged that a suspect

Itoro Clement - a commercial driver who allegedly knocked down and killed the journalist has been paraded by the police, Senator Omo Agege however noted that the development has raised further questions on the circumstances leading to his demise.

The Delta Central lawmaker noted that providing the missing puzzle is the only way to bring closure on the matter, adding that anything short of this would add to the list of unresolved murders of journalists carrying out their constitutional duties.

'The news of the killing of Mr Tordue Henry Salem came to me as a rude shock, especially as it came barely 48-hours after the Senate and House of Representatives passed separate resolutions tasking security agencies to intensify efforts to find him and reunite him with his family.

Vanguard Reporter: Police Must Produce Killers Of Tordue Salem, Says Omo-Agege

'I am particularly worried that this is happening at the heart of the Federal Capital Territory (FCT). Reports abound of kidnappings and other security breaches in the nation's capital.

'While we await further briefing from the police on who deposited Tordue's corpse in the morgue and when it was deposited, the sad development has added to the list of unresolved killings of journalists like Dele Giwa, founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine; Godwin Agbroko of ThisDay; Bagauda Kaltho of (The News); Bayo Ohu (The Guardian); Edo Sule Ugbagwu (The Nation) and Abayomi Ogundeleji (ThisDay), who were all murdered in the course of discharging their constitutional duties.

'I extend my condolences to the family, friends and associates of the deceased, the government and people of Benue State, the Vanguard family, House of Representatives Press Corps, Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) and pray God to give them the fortitude to bear this irreparable loss.'

Load-Date: November 13, 2021

---

End of Document

Ex-DIG Omeben Opens Up On Stalled Dele Giwa Assassination Investigation

Daily Trust (Abuja)

October 26, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 688 words

Body

---

Twenty-nine years after the murder of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, a retired police chief, Chris Omeben, who conducted the investigation says the unresolved assassination is the most frustrating case he handled in his career.

Giwa, the founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, was killed through a parcel bomb at his Ikeja, Lagos residence on Oct. 19, 1986.

Omeben, a former Deputy Inspector-General of Police (DIG), who turns 80 on Oct. 27, told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) on Monday that the high profile investigation was marred by interferences from "high places".

The DIG explained that even when he had narrowed in on the principal suspect, who could have thrown more light on the riddle, the suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria.

"They said somebody brought a parcel and his son Billy received the parcel and took it to his father (Dele Giwa), who was having his breakfast that morning.

"On the breakfast table was a man called Kayode Soyinka, he was there; Dele was there and then the son Billy handed over the parcel.

"And as he did so, I heard Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

"It was while he was there that the parcel detonated. Dele was injured and eventually died. The metal partition separating the dining room and the kitchen was destroyed.

"Beyond that, everything in the kitchen was destroyed. If metal could be mangled this way by the bomb, what of human flesh, what happened to Soyinka? Nobody could give me an answer.

"My conclusion was that Soyinka knew what was coming and he left the room to hide behind the wall.

"I took note of all these, went back to conduct an identification parade. We had an identification parade and got people of different physical attributes to be identified by the day watch.

"Eventually, when one of those paraded was said to bear a resemblance to the person that delivered the bomb, in spite of my insistence to have the man quizzed, we could not.

"Because interference now came from high places to protect the man.

Ex-DIG Omeben Opens Up On Stalled Dele Giwa Assassination Investigation

"The man was said to be related to the wife of a governor at that time and as a result of his connection we came to a dead end on that lead," the former police chief, who was in charge of the research department of the police CID, when Giwa was killed, said.

Omeben told NAN that the setback did not in any way deter him from using the evidence he had to follow the lead on Soyinka, and that he called on the Newswatch authorities to produce Soyinka.

"I have enough evidence to quiz Soyinka now. Please, Ray Ekpu can I have Soyinka now?

"They resisted up till today. Up till today Soyinka never appeared before the police.

"They started to insinuate that the assassination was masterminded by Babangida, Akilu etc.

"They said that Akilu ought to have been investigated.

"As a matter of fact, I had interrogated Akilu and he told me that yes they had invited Dele Giwa some few days before the assassination over a negative statement he made about Nigeria in a New York newspaper.

"He said that they had to invite him to tell him that he was wrong for portraying the country in bad light in the international press.

"Akilu insisted that the invitation was not enough to accuse the government of complicity in the assassination of Dele Giwa.

"He satisfied me with his explanation.

"Togun also absolved himself with his own explanation.

"The parcel bomb was said to have the Federal Government logo on it, which to me was not enough evidence.

"It was more of a circumstantial evidence. I can prove it!

"Go to any printing press if you are a "good" criminal and you are planning well, they can print it for you and place it on the parcel, and it will look as if it came from the government.

"But for me to satisfy myself, I said please gentlemen, can I have Soyinka?

"Nobody! Soyinka ran away to London that was my principal suspect!

"He did not appear until eventually I left the CID. I was retired from the police in 1989 and what happened after that I don't know,"

Omeben, now an Archbishop of the Jesus Families Ministries at Iyana Ipaja, near Lagos added.

He said that Giwa was also careless in maintaining a relationship with his estranged wife.

NAN

Load-Date: October 27, 2015

NUJ Calls for End to Impunity, Crimes Against Journalists

Vanguard (Lagos)

November 03, 2021

Copyright 2021 Vanguard Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 499 words

Byline: Innocent Anaba

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

THE Nigeria Union of Journalists, NUJ, yesterday, urged the Federal Government to prevail on security agents across the country to stop allowing themselves to be used to suppress, oppress and intimidate journalists in the country.

The call came at an event organised by Safety and Security Watch, in collaboration with the NUJ, Lagos Council, in Lagos, to mark this year's World Day to End Impunity for Crimes Against Journalists.

The Lagos Council Chairman of the union, Mr. Adeleye Ajayi, through the Vice-Chairman, Mrs. Abiola Beckley, at the event, said: "Cases of killed and missing journalists are becoming more worrisome.

"A few days ago, the NUJ in the Federal Capital Territory, FCT, staged a peaceful protest at the Force Headquarters for the safe return of the missing journalist, Tordue Henry Salem of Vanguard Newspapers.

"The journalists urged the Inspector General of Police, IGP, to ensure that the journalist, who has been missing since October 13, is returned alive to his family.

"They urged the IGP to step up intelligence and investigation to unravel the mysterious disappearance of Salem.

"We are also calling on the Federal Government to reopen the investigation of journalists killed in the past, and to look into cases of journalists that were killed, attacked, kidnapped and detained, as well as make concrete efforts to apprehend the perpetrators of the acts.

They paid with their lives

"We remember Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, Godwin Agboroko of This Day, Dele Giwa of Newswatch magazine, Edo Ugbagwu of The Nation.

"We also remember Abdul Ganiyu Lawal, a Freelance Broadcast Journalist, Ikechukwu Onubogu, a Cameraman with the Anambra Broadcasting Services. Lawrence Okojie of the Nigerian Television Authority, NTA, in Edo State, and Famous Giobaro, a Desk Editor with Glory FM in Bayelsa State, among others.

"Other journalists murdered are, Enenche Akogwu, Fidelis Ikwuebe, Nathan Dabak.

NUJ Calls for End to Impunity, Crimes Against Journalists

"Okezie Amaruben, Onifade Pelumi, Precious Owolabi, Sam Nimfa-Jan, Samson Boyi, Sunday Gyang Bwede, Tunde Oladepo and Zakariya Isa."

"As people who have a closely observed government in the last 21 years, we have come to appreciate all the more how important it is to protect our 'fourth estate'.

"Imposition of fines on media establishment by the Nigerian Broadcasting Corporation, NBC, is tantamount to gagging the press and is a threat to freedom of the press.

"The fines come at a time when media houses' ad takings are dwindling and other sources of revenue contracting in the wake of the economic recession.

"Many media houses are already worried about paying salaries.

"On this World Day to End Impunity for Crimes Against Journalists, we call on all security agents across the country to stop allowing themselves to be used in suppressing, oppressing and intimidating journalists.

"Journalists are the ones who can shed light on the growth of the country and also the shortcomings and as well the mouthpiece of the masses hence should be allowed to do their jobs."

Vanguard News Nigeria

Load-Date: November 3, 2021

---

End of Document

Stanley Macebu... 10 years in mind

The Sun (Nigeria)

March 21, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1108 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Amma Ogan

It was my first job after university in 1978, and that first meeting was like a session with my college tutor. As it turned out he had attended the same institution in England, which seemed serendipitous.

There was nothing remotely aesthetic about the famous Kakawa Street office in Lagos. It was essentially a grey concrete behemoth squeezed between the more refined tower blocks of Nigeria's central business district, which served as an outer shell for the giant iron printers that churned out Africa's largest circulating newspapers, the Daily Times and its Sunday Times sister. This behemoth also had cooped inside it, the other tentacles that completed the Leviathan known as the Daily Times of Nigeria Empire, packaging real estate and other sundry titles.

(adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({});

It was huge, it was ugly, it was noisy, it had no female toilet for senior staff, I had to borrow Editor Tony Momoh's keys. Its grey offices were concrete floored cubicles with single windows in the inner office where the oga sat, and artificially lit anterooms where the minions reigned. There was secretary Fidelis who truly lived up to his name, a messenger who should have been named Constant, and me, at a desk with my back to the door.

He would stride in every morning, this dapper man in a dark suit, a cigarette holder in his hand, tossing a curt greeting with a quick backward turn of the head, sometimes it sounded more like a grunt, open the door to his office and close it. The secretary would be half way out of his seat ready with the coffee, anticipating the sharp 'Fidelis!' that would come through seconds later.

Stanley Macebuh... 10 years in mind

Ever faithful, Fidelis was. He had an innate ability to decipher Stanley's handwriting. This was the pre-computer age and reporters wrote in long hand and gave their articles to a crew of supposed school leaving certificate-qualified copy typists, who banged it out on machines that were as old as the building.

```
(adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({});
```

Dele Giwa was completely horrified when he landed at Kakawa in 1979 as DTN Features Editor, after Stanley's inspiring spiel, to discover that reporters not only did not type their stories but were not expected to do so. He changed that immediately. For a man whose syntax had the effortless drape of silk, Macebuh's handwriting was a cramped, square lettered, hieroglyphic. If he is reading this now he should be chuckling. "You sef!"

His hands pressed through the off cuts, full stops piercing through to the sheets underneath, with angular shaped letters. He used every inch of the paper, economizing the space but imbuing every letter with an eloquence that wasted no words, was fluid and cerebral.

His appearance was always, neat conservative, compact. He was a small man, but only in that. His complexities were well hidden. There was almost fastidiousness about some of his mannerisms. If he scratched his hair mid-phrase he would do so discretely and then force it back down to remove any evidence that he had done so. He had that cigarette holder which he would chew on and insist that it was not an affectation but something to do with cutting down the number of cigarettes and probably, also, keeping the stain of nicotine off his fingers Old style journalist he wasn't.

I will always remember that Stanley observed the correct boundaries. This is not as common a trait as it should be. He had an honour code where people were concerned, his friends especially. He found a mission in journalism in Nigeria, which after the success of revitalizing the Daily Times, only to be met with the crassness of the political class that inhabited the administration of Alhaji Shehu Shagari, made the move to set up The Guardian inevitable.

There is a constant tension between the men of ideas and our realist denizens of "timber and caliber", the dreamers and the moneybags, the professionals and the investors. It is more than two differing worlds; it is also a clash of cultures and in many ways at the root of the Nigerian dilemma. We are losing the ability to articulate the values we once had because we are in danger of forgetting the language and practice of how to live well, materially and morally.

Patrick Dele Cole, Dele Giwa and Stanley Macebuh are three men and three friends, whose interventions redefined and refined the best of Nigerian journalism in the last three decades. Of the three, PD Cole epitomizes a successful balance of the tensions that Stanley was sometimes unable to resolve, while Giwa remained a skilled journeyman and a feisty and perceptive realist till he was assassinated under the military fist of a man who now thinks he can become president, again.

Those who Stanley brought to The Guardian, and they include a host of venerable names, were also enablers, inspired by the values he adhered to, intellectually and professionally, the success he achieved and the possibilities he promised.

Stanley Macebuh was not a "politician", a euphemism for the set of 'skills' you need to navigate our social system. He sometimes trusted too easily and too much. But he was a bigger man than many of the rascals he had to deal with, and as far as a mind was concerned, his towered above them all.

- Amma Ogan, veteran journalist, lives in South Africa

```
var quads_screen_width = document.body.clientWidth; if ( quads_screen_width >= 1140 ) { /* desktop monitors */
document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({}); }if ( quads_screen_width >= 1024 &&
quads_screen_width < 1140 ) { /* tablet landscape / document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({}); }if ( quads_screen_width >= 768 && quads_screen_width < 1024 ) { / tablet portrait */
document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({}); }if ( quads_screen_width < 768 ) { /* phone */ document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({}); }
```

Stanley Macebu... 10 years in mind

```
var quads_screen_width = document.body.clientWidth; if ( quads_screen_width >= 1140 ) { /* desktop monitors */
document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({}); }if ( quads_screen_width >= 1024 &&
quads_screen_width < 1140 ) { /* tablet landscape */ document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle ||
[]).push({}); }if ( quads_screen_width >= 768 && quads_screen_width < 1024 ) { /* tablet portrait */
document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({}); }if ( quads_screen_width < 768 ) { /* phone */
document.write(""); (adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({}); }
```

The post Stanley Macebu... 10 years in mind appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/6/158483204600.jpeg>

Load-Date: May 21, 2020

---

End of Document

The Controversial Lekki Conundrum

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

November 2, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1084 words

Byline: Ayodeji Ajayi

Body

---

Apart from the months they gladly celebrate their birthdays annually amidst pomp and pageantry with galaxy of eminent personalities from far and near in attendance, in addition to thanking the Almighty for the invaluable gifts of life and livelihood, one seemingly unique month many Nigerians, irrespective of political, religious, ethnic, cultural or occupational differences, profusely and unwaveringly cherish so dearly every year, is October ____ the 10th month. It was on October 1, 1960 that our beloved country, Nigeria and Black Africa's most populous nation, formally gained political independence from its age-long colonial master – Britain. Interestingly too, Nigeria became a Republic on October 1, 1963. Therefore, it is no surprise that since then, the country and its citizens who are mostly profoundly impoverished despite abundant oil and gas resources, as well as vast human and other natural resources largely due to successive years of bad governance by selfish, incompetent, clueless, insensitive and corrupt military and civilian leaders, have been observing October 1 every year as not only national public holiday but also with mixed feelings even if they are visibly angry, hungry and poverty-stricken.

Going down memory lane, the month of October in Nigeria, over the years, has been associated with the good, the bad and the ugly. It is those that are directly deeply affected, especially negatively, that actually know where the shoes pinch them painfully. This, in particular, concerns those that due to unforeseen circumstances arising from consequences of visionless leadership, had at one time or the other, lost loved ones, as well as invaluable properties in the month of October in such a way that the irreparable losses could if care is not taken, have life-long incalculable indelible emotional, psychological and mental causalities on affected individuals, families, friends, groups and even countries.

A typical disastrous occurrence of historic importance that also attracted condemnation, controversy and public outrage from both within and outside Nigeria was the widely reported assassination of one of the country's highly celebrated and successful journalists of international repute, Dele Giwa. The manner in which the handsome, enterprising and adventurous pioneer Editor-In-Chief of NEWWATCH Magazine was wickedly killed in his Ikeja, Lagos residence while taking what obviously turned out to be his last breakfast on earth that black Sunday, was not only ingenious but also unprecedented in Nigeria. This is especially why perpetrators of the novel dastardly act that occurred on Sunday, October 19, 1986 and has since robbed our dear country and the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) of one of the shining stars in the noble profession of Journalism are yet to be found and brought to book to serve as a deterrent to others with blood-thirsty intentions in their warped minds.

The Controversial Lekki Conundrum

ABUJA DOCTOR REVEALS HOW OVER 2,000 NIGERIAN MEN ARE NOW NATURALLY OVERCOMING TERRIBLE BEDROOM PERFORMANCE DUE TO THIS BRILLIANT DISCOVERY. DON'T BE A VICTIM!

Many Nigerians, including members of the international community must have observed with the usual surprise and regret that on Monday, October 19, 2020 which coincidentally, marked exactly 34 years since life was snuffed out of defenceless Giwa on that ill-fated day which inevitably culminated in the unending question – Who Killed Dele Giwa? , the Nigeria Police Force (NPF) is yet to find his killers who are probably still freely roaming the streets. The assassination of the brave journalist on October 19, 1986 via parcel bomb which reportedly shattered his body beyond recognition was executed professionally in such a way that he would never come out of the gruesome act alive. The black Sunday was a day Nigeria joined the list of countries with unenviable record of human fatalities due largely to use of parcel bomb purposely meant to kill. This was why when Giwa was killed, sad news concerning the unfortunate incident swept across the country and beyond with volcanic speed, thereby leading to repeated requests that those that were directly or indirectly associated with the heinous act be made to face full wrath of the law. Unfortunately, 34 years afterwards, these genuine requests from members of the public, as well as the global community seem to have fallen on deaf ears under successive administrations. On October 19, 2021, it would be exactly 35 years since brilliant, lively and caring Giwa – an illustrious citizen of Nigeria who hailed from Edo State had his glorious star-studded professional accomplishments abruptly aborted and precious life terminated untimely at a relatively young age of only 39.Sadly, the unending catalogue of avoidable loss of lives and property, especially in the month of October resurfaced recently following reported killings, lootings and maimings across the country. Angry youths, in their millions, had for almost three weeks, staged peaceful protests in parts of the country demanding immediate disbandment of the infamous blood-thirsty, trigger-happy and killer-Special Anti-Robbery Squad (SARS), as well as holistic reform of the corruption-ridden Nigeria Police Force (NPF). Unfortunately, as usual, the largely peaceful and well organised and co-ordinated protests were later infiltrated by hoodlums that reportedly killed and maimed innocent and unarmed citizens, as well as looted and destroyed public and private properties in various parts of the country. The most topical issue continuously generating heated controversies and outrage within and outside Nigeria is the ill-fated conundrum or mayhem that occurred at the famous strategically located Lekki Toll Gate Plaza in high-brow part of Lagos State – Nigeria's fast-growing commercial capital. The saddening development there on black Tuesday, October 20, 2020, during which soldiers were alleged to have descended heavily on unarmed youths on ENDSARS peaceful protests, resulting in claims and counter-claims concerning numbers of those allegedly injured or killed, could have been averted if our political leaders had responded promptly to yearnings of the citizenry for good governance while the military and other security agencies had performed their statutory duties responsibly and professionally.

HOW A CHINESE DOCTOR DISCOVERED AN ANCIENT AND BRILLIANT CURE FOR ANY SORT OF EYE PROBLEM. I THOUGHT IT WAS A JOKE... CLICK TO LEARN MORE!!!

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/69/160436238062.jpeg>

Load-Date: November 2, 2020

My good friend Ojeagbase gone for good

My good friend Ojeagbase gone for good

The Sun (Nigeria)

March 5, 2022 Saturday

Copyright 2022 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1201 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

My plan this week was to write on the David-and-Goliath fight playing out horrifically on the world scene between the underdogs of Ukraine led by a Churchillian wartime leader, President Zelensky versus Vladimir Putin, the ruthless Russian oligarch.

I was about writing on Ukraine and Russia when the saddest of all news came announcing the death of my good friend Dr. Sunny Ojeagbase, the doyen and the pillar of sports journalism in Nigeria. The visionary ex-soldier, journalist and entrepreneur who single-handedly created a newspaper that became the template for future sports journalism in Nigeria. Last year when he was 70, I wrote a piece on him titled "70 YEARS OF OJEAGBASEISM." It's so sad that he died so early at 71. But it isn't how long you lived but the impact you made. Dr. Ojeagbase was a great man who left his imprints on sports journalism. For his 70th birthday, I sent Dr. Ojeagbase a birthday greeting on WhatsApp:

"To God be the glory. Happy 70th birthday to a great man of God and a great man of Journalism. I rejoice with you on reaching this landmark age. My prayer is that you will see more and more years in good health and prosperity. You are a survivor because the Lord is in your corner. Continually, you will be a winner to the glory of He who sent you. Happy birthday."

He replied: "Thank you, my brother, Mike. Thank you for ALWAYS being there. I thank GOD for letting our paths cross. May GOD continue to bless you and your wonderful family every day of your life. Love you!"

So, how did our paths cross such that we became "neighbours" sharing the upper floors of two three-bedroom flats in Egbeda area of Lagos, in those days of humble beginnings? It's a long story which started from Kaduna where I was the Chief Correspondent of Chief MKO Abiola's Concord newspaper group and I wrote for the legendary editor of the then Sunday Concord the late Dele Giwa compelling articles which dazzled him, such that he created for me a column called "Reporter's Notebook" where I started as a columnist. For Sunny Ojeagbase who was the Sports Editor of Sunday Concord, I also wrote a piece on Diego Maradona that impressed him and got it published. From Kaduna, Dele Giwa brought me to Lagos to work directly under him. There I became close to Ojeagbase, living next door to each other along Akowonjo Road, Egbeda. From Concord, he moved to The Guardian as Sports Editor.

My good friend Ojeagbase gone for good

At that Egbeda flat in 1984, we witnessed the births of our children. Then one day, Ojeagbase had this divine call to start Nigeria's first sports newspaper. It was the great motivational speaker Ubong King who said: "A man with a vision is a mad man until the vision comes to pass." Ubong King did not live to see 2021. He died on December 26, 2020 at the age of 48. May his soul rest in perfect peace. And may the souls of all the millions who died last year rest in peace.

When Ojeagbase had this vision, this burning zeal to start a sports newspaper, I was the first person he approached. He came into my room with a letter of resignation which he asked me to go and drop at The Guardian. I was hesitant. I was thinking: Is he thinking right? Does this guy want to commit suicide?

For the typical journalist who is used to being paid a monthly salary, who hadn't imbibed the spirit of entrepreneurship, leaving paid employment was akin to suicide. I was a bit hesitant in going to drop the resignation letter. The whole episode reminded me of when King Arthur in his dying days asked Sir Bedivere to go and throw his sword, Excalibur, into the lake but he declined. As a kid, I was fond of reading Arthurian legends. Like Sir Bedivere, I resisted but eventually submitted the resignation letter and the rest is history. Ojeagbase, armed with nothing, went to start Sports Souvenir, Nigeria's first sports newspaper which he was selling with his wife and children at the National Stadium, Surulere, during big matches. From there, God blessed him and the business grew, leading to Complete Sports and the array of international sports magazines and newspapers, making him the undisputed King of Nigeria's Sport Journalism.

Ojeagbase wrote in his memoirs: "The first time I deliberately took a faith-based, life-altering decision, knowing I was depending solely on GOD in taking the step, was when I boldly decided to start our sports publishing business without a single penny in my bank account. Before then, I had tried every method I knew to raise capital for the business. But none of them worked. Then, in October 1984, I was confronted with a big hurdle...a hard choice. The choice was that I either kept my sports editor job and adjusted to receiving lesser pay, or I quit the job and launched the sports publishing business without seed capital. I opted for the latter, putting my faith in GOD to see me through. It was a risky decision, no doubt. And I almost lost everything because of that single action, including social standing, prestige and self-worth. But in the end, the GOD I trust proved Himself to be dependable! The publishing business endured all the initial hardship that came its way. This business has been existing for more than 30 years now. And it is going very strong to the glory of Almighty GOD, our Sustainer and Great Provider."

The story of Dr. Ojeagbase goes beyond sports. It is the story of a survivor. If you read his book, "Testimony of a Kidney Failure Survivor," you will read about the "Secrets That Helped Me Overcome Sure Death and Prove the Faithfulness of GOD!"

His story is like the story of Job – a man who battled Satan and won. A man of God afflicted with life-threatening illnesses like diabetes and kidney failure but survived them all to write about his experiences. Trusting in faith healing, Dr. Ojeagbase one day, without telling his trusted wife, decided audaciously to do away with all his diabetes drugs. He writes: "There is a bridge linking Amuwo to Okota. As we approached the bridge, I told the driver to park the car at the foot of the bridge to discharge my 'cargo' without telling anyone what it was. As I threw away the cellophane bag containing my diabetes medication in the stream running under that bridge, I reaffirmed my trust in GOD that what He said in the Bible that I believe, will come to pass in my life."

That action nearly cost him his life, but for God. Many years after, a doctor forced him to return to his diabetes drugs. From kidney transplant in India to dialysis treatment in Lagos and Atlanta USA, God has miraculously rescued Dr. Ojeagbase from the shadows of death. And God has blessed him with a faithful wife Pastor (Mrs.) Esther Ojeagbase who is a big part of the Ojeagbase story. That he lived to see 70 years is by God's love, goodness and mercy to a servant who has trusted in Him. A man whose story will take many books to write. A man who has mentored many. A quintessential self-made man who survived death as a teenage soldier during the Nigeria Civil War to a legendary sports journalist, to a motivator, to the progenitor of information marketing and internet entrepreneurship in Nigeria, to a kidney survivor, to an evangelist preaching the Good News of salvation.

My good friend Ojeagbase gone for good

Load-Date: March 5, 2022

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa Assassination - Investigation Was Marred By Interferences From'high Places' - Ex-DIG

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 26, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 686 words

Body

---

Twenty-nine years after the murder of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, a retired police chief, Chris Omeben, who conducted the investigation says the unresolved assassination is the most frustrating case he handled in his career. Giwa, the founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, was killed through a parcel bomb at his Ikeja, Lagos residence on Oct. 19, 1986.

Omeben, a former Deputy Inspector-General of Police (DIG), who turns 80 on Oct. 27, told NAN on Monday that the high profile investigation was marred by interferences from "high places". The DIG explained that even when he had narrowed in on the principal suspect, who could have thrown more light on the riddle, the suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria.

"They said somebody brought a parcel and his son Billy received the parcel and took it to his father (Dele Giwa), who was having his breakfast that morning. "On the breakfast table was a man called Kayode Soyinka, he was there; Dele was there and then the son Billy handed over the parcel. "And as he did so, I heard Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

"It was while he was there that the parcel detonated. Dele was injured and eventually died. The metal partition separating the dining room and the kitchen was destroyed. "Beyond that, everything in the kitchen was destroyed. If metal could be mangled this way by the bomb, what of human flesh, what happened to Soyinka? Nobody could give me an answer.

"My conclusion was that Soyinka knew what was coming and he left the room to hide behind the wall. "I took note of all these, went back to conduct an identification parade. We had an identification parade and got people of different physical attributes to be identified by the day watch. "Eventually, when one of those paraded was said to bear a resemblance to the person that delivered the bomb, in spite of my insistence to have the man quizzed, we could not.

"Because interference now came from high places to protect the man. "The man was said to be related to the wife of a governor at that time and as a result of his connection we came to a dead end on that lead," the former police chief, who was in charge of the research department of the police CID, when Giwa was killed, said.

Dele Giwa Assassination - Investigation Was Marred By Interferences From 'high Places' - Ex-DIG

Omeben told NAN that the setback did not in any way deter him from using the evidence he had to follow the lead on Soyinka, and that he called on the Newswatch authorities to produce Soyinka. "I have enough evidence to quiz Soyinka now. Please, Ray Ekpu can I have Soyinka now?

"They resisted up till today. Up till today Soyinka never appeared before the police. "They started to insinuate that the assassination was masterminded by Babangida, Akilu etc. "They said that Akilu ought to have been investigated. "As a matter of fact, I had interrogated Akilu and he told me that yes they had invited Dele Giwa some few days before the assassination over a negative statement he made about Nigeria in a New York newspaper.

"He said that they had to invite him to tell him that he was wrong for portraying the country in bad light in the international press. "Akilu insisted that the invitation was not enough to accuse the government of complicity in the assassination of Dele Giwa.

"He satisfied me with his explanation. "Togun also absolved himself with his own explanation. "The parcel bomb was said to have the Federal Government logo on it, which to me was not enough evidence. "It was more of a circumstantial evidence. I can prove it!

"Go to any printing press if you are a "good" criminal and you are planning well, they can print it for you and place it on the parcel, and it will look as if it came from the government. "But for me to satisfy myself, I said please gentlemen, can I have Soyinka?

"Nobody! Soyinka ran away to London that was my principal suspect! "He did not appear until eventually I left the CID. I was retired from the police in 1989 and what happened after that I don't know," Omeben, now an Archbishop of the Jesus Families Ministries at Iyana Ipaja, near Lagos added. He said that Giwa was also careless in maintaining a relationship with his estranged wife.

Load-Date: October 27, 2015

---

End of Document

Ihedioha Breaks Silence, Says God Will Render Ultimate Judgment

This Day (Lagos)

March 09, 2020

Copyright 2020 This Day Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 772 words

Byline: Ejiofor Alike

Body

---

The immediate past Governor of Imo State, Hon. Emeka Ihedioha, has broken his silence on the refusal of the Supreme Court to reverse his removal as the governor of the state, insisting that whatever might be the personal injury he suffered as a result of the miscarriage of justice, his main concern has always been the implications of the judgment on the future of Nigeria's democracy and the right of the electorate to have their votes count.

In his message to the people of the state yesterday, Ihedioha told those who are rejoicing about what he called their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people that: "We believe that God will render the ultimate judgment."

He also took solace in the words of the late Dele Giwa that: "No evil deed will go unpunished; any evil done by man to man will be redressed; if not now then certainly later; if not by man, then by God for the victory of evil over good is temporary.'

Ihedioha argued that if the institutions that are critical to the entrenchment of the rule of law could thwart the wishes of the people in a cynical manner, the future of democracy is uncertain.

He noted that the well-articulated dissenting judgment delivered by Justice Centus Nweze, had vindicated his stand, adding that history and posterity would be kind to the Supreme Court justice.

"To those who are rejoicing about their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people, as well as their collaborators, let me leave them with the immortal words of the late journalist, Dele Giwa: "No evil deed will go unpunished; any evil done by man to man will be redressed; if not now then certainly later; if not by man, then by God for the victory of evil over good is temporary.' We believe that God will render the ultimate judgment. He has been with us through this peaceful struggle. And our future is in His hands," he said.

He said the ruling by the Supreme Court rejecting the application to set aside its earlier judgment of January 14, 2020, was not the outcome his team worked so hard for and informed the people of the state that he knew how disappointed they felt.

"While it is disheartening to note that your desire to introduce good governance has been halted, at least for now, it is also gratifying that our modest efforts have not gone unnoticed. I, therefore, feel a sense of pride and gratitude for the wonderful energy and commitment that we deployed together to secure the mandate that has now been brazenly stolen from us," he added.

Ihedioha Breaks Silence, Says God Will Render Ultimate Judgment

He thanked all those who played one role or another in this historic quest for justice and truth.

Ihedioha also thanked members of the diplomatic community for voicing their concerns for the stability of the country.

Ihedioha commended the chairman and members of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) for their vanguard role and leadership during this period.

He also thanked all Imo citizens for their uncommon support, solidarity, and collective outrage, saying never have a people been so united and committed to a cause.

"You prayed, fasted, marched, protested and even cried. You sacrificed your time, resources, and endeavour for this just cause. On this matter, the people of Imo State collectively rose to demand justice and fairness. Imo people rose up in defence of their right to elect leaders of their choice. Our people resoundingly rejected oppression and power grab, defied imposition, injustice, and tyranny. I salute Imo people for this display of courage in the face of oppressive state power," he added.

He also added that he would forever be indebted to Nigerians of all walks of life, across ethnic, religious and political divides, senior citizens, journalists, civil societies, ordinary men and women of good conscience, who added their voices to condemn the injustice done in his case.

"These are people unknown to me personally but who could not bear the illogic of turning number four to number one on the basis of a fraudulently procured result, and appealed to the Supreme Court to save itself and our judiciary," he said.

He lauded the contributions of the members of his legal team, who pushed the frontiers of electoral jurisprudence to advance the country's constitutional democracy.

Ihedioha also thanked his team of committed colleagues, who served in various capacities in his administration.

"It has been a great privilege to serve the people of Imo State as governor. I am proud to have been the recipient of their genuine mandate. I will forever cherish the support, solidarity, and cooperation given to me during my tenure. My belief in the ultimate triumph and supremacy of the will of the people remains intact," he added.

Load-Date: April 25, 2020

---

End of Document

Did Investigative Journalism Die With Dele Giwa? [analysis]

This Day (Lagos)

October 30, 2011 Sunday

Copyright 2011 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1182 words

Body

---

As the Lagos State Chapter of the Nigerian Institute of Journalism (NUJ), marked the 25th anniversary of the death of Dele Giwa, one of the finest investigative journalists this country has ever known, fresh challenges have been thrown at his colleagues on whether the late Giwa died with the art form of investigative journalism. Raheem Akingbolu reports

Since the death of the pioneer Editor-in-Chief and co-founder of Newswatch magazine, Mr. Dele Giwa, his remembrance has always been celebrated with sobriety. But at this year anniversary lecture organised in his honour in Lagos, the tone changed from sobriety to courage.

One after the other, speakers took turn to confront upcoming journalists on the dying spirit of investigative journalism, even after the Freedom of Information (Fol) Bill has been assented to.

Rather than continue mourning Giwa's unexpected passage, journalists were urged to brace up to the challenge and use their profession to fight corruption and arbitrary rule. The theme of the lecture 'Hazards of Journalism Profession and Challenges of FOI Law', focused on galvanising journalists to hone their skills and unearth stories that will engender an open and transparent society.

In his address, human rights lawyer, Mr. Femi Falana, who chaired the occasion, expressed concern over the lax attitude of today's journalists. According to him, journalists have relaxed and think of human right abuse only when they are harassed or any one of them is killed unjustly.

The lawyer, who said the gathering, was in celebration of what the late journalist stood, for called on the media not to relax and pretend as if all is well in the land. He condemned the recent arrest of some editors of The Nation newspaper and called on the Jonathan-led administration not to allow Nigerians to begin to feel that they are backed in the dark days of the military.

On Giwa's death, he advised journalists to ensure that government reopens the case, saying: "It is not too late to find his killers."

Constitutional lawyer, Mr. Fred Agbaje, like other speakers at the event, said that all is not well with the Fol law. For the law to work, the lawyer suggested the need for a special court to address issues regarding the law. By doing so, he argued that the rights of members of the public and especially journalists would be protected.

Did Investigative Journalism Die With Dele Giwa? [analysis]

"It seems investigative journalism has died with Dele Giwa and I think the success of our democracy would be jeopardised if journalists are not allowed to carry out their job efficiently," he said.

The guest speaker at the event was the president of the Nigerian Guild of Editors, Mr. Gbenga Adefaye. In his lecture, the Vanguard newspaper managing director, who eulogised Giwa for his outstanding practice, quality reportage and flamboyant dress sense, said it was a national embarrassment that the question of who killed Dele Giwa was still a misery 25 years after.

On the FoI Act, Adefaye said it was surprising that despite the clamour that heralded its passage, most journalists do not know its content and usefulness. He stated that the law would be of great advantage to Nigerians if the capacity to use it is well spelt out.

The late journalist's friend and colleague at Newswatch, Mr. Dan Agbese shocked the gathering, when he said, "25 years after he died, our dreams have died more or less." The outburst called for sober reflections and was interpreted to mean series of things that have happened since Giwa's death, especially the recklessness of Nigerian leaders, which has brought international embarrassment, and what had become the fate of the celebrated magazine Newswatch, which Giwa labored for.

Speaking further, Agbese, called on journalists not to mourn Giwa on his achievement in the field of journalism but rather mourn him if reporters of today cannot sustain his legacies. He also suggested that October 19, should be set aside for the remembrance of journalists, who lost their lives in the course of duty.

Like Falana, NUJ's national president Mohammed Garba urged security agencies to stand up to their responsibilities. He lamented that the high level of insecurity in Nigeria is worrisome, adding that the way the police discharges their duty is not encouraging. To this end, he said there was a need for them to be more proactive in address security concerns, instead of embarrassing those who are carrying out their lawful duties.

Reacting to the recent arrest of journalists at The Nation, he said: "We are not arguing whether the letter in question was forged or not, our primary concern is the way and manner the arrests were made."

Deputy managing director, The Sun, Mr. Femi Adesina called for an amendment to the FoI law, arguing that it does not protect the rights of journalists and is too protective of public office holders. According to Adesina, the law is too protective of public officers with little regard for journalists. He also made a case for a special court on the law.

Lagos NUJ chairman Mr. Deji Elumoye, had earlier lamented the government's inability to bring Giwa's killers to book. Urging journalists not to be intimidated, Elumoye said: "While we accept the reality of the hazards of our profession, we are bold to say that one of the hallmarks of a civilised society is its commitment to the ideals of truth, justice and fair-play, which offer the basis for prosecution and sentencing of criminals in our midst."

Concluding, Elumoye called the Nigerian Police Force to reopen investigations into the murder of Dele Giwa, with a view to bringing his murderers to book, adding, "We will not relent on this call until justice is seen to have been done."

CSRââÂ ª ,Training for Journalists

To accommodate more participants, organisers of a media forum, aimed at strengthening human capacity for the African media industry on Corporate Social Responsibility and sustainability reporting, has extended the registration by one week, which now ends tomorrow, October 31.

The forum is being organized by ThistlePraxis Consulting, a CSR Strategy and Assessments firm.

According to the organisers, Forbes CSR Blogger and award-winning journalist, Aman Singh, would lead the team of facilitators for a development initiative aimed at building and strengthening human capacity development for journalists under the theme 'Effective CSR Reporting for Media Professionals'.

Did Investigative Journalism Die With Dele Giwa? [analysis]

Other facilitators include Ken Egbas, managing partner, TruContact PR (organisers of SERAs/Nigeria CSR Awards), Ini Onuk, lead consultant/CEO, ThistlePraxis Consulting, Nigeria (organisers of the training), and Mumo Kivuitu, executive director, Ufhadili Trust in Kenya.

The organisers stated that the purpose of the training is aimed at providing background information for accurate and effective media reporting of CSR activities, policies and strategies for businesses as well as the challenges of operating on the African continent.

The initiative would also guide journalists on CSR reporting and other business issues through robust training and practical case studies with experience drawn from local and international organisations in Africa.

Load-Date: October 31, 2011

---

End of Document

Ex-DIG - Dele Giwa's Assassination Was Marred By Interference From 'High Places'

This Day (Lagos)

October 27, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 690 words

Body

---

Twenty-nine years after the murder of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, a retired police chief, Chris Omeben, who conducted the investigation, has spoken out about the unresolved murder, calling it the most frustrating case of his career.

Giwa, the founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, was killed with a parcel bomb at his Ikeja, Lagos residence on October 19, 1986.

Omeben, a former Deputy Inspector-General of Police (DIG), who will turn 80 today, told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) yesterday that the high profile investigation was marred by interferences from "high places".

The DIG explained that even when he had narrowed in on the principal suspect, who could have thrown more light on the riddle, the suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria.

"They said somebody brought a parcel and his son Billy received the parcel and took it to his father (Dele Giwa), who was having his breakfast that morning.

"On the breakfast table was a man called Kayode Soyinka, he was there; Dele was there and then the son Billy handed over the parcel. "And as he did so, I heard Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

"It was while he was there that the parcel detonated. Dele was injured and eventually died. The metal partition separating the dining room and the kitchen was destroyed.

"Beyond that, everything in the kitchen was destroyed. If metal could be mangled this way by the bomb, what of human flesh, what happened to Soyinka? Nobody could give me an answer.

"My conclusion was that Soyinka knew what was coming and he left the room to hide behind the wall. "I took note of all these, went back to conduct an identification parade. We had an identification parade and got people of different physical attributes to be identified by the day watch.

"Eventually, when one of those paraded was said to bear a resemblance to the person that delivered the bomb, in spite of my insistence to have the man quizzed, we could not.

Ex-DIG - Dele Giwa's Assassination Was Marred By Interference From 'High Places'

"Because interference now came from high places to protect the man. "The man was said to be related to the wife of a governor at that time and as a result of his connection we came to a dead end on that lead," the former police chief, who was in charge of the research department of the police CID, when Giwa was killed, said. Omeben said the setback did not in any way deter him from using the evidence he had to follow the lead on Soyinka, and that he called on the Newswatch authorities to produce Soyinka.

"I have enough evidence to quiz Soyinka now. Please, Ray Ekpu can I have Soyinka now? "They resisted up till today. Up till today Soyinka never appeared before the police. "They started to insinuate that the assassination was masterminded by Babangida, Akilu etc. "They said that Akilu ought to have been investigated.

"As a matter of fact, I had interrogated Akilu and he told me that yes they had invited Dele Giwa some few days before the assassination over a negative statement he made about Nigeria in a New York newspaper. "He said that they had to invite him to tell him that he was wrong for portraying the country in bad light in the international press. "Akilu insisted that the invitation was not enough to accuse the government of complicity in the assassination of Dele Giwa. "He satisfied me with his explanation.

"Togun also absolved himself with his own explanation. "The parcel bomb was said to have the federal government logo on it, which to me was not enough evidence. "It was more of a circumstantial evidence. I can prove it! "Go to any printing press if you are a 'good' criminal and you are planning well, they can print it for you and place it on the parcel, and it will look as if it came from the government.

"But for me to satisfy myself, I said please gentlemen, can I have Soyinka? "Nobody! Soyinka ran away to London that was my principal suspect!

"He did not appear until eventually I left the CID. I was retired from the police in 1989 and what happened after that I don't know," Omeben, now an Archbishop of the Jesus Families Ministries at Iyana Ipaja, near Lagos, added. He said that Giwa was also careless in maintaining a relationship with his estranged wife.

Load-Date: October 27, 2015

---

End of Document

Ohanaeze, Afenifere, Uwazuruike mourn Tony Momoh

The Sun (Nigeria)

February 1, 2021 Monday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 395 words

Byline: David

Body

---

By Chukwudi Nweje, Lagos

Ohanaeze Ndigbo, Afenifere Renewal Group and former President of Aka Ikenga, Chief Goddy Uwazuruike have expressed shock at the death of former Minister of Information Prince Tony Momoh.

They described him as a great and accomplished Nigerian who died with his head held high.

The Publicity Secretary of Ohanaeze Ndigbo said it is sad that Momoh died at a time his brilliance was most needed.

'It is a sad and painful news Prince Tony Momoh is a great Nigerian and he will be greatly missed.'

Publicity Secretary of Afenifere Yinka Odumakin described Momoh as a patriotic Nigerian who spoke out in support of restructuring Nigeria to true federalism.

'It is painful, Prince Tony Momoh was a true and patriotic Nigerian who spoke out in support of restructuring Nigeria to true federalism. His death at this time is a great loss to everybody who believes in restructuring Nigeria to true federalism, he will be greatly missed,' he said.

Uwazuruike described the late Momoh as a patriotic Nigerian who gave the country his best and died with his head held high.

'Prince Tony Momoh lived a life that is unique. He was not born Anthony Momoh, he was born a Muslim, but he took up the name because of Lord Tony Anden of England. He went into journalism with his very important degree and later became General Manager of The Daily Times. He was a brilliant lawyer, any law student will remember the celebrated case of Tony Momoh vs President of the Senate. The then-president of the Senate summoned him to appear before them to answer questions on an article that was published in The Daily Times. rather than respond, he went to court fought them and won. He has made his name and his mark, he became a minister under Gen Ibrahim Babangida. One of the most remarkable moments of his being a minister was when Dele Giwa was killed in a parcel bomb. He rushed in and spoke like a journalist and a man of authority and said the death will be investigated. Unfortunately by the next day, he was reminded that he was a minister and he recanted and said there was nothing there, that I will regard as his lowest moment, otherwise he was a great man, he did his beat we can only say rest in peace, he had done his tour of duty and he died with his head held high,' he stated.

Ohanaeze, Afenifere, Uwazuruike mourn Tony Momoh

The post Ohanaeze, Afenifere, Uwazuruike mourn Tony Momoh appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: February 1, 2021

---

End of Document

My journalism journey

The Sun (Nigeria)

January 31, 2023 Tuesday

Copyright 2023 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1519 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Permit me, dear readers, to stray away from the current happenings such as the petrol palaver and the naira redesign nuisance, both of which have shown the world how badly we run our lives. The excuse for choosing to write on my journalism odyssey today is the recent conferment of a Lifetime Achievement Award on me by one of Nigeria's leading newspapers, Vanguard. This is my fifth lifetime achievement award, two of which came from non-media outfits while the other three, including this one, came from media organisations. A few years ago, I received one from the Nation newspaper in Kenya when it marked the 50th anniversary of its existence. A couple of years ago, I was also honoured with the award by Diamond Media, run by one of the respected journalists in the country, Mr. Lanre Idowu.

I deliberately chose journalism when I was in primary school, a period no pupil would sensibly appreciate the full implications of that choice. My father used to subscribe to a newspaper called the Nigerian Outlook, a paper published by the Government of Eastern Nigeria. I would return from school before he would return from a place called Utu Etim Ekpo, where he was a member of the Customary Court of Appeal, an intermediate court between the Customary Court and the Magistrate's Court. It was within the pages of this newspaper that I read speeches delivered by Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, Premier of Eastern Nigeria, and articles by M.C.K. Ajuluchukwu, a prominent journalist of that era. At that time, a primary school pupil could read and comprehend what he read in a newspaper. I wonder whether a primary school pupil in a public school can do so today.

When I got admission into a secondary school called Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene, I developed the habit of reporting major events, especially sporting activities. I would paste my report on the notice board for my fellow students to read. My byline was Pressman Remy. And when I was in Higher School at Holy Family College, Abak, I started a student's magazine which I called The Nightingale. It was sold to the students monthly and when it started making some impact in the college, the principal assigned one of the teachers from Ireland who taught us English to supervise my editorial work. After Higher School, I got admission into the University of Lagos, Institute of Mass Communication, in Akoka, Yaba, Lagos, to study Mass Communication. My father wanted me to study Law. I refused without knowing what it would be like to be lawyer. I chose journalism and I think journalism also chose me. As it is often said, the rest is history.

My journalism journey

I did my vacation job with the Cross River State Newspaper Corporation, which published the Nigerian Chronicle. It was there that I cut my journalism teeth under Mr. Moses Ekpo who is now the Deputy Governor of Akwa Ibom State. He was the one who taught me the basics of journalism practice. I owe him a debt of gratitude. The guidance he gave me made me to return to the Chronicle after graduation for a job. By this time, he had moved on to something else but I grew within three years to become, through a competitive examination conducted by Prince Tony Momoh, then editor of the Daily Times, the editor of the Nigerian Chronicle at age 29. At the Chronicle, I was a big fish in a small pond. After three years, the opportunity to be a small fish in a big pond came. What did I want, to be a king in hell or a servant in heaven? It wasn't an easy decision but I opted to take the job of the editor of the Sunday Times, the highest selling newspaper in Nigeria at the time. To take that job, I took a pay cut to work in the Daily Times group that had 13 publications, the biggest newspaper conglomerate in Africa. From the Sunday Times, I moved to the Business Times and from there to the Concord Group of Newspapers as the chairman of the editorial board. After Concord there was a pregnancy and Newswatch was born. Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed, Dan Agbese and I had conspired to establish a magazine that would gun for gold standard journalism. The rest, again, is history.

At the Vanguard award, the organisers had recalled that in my 49 years of journalism practice I had been detained six times by four governments that hated to hear the truth. But truth, as Dryden said, is the foundation of all knowledge and the cement of all societies. It is also the cornerstone of journalism practice. Every violation of truth, according to Emerson, is a stab at the heart of human society. During those six rounds of detention, I remained unfazed because, in my journalism life, thoroughness is an article of faith. I always sent a note to my wife, Uyai, urging her to hold her head high because I had done nothing for which she could be ashamed. A courageous, diligent woman, she had to be both the father and mother to our young children, doing a rectangular journey from home to school, to work, to prison and to school again to pick the kids from school. Her show of dedication to me and the family on those difficult occasions was priceless, invaluable and inestimable. Her multi-tasking skills were on full parade. I owe her a debt of gratitude.

During these rounds, one man also played a prominent part, especially when I was being tried at St. Anna's Court in Lagos. Segun Osoba, who was president of the Newspaper Proprietors' Association of Nigeria (NPAN), mobilised thousands of journalists through the streets of Lagos into the court premises. As I arrived in a horrible, rickety, windowless Black Maria and saw the sea of heads Osoba had assembled in my support, my heart leapt for joy. I cried, the cry of joy in a situation of joylessness. And when someone mounted road blocks on our way as we were about to start Newswatch Osoba, courageous warrior, moved against those roadblocks. I owe him a debt of gratitude.

Osoba and Sam Amuka, publisher of Vanguard, are like Damon and Pythias, a celebrated pair of friends. The two of them seem joined at the hip. They seem to have been cut from the same cloth. Even though they are both in their 80s, they will not stand and stare while their profession is being throttled by power-mongers. In every important journalism activity, they are there giving statesmanly leadership and guidance. A few weeks ago, when the media community was trying to review its Code of Ethics in line with global standards, these two elders were present and pleasantly sherpherding us to the goal. I wonder how many eighty-something-year-olds are still active in their professions. Pretty few. The media community is lucky to have them. So, the media community must show at every turn their gratitude to these two elders of their profession for standing by them every inch of the way, through sun and rain.

When I was secretary-general of the NPAN during Abacha's regime, the media had a difficult situation to deal with: how to handle the Mass Media Commission, which was intended to kill the media dead. Amuka said to me, "Ray, you are the engine room of the NPAN, you must prepare a communiqué for all our meetings at home and bring. We will just cross the T's and dot the I's so that we do not spend a long time here. If we spend a long time arguing and debating every issue, Abacha might send his boys to pick up all of us here and the media will be dead."

My journalism journey

His advice was an invaluable template, which I adopted in those dangerous days. I owe him a debt of gratitude.

Even though I had been tried for murder and mutiny, two allegations that carry the death penalty, for writing what the men of power didn't want to read, I have also been honoured as International Editor of the Year 1987, one of the Outstanding Young Persons of the World 1988 as well as being elected president of the NPAN and international president of the Commonwealth Journalists' Association. The Akwa Ibom Polytechnic has named its Department of Mass Communication after me, while the former vice-chairman of ExxonMobil, Mr. Udom Inoyo, has established the Ray Ekpu Award for Investigative Journalism. I could not have bought these pieces of recognition with money. I am truly grateful to everyone who has in one way or another contributed to the recognition of this old man from a little known village in Akwa Ibom State. But a greater chunk of the appreciation ought to go to God who put these destiny helpers on my path and made them to be my helpmate. Achievements in journalism in Africa are not low-hanging fruits because of the low appreciation of the journalist's work in our beleaguered continent. Today, journalists are still badly treated in various parts of Africa, including Nigeria. Obnoxious legislation is still being pursued with vigour. Photographers' cameras are collected and smashed by security men. Journalists are locked up for the most frivolous of reasons. Several Nigerian journalists, including my friend, Dele Giwa, have been killed. Several others are missing. For surviving in my practice for 49 years, I am grateful to my maker. John D. Rockefeller used to say, when asked how he made his money, "God gave me my money." I can say without any equivocation that God gave me my journalism.

Load-Date: January 31, 2023

---

End of Document

Buhari, Solve Dele Giwa's Murder!

Weekly Trust

October 31, 2015 Saturday

Copyright 2015 Media Trust Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1071 words

Byline: SonalaOlumhense

Body

---

Several fascinating things happened in Nigeria's 2015 presidential election. For me, among the most significant was the support offered to the eventual winner, Muhammadu Buhari by two journalists he sent to jail as military head of state.

Nduka Irabor and Tunde Thompson, by the selflessness and eloquence of their action, contributed to the historic victory of Nigeria's current leader.

There is now a golden opportunity for Buhari, who claims to be a reformed democrat, to pay back the industry he once combated: he should re-open the Dele Giwa investigation, and identify the killers of a fine journalist in his prime.

There is no better time. Mr. Giwa was killed 29 years ago, in October 1986. Later that month, another Nigerian, one Chris Omeben, turned 50. He was a Deputy Inspector-General of Police.

For some reason, Mr. Omeben, now retired and in the twilight of his life, recently told the media of Nigeria how he had been unable to find a suspect in Giwa's murder.

Actually, that is not completely correct: he had had two men in mind. The first was a suspect arrived at in a roundabout kind of investigation. We had an identification parade and got people of different physical attributes to be identified by [Mr. Giwa's] day watch, Mr. Omeben said.

Eventually, when one of those paraded was said to bear a resemblance to the person that delivered the bomb, in spite of my insistence to have the man quizzed, we could not.

Why? Because interference now came from high places to protect the man, the DIG revealed.

Note: Mr. Omeben knew the suspect who had delivered the bomb. He didn't interrogate him because powerful forces-high places-dissuaded him.

The problem is that Mr. Omeben did not dwell on those powerful forces that were shielding his prime suspect. He needed a fall guy.

Kayode Soyinka.

Buhari, Solve Dele Giwa's Murder!

Mr. Soyinka was the London correspondent of Newswatch, Giwa's journal. Also of Nigerian nationality, he did not lack reasons to be in Nigeria quite often, and on the day of the murder, he happened to have been staying with his Editor-in-Chief.

They were sharing the delights of Funmi Giwa's breakfast fare when the parcel bomb arrived.

On the breakfast table was a man called Kayode Soyinka, he was there; Dele was there and then the son Billy handed over the parcel, our Sherlock Holmes said.

And as he did so, I heard Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

Heard.

You heard Sherlock right: Heard.

Sherlock's entire case against Soyinka is somehow built around that word: Heard, as in hearsay. Soyinka mercifully outlived the big blast, but according to Sherlock, who claims to have been unable to interview the journalist, Soyinka is guilty of something because of the very fact that he lived.

Remember: Sherlock heard that Soyinka had survived because he slipped into an adjacent room. But from whom had he heard? Not the man who was slain; and certainly not the person whom he did not interrogate, and those were the only persons in the room.

Sherlock, in the manner of Louis XIV, who thought he was the French State, seemed to believe he was the Nigeria Police Force. Soyinka has always said, and he has evidence, that he was interviewed twice by the police, including at the First Foundation Hospital on the day of the murder.

But Sherlock discounts those interviews apparently because-being the police force-he didn't get the personal chance to convert his prime suspect to murderer.

And so: from I heard, Sherlock declared: My conclusion was that Soyinka knew what was coming and he left the room to hide behind the wall.

Hopefully, this is not the way that real crime investigation is still being undertaken in the Nigeria Police, as that would explain why murders are rarely solved within Nigeria.

Until Giwa's murder, the only Nigerians who had reason to know anything about explosives were the military and security agencies. How would Soyinka have known what wall to hide behind, and at what moment?

Mr. Omeben, 80 last month, casually dismisses the failure of the police to explore obvious military suspects. The problem was, and is, that the police have always had some kind of a priori procedural understanding that military personnel are never suspects.

As a result, in the Giwa murder the police found convenient excuses to avoid public interest in anyone hiding in a military uniform, a point Sherlock glosses over. To examine the tone of Mr. Omeben's tale is to come to the sad conclusion that had he laid hands on Soyinka, he would have pinned a murder charge on him.

Because interference now came from high places to protect the man Who was the man who was being shielded? And why was the police afraid of high places in the pursuit of the cause of law?

Who constituted high places, if that was indeed true, but General Ibrahim Babangida and his inner circle at that time? Let it be remembered that Babangida has since 1986 been popularly believed to be behind Giwa's murder.

Sherlock had that one covered: They started to insinuate that the assassination was masterminded by Babangida, Akilu etcAs a matter of fact, I had interrogated Akilu and he told me that yes they had invited Dele Giwa some few days before the assassination over a negative statement he made about Nigeria in a New York newspaperHe satisfied me with his explanationTogun also absolved himself with his own explanation

Buhari, Solve Dele Giwa's Murder!

It is shameful to think that these half-baked conjectures comprised, or was considered to be policing, and were officially sufficient in explaining Giwa's murder. In real time, it is basically an investigation that-Lagos traffic and all and in an era pre-dating cell phones-any self-respecting journalist would have completed in one day. His editor would still have had him all over town through the night, digging for authentic information.

DIG Omeben's 30-year old report-or lamentation-is a national embarrassment. It explains why there is so much impunity in Nigeria, and confirms that the police are sadly the principal impediment to the maintenance of law and order.

This is where President Buhari comes in. With one presidential order, he can resolve this 30-year old murder case, and set the police on its way to being a true and independent crime-fighting institution.

By ensuring that the Dele Giwa murder is finally and competently investigated and bringing to justice those responsible for it, he can confirm his commitment to the rule of law and to a free press, and bury forever the pesky ghost of Decree 4.

Load-Date: November 6, 2015

---

End of Document

'How Dele Giwa's Murder Led to Mother's Slow Death'

This Day (Lagos)

January 09, 2013

Copyright 2013 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 566 words

Byline: Chiemelie Ezeobi

Body

---

Mrs. Elekiya Ayisat Giwa, the 87-year-old mother of the late Dele Giwa, Tuesday gave up the ghost at a private hospital (Aruna Ogun) at the Ikorodu area of Lagos State after a brief illness.

Dele Giwa, a veteran journalist and the editor and founder of Newswatch Magazine, was killed on October 19, 1986, by a letter bomb, the first of its kind in Nigeria.

After depositing the corpse at the Ikorodu General Hospital, the family picked February 9, as the tentative date for the deceased's burial at their home town, Ugekpe Ekperri, in Auchi, Edo State.

"Mama's death was the build-up of the crisis she suffered when Dele Giwa was brutally murdered. She was always a healthy woman until Dele's death.

"His death broke her up. It was then she became hypertensive," Mama's last born, Mrs. Abibat Ronke Giwa-Aboaba said to THISDAY.

According to her, more than his brutal and senseless death, the fact that more than 25 years after, his killers were yet to be found and brought to book did more harm to mama's spirit.

Giwa's assassination occurred two days after he had been interviewed by State Security Service officials during the regime of the former president, Ibrahim Babangida.

She added, "It was a very sad incident and the experience was most traumatic for her. She always cried bitterly each time she remembered him.

"It was until few months ago when she started letting go but by then the damage had be done. Months before she died, she made her peace with his death and said she had forgiven those that wrongful killed him in his prime."

Narrating the chain of events that led to the death of the mother, Giwa-Aboaba, whose house mama stayed till her death, said the deceased had suffered a stroke on December 22, last year and was expected to recover after treatment.

She said, "Mama had a stroke on December 22 and I initially took her to the General Hospital in Ikorodu where she stayed for a week.

'How Dele Giwa's Murder Led to Mother's Slow Death'

"But when I discovered that their services were not okay for me, I moved her to a private hospital and she was there for one week too before she died this morning (yesterday)."

She described the deceased as a wonderful woman, very gentle, tolerant and always concerned about her children.

On the actions carried out by the family with Giwa's death, she said they tried to bring the killers to book but gave up later after deciding to leave them to God's judgment.

She however said the Late Gani Fawehinmi had truly championed for the cause, a fact that led to his death. "Gani was one of the major persons that spearheaded the fight to fish out those that caused my brother's death.

"He was even imprisoned for this sake and it later led to his death because he became ill as a result of the continuous imprisonment. Before he died, he gave his family instructions to hold a rally at Edo State in his honour.

With the octogenarian's death, the family moved her corpse to the General Hospital morgue in Ikorodu. They however complained bitterly about the state of the morgue.

Giwa-Aboaba said they had wanted a private morgue but since that wasn't readily available; they had no choice but to deposit the body at the General Hospital.

She however quickly added that they have put plans on ground to have her moved to the morgue of a military hospital in Lagos today. "No, mama wouldn't have wanted her body to be kept at the general hospital, especially in its present state," she muttered almost to herself.

Load-Date: January 9, 2013

---

End of Document

Chuks Iloegbunam: Restless But Peaceful Soul

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

May 23, 2021 Sunday

Copyright 2021 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1165 words

Byline: Tony Eluemunor

Body

---

Tony Eluemunor

When I think about my big brother, Mazi Chuks Iloegbunam, what readily comes to mind is the timeless Abba song, "MOVE ON". Its opening lyrics truly capture the essential Chuks Iloegbunam. Here we go: "They say a restless body can hide a peaceful soul. A voyager and a settler, they both have a distant goal. If I explore the heavens, or if I search inside. Well, it really doesn't matter as long as I can tell myself I've always tried".

The Iloegbunam many know could be that one that never, never, repeat never, suffers fools gladly. As we all know, if you do not suffer fools gladly, you are not patient with people who you think are stupid.

Discuss this saying with Chuks and he might tell you how and when the term emerged. I checked and saw this: it was first coined by Saint Paul in his second letter to the Church at Corinth. The full verse of the original source of the idiom, 2 Corinthians 11:19, reads: "For ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise."

Chuks will take on any who is foolish enough to jostle with him in an argument, and he will teach that person unforgettable lessons in literacy and penmanship. His writing could be caustic, even as he uses the most apt of words but still strange to someone who is widely read, yet you would find most fitting when you consult a dictionary. There is a word for such; accuracy, precision, exactitude.

How would I know, you may ask. My answer is simply this: he taught me ... he was my first teacher in the newsroom. But my story jumps. Perhaps I should begin at the beginning.

One evening, Mr. Jika Attoh, who was my classmate at the University of Lagos, Akoka, Yaba, Mass Communication Post-Graduate class, took me to the Guardian to see Chuks. And we ended up spending the night in Chuk's house at Shomolu, Lagos. He treated me not just as a friend of a friend, but like a brother. I can still remember him, with all seriousness, and fire blazing from his eyes, and with impatience in his voice, asking me: "What is wrong with you, Tony, or whatever is your name? Don't you talk? Why can't you feel at home? Why can't you relax? Nobody owns this world; yes, you are my guest today, but tomorrow, I could be your guest. Feel free, my brother. Nobody needs any tension here". Yes, it is difficult to understand Chuks; he could erupt like a volcano and the next moment he is ice water.

Chuks Iloegbunam: Restless But Peaceful Soul

The next time I saw him, he had left the Guardian newspapers and had pitched his tent with the Newswatch magazine. He was anchoring a Newswatch cover. He was discussing one aspect of that story with Jika, who like him, graduated from the University of Ife, Ile- Ife (now Obafemi Awolowo University). The Newswatch story was on the 25th anniversary of Chinua Achebe's THINGS FALL APART. And Chuks, always one to do an all-things-considered story, was attempting to shed light on the Chinua Achebe – Wole Soyinka relationship or rivalry.

Well, so as not to attract his anger again by not feeling free in his presence, I mouthed a few things about Achebe's being an Africanist who saw the world through the African eyes, and Soyinka being a humanist and preppy activist ready to fight evil wherever it was found. I added that they were not really rivals as Achebe was a renowned novelist but Soyinka was a remarkable playwright and poet. If there was any rivalry, I blamed it on their students and admirers who failed to fully understand that they complemented each other to Nigeria's glory and pride, after all the sky is wide enough for the Eagle and the kite. So, their lines never really crossed as both stayed away from the field where the other had gained global renown. We spoke some more and later I saw my name in the Newswatch magazine, and half of a page of that magazine was devoted to my Achebe-Soyinka explanation.

One stiflingly disappointing day, I had spent hours at an Ikoyi, Lagos, office. I vowed that I would never come to that office again to seek for job. To cheer up my plummeting spirit I decided to visit Chuks at Newswatch, at least I would get to read the newspapers and magazines I couldn't afford to buy. The Newswatch Big Four (the late Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed were there throwing banters in the open newsroom. And Chuks, ever confident because he knows no fear, stopped the jaunty discussion to point at my inconsequential self, and introduce this student as his "good and trusty" friend, who "decorated your magazine when he explained the Achebe-Soyinka rivalry in".... and Dele Giwa, raised his right hand and used the index finger to strike his brain thrice and say animatedly, "Yes, I remember that discourse. Oh, are you Tony Eluemunor?"

Giwa continued: "Oh, I read you days ago in the Guardian on Sunday, and you featured in the Monthly Life which appeared today. I think you can write. See me on your way out". I did and Mr. Giwa pushed a letter towards me and asked me to sign: it was an appointment letter. I had become a journalist!

Some four years later, I was now at THISWEEK magazine, and Chuks came to see me. He thrust a form into my hand and urged me to apply for a journalism fellowship. I asked him why he wasn't applying. He said he had applied. So, I replied that it would be foolish of me to be competing with him. He laughed and said he had given copies of it to 20 others, adding if "God say na you go go, nothing can change it. You must stop being afraid. This life is not for any special person. Each person has his own break". I applied, and Harvard University issued a call to me; on Ford Foundation scholarship for the Fellowship of the Nieman Foundation for Journalism. Yet, before I left for Cambridge, Boston, Massachusetts, Chuks was already in the UK!

The same Mr. Chuks Iloegbunam has remained my Big Brother for decades. He gave me an insight into the profundity of Bob Marley's music; I had loved and adored Jimmy Cliff and almost hated Marley for dethroning my champion. He opened to me more vistas of appreciating the art of writing. He actually rewrote the intro (introduction) of my very first story at Newswatch, and Dele Olojede took it and celebrated it all around the newsroom, and everyone thought I was a star.

Over the years, I have studied Chuks Iloegbunam and learnt a lot from this man who turned 70 years old on Tuesday, May 18, 2021. But he has left one thing unexplained to me: how a person could adopt a total stranger as a brother and become his guardian angel. Did God send him on such a mission; just for me? I still don't know how he explained our relationship to his angelic wife; Obiageli (Madam to me); she calls me (always with a smile that could split the deepest darkness) "tounny tounny".

Thank you, Chuks Iloegbunam. Happy birthday, Big Brother. As Abba sang, "Like a roller in the ocean, life is motion. Move on. Like a wind that's always blowing, life is flowing. Move on. Like the sunrise in the morning, life is dawning. Move on. How I treasure every minute, being part of, being in it. With the urge to move on.

Load-Date: May 23, 2021

---

End of Document

My journalism journey

The Guardian

January 31, 2023 Tuesday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1529 words

Body

Permit me dear readers to stray away from the current happenings such as the petrol palaver and the naira redesign nuisance, both of which have shown the world how badly we run our lives. The excuse for choosing to write on my journalism odyssey today is the recent conferment of a Lifetime Achievement Award on me by one of Nigeria's leading newspapers, Vanguard.

This is my fifth lifetime achievement award, two of which came from non-media outfits while the other three including this one came from media organisations. A few years ago I received one from the Nation Newspaper in Kenya when it marked the 50th anniversary of its existence. A couple of years ago I was also honoured with the award by Diamond Media run by one of the respected journalists in the country, Mr Lanre Idowu.

I deliberately chose journalism when I was in primary school, a period no pupil would sensibly appreciate the full implications of that choice. My father used to subscribe to a newspaper called the Nigerian Outlook, a paper published by the Government of Eastern Nigeria. I would return from school before he would return from a place called Utu Etim Ekpo where he was a member of the Customary Court of Appeal, an intermediate court between the Customary Court and the Magistrate Court. It is within the pages of this newspaper that I read speeches delivered by Dr Nnamdi Azikiwe, Premier of Eastern Nigeria and articles by M.C.K. Ajuluchukwu, a prominent journalist of that era. At that time a primary school pupil could read and comprehend what he read in a newspaper. I wonder whether a primary school pupil in a public school can do so today.

When I got admission into a secondary school called Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene I developed the habit of reporting major events especially sporting activities. I would paste my report on the notice board for my fellow students to read. My byline was Pressman Remy. And when I was in Higher School at Holy Family College, Abak, I started a student's magazine, which I called The Nightingale. It was sold to the students monthly and when it started making some impact in the College the Principal assigned one of the teachers from Ireland who taught us English to supervise my editorial work. After Higher School I got admission into the University of Lagos, Institute of Mass Communication in Akoka, Yaba, Lagos to study Mass Communication. My father wanted me to study Law. I refused without knowing what it would be like to be a lawyer. I chose journalism and I think journalism also chose me. As it is often said, the rest is history.

My journalism journey

I did my vacation job with the Cross River State Newspaper Corporation, which published the Nigerian Chronicle. It was there that I cut my journalism teeth under Mr. Moses Ekpo who is now the Deputy Governor of Akwa Ibom State. He was the one who taught me the basics of journalism practice. I owe him a debt of gratitude. The guidance he gave me made me to return to the Chronicle after graduation for a job. By this time he had moved on to something else but I grew within three years to become, through a competitive examination conducted by Prince Tony Momoh, then Editor of the Daily Times, the Editor of the Nigerian Chronicle at age 29.

At the Chronicle I was a big fish in a small pond. After three years the opportunity to be a small fish in a big pond came. What did I want, to be a king in hell or a servant in heaven? It wasn't an easy decision but I opted to take the job of the Editor of the Sunday Times, the highest selling newspaper in Nigeria at the time. To take that job I took a pay cut to work in the Daily Times group that had 13 publications, the biggest newspaper conglomerate in Africa.

From the Sunday Times I moved to the Business Times and from there to the Concord Group of Newspapers as the Chairman of the Editorial Board. After Concord there was a pregnancy and Newswatch was born. Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed, Dan Agbese and I had conspired to establish a magazine that would gun for gold standard journalism. The rest, again, is history.

At the Vanguard award the organisers had recalled that in my 49 years of journalism practice I had been detained six times by four governments that hated to hear the truth. But truth as Dryden said is the foundation of all knowledge and the cement of all societies. It is also the cornerstone of journalism practice. Every violation of truth, according to Emerson, is a stab at the heart of human society. During those six rounds of detention I remained unfazed because in my journalism life thoroughness is an article of faith.

I always sent a note to my wife, Uyai, urging her to hold her head high because I had done nothing for which she could be ashamed. A courageous, diligent woman, she had to be both the father and mother to our young children, doing a rectangular journey from home to school, to work, to prison and to school again to pick the kids from school. Her show of dedication to me and the family on those difficult occasions was priceless, invaluable and inestimable. Her multi-tasking skills were on full parade. I owe her a debt of gratitude.

During these rounds one man also played a prominent part especially when I was being tried at St Anna's Court in Lagos. Segun Osoba who was President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria (NPAN), mobilised thousands of journalists through the streets of Lagos into the court premises. As I arrived in a horrible, rickety, windowless Black Maria and saw the sea of heads Osoba had assembled in my support my heart leapt for joy. I cried, the cry of joy in a situation of joylessness. And when someone mounted roadblocks on our way as we were about to start Newswatch Osoba, courageous warrior, moved against those roadblocks. I owe him a debt of gratitude.

Osoba and Sam Amuka Publisher of Vanguard are like Damon and Pythias, a celebrated pair of friends. The two of them seem joined at the hip. They seem to have been cut from the same cloth. Even though they are both in their 80s they will not stand and stare while their profession is being throttled by power mongers. In every important journalism activity they are there, giving statesmanlike leadership and guidance.

A few weeks ago when the media community was trying to review its Code of Ethics in line with global standards these two elders were present and pleasantly shepherding us to the goal. I wonder how many eighty something year olds are still active in their professions. Pretty few. The media community is lucky to have them. So the media community must show at every turn their gratitude to these two elders of their profession for standing by them every inch of the way, through sun and rain.

When I was Secretary General of the NPAN during Abacha's regime the media had a difficult situation to deal with: how to handle the Mass Media Commission which was intended to kill the media. Amuka said to me "Ray, you are the engine room of the NPAN, you must prepare a communiqué for all our meetings at home and bring. We will just cross the T's and dot the I's so that we do not spend a long time here. If we spend a long time arguing and debating every issue Abacha might send his boys to pick up all of us here and the media will be dead." His advice was an invaluable template, which I adopted in those dangerous days. I owe him a debt of gratitude.

My journalism journey

Even though I had been tried for murder and mutiny, two allegations that carry the death penalty, for writing what the men of power don't want to read, I have also been honoured as International Editor of the year 1987, one of the Outstanding Young Persons of the World 1988 as well as being elected President of the NPAN and International President of the Commonwealth Journalists Association (CJA).

The Akwa Ibom Polytechnic has named its Department of Mass Communication after me while the former Vice Chairman of ExxonMobil, Mr Udom Inoyo, has established the Ray Ekpu Award for Investigative Journalism. I could not have bought these pieces of recognition with money. I am truly grateful to everyone who has in one way or another contributed to the recognition of this old man from a little known village in Akwa Ibom State. But a greater chunk of the appreciation ought to go to God who put these destiny helpers on my path and made them to be my helpmate.

Achievements in journalism in Africa are not low hanging fruits because of the low appreciation of the journalists work in our beleaguered continent. Today, journalists are still badly treated in various parts of Africa including Nigeria. Obnoxious legislation is still being pursued with vigour. Photographers' cameras are collected and smashed by security men. Journalists are locked up for the most frivolous of reasons. Several Nigerian journalists including my friend Dele Giwa have been killed. Several others are missing.

For surviving in my practice for 49 years I am grateful to my maker. John D. Rockefeller used to say when asked how he made his money, "God gave me my money." I can say without any equivocation that God gave me my journalism.

In this article journalism

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 22, 2023

---

End of Document

'Insurgency started with Dele Giwa's bombing'

The Nation (Nigeria)

November 21, 2014 Friday

Copyright 2014 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 534 words

Body

---

The Chairman, National Human Rights Commission (NHRC), Prof. Chidi Anselem Odinka, has said the violence carried out by Boko Haram started in 1986 when top journalist, Dele Giwa, was killed with a parcel bomb.

He spoke in Kaduna yesterday when giving a keynote address at the inauguration of Moluma Yakubu Loma Centre for Medical Law, and the MIVE Legals Matrimonial Centre, Kaduna.

Odinka lamented what he regarded as democratisation of violence since the return to civil rule in 1999.

The Professor of Law accused former Borno State Governor Senator Ali Modu Sheriff of impoverishing the state by under-educating the citizens, among other things.

He said: "Contrary to what people think, the phenomenon, which has now become Boko Haram, actually started at an Ikeja street on October 18, 1986. That day, the first Improvised Explosive Device (IED) was used to blow up Dele Giwa. Everyone knew that it was a state-sponsored murder. "That was the first time that an IED went off on Nigeria soil. Series of events would later lead to Boko Haram today. At that time, the late Gani Fawehinmi had the courage to challenge the state on that murder. But he was persecuted until his death.

"The police officer, who investigated the murder, was also killed in un-explained circumstances in Mokwa, Niger State. He was the younger brother of the celebrated writer and critic of government, Tunji Dare.

"When a state sponsored the murder of its citizens, it lost its legitimacy as a government. So, today's terrorism started as a state sponsored. In its 2013 report, the Kabiru Turaki Report laid out starkly footprints of the extent to which the claim of the Nigerian state to a monopoly of violence was challenged.

"The democratised violence is the symptom, which now defines most Nigeria's underlying ailment. Many things can kill you in Nigeria, to the extent that our life expectancy is now 47 for male and 51 for female and is still dropping. This is compared to 61 in Rwanda, which had a life expectancy of 41 before the genocide, which claimed 10 per cent of its population in 1994. Life expectancy there is still rising.

"Of about 320,000 policemen we have in Nigeria, about 100,000 are acting as personal guards to VIPs. The rest of 160 million will have to do with about 200,000 policemen. Our 60,000 soldiers are deployed to perform police duties in 32 states, stretching them thin to the extent that we are attacked by external forces.

'Insurgency started with Dele Giwa's bombing'

"Politicians must be blamed for today's violence. They buy arms for thugs and force their way to power, just to find out that they can not retrieve these arms.

"Some deliberately impoverished their people to keep them ignorant. For example, in Borno State, on or about December 14, 2006, the then Governor of the state, Ali Modu Sherif, in a response to widespread criticism of his record or lack of it as a governor, said: 'A lot of falsehood has been published over the years in newspapers about my government. I have never lost sleep over them because less than five per cent of Borno people can read what is written in newspapers.'"

The professor hailed the initiative of the founder of the two centres, Gloria Ballasom, saying they were the first of their kinds in the country.

Load-Date: November 20, 2014

---

End of Document

My Journalism Journey

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

February 1, 2023 Wednesday

Copyright 2023 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1509 words

Byline: Ray Ekpu

Body

---

Permit me dear readers to stray away from the current happenings such as the petrol palaver and the naira redesign nuisance, both of which have shown the world how badly we run our lives. The excuse for choosing to write on my journalism odyssey today is the recent conferment of a Lifetime Achievement Award on me by one of Nigeria's leading newspapers, Vanguard. This is my fifth lifetime achievement award, two of which came from non-media outfits while the other three including this one came from media organisations. A few years ago I received one from the Nation newspaper in Kenya when it marked the 50th anniversary of its existence. A couple of years ago I was also honoured with the award by Diamond Media run by one of the respected journalists in the country, Mr Lanre Idowu.

I deliberately chose journalism when I was in primary school, a period no pupil would sensibly appreciate the full implications of that choice. My father used to subscribe to a newspaper called the Nigerian Outlook, a paper published by the Government of Eastern Nigeria. I would return from school before he would return from a place called Utu Etim Ekpo where he was a member of the Customary Court of Appeal, an intermediate court between the Customary Court and the Magistrate Court. It is within the pages of this newspaper that I read speeches delivered by Dr Nnamdi Azikiwe, Premier of Eastern Nigeria and articles by M.C.K. Ajuluchukwu, a prominent journalist of that era. At that time a primary school pupil could read and comprehend what he read in a newspaper. I wonder whether a primary school pupil in a public school can do so today.

When I got admission into a secondary school called Ibibio State College, Ikot Ekpene I developed the habit of reporting major events especially sporting activities. I would paste my report on the notice board for my fellow students to read. My byline was Pressman Remy. And when I was in Higher School at Holy Family College, Abak, I started a student's magazine which I called The Nightingale. It was sold to the students monthly and when it started making some impact in the College the Principal assigned one of the teachers from Ireland who taught us English to supervise my editorial work. After Higher School I got admission into the University of Lagos, Institute of Mass Communication in Akoka, Yaba, Lagos to study Mass Communication. My father wanted me to study Law. I refused without knowing what it would be like to be lawyer. I chose journalism and I think journalism also chose me. As it is often said, the rest is history.

My Journalism Journey

I did my vacation job with the Cross River State Newspaper Corporation which published the Nigerian Chronicle. It was there that I cut my journalism teeth under Mr Moses Ekpo who is now the Deputy Governor of Akwa Ibom State. He was the one who taught me the basics of journalism practice. I owe him a debt of gratitude. The guidance he gave me made me to return to the Chronicle after graduation for a job. By this time he had moved on to something else but I grew within three years to become, through a competitive examination conducted by Prince Tony Momoh, then Editor of the Daily Times, the Editor of the Nigerian Chronicle at age 29. At the Chronicle I was a big fish in a small pond. After three years the opportunity to be a small fish in a big pond came. What did I want, to be a king in hell or a servant in heaven. It wasn't an easy decision but I opted to take the job of the Editor of the Sunday Times, the highest selling newspaper in Nigeria at the time. To take that job I took a pay cut to work in the Daily Times group that had 13 publications, the biggest newspaper conglomerate in Africa. From the Sunday Times I moved to the Business Times and from there to the Concord Group of Newspapers as the Chairman of the Editorial Board. After Concord there was a pregnancy and Newswatch was born. Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed, Dan Agbese and I had conspired to establish a magazine that would gun for gold standard journalism. The rest, again, is history.

At the Vanguard award the organisers had recalled that in my 49 years of journalism practice I had been detained six times by four governments that hated to hear the truth. But truth as Dryden said is the foundation of all knowledge and the cement of all societies. It is also the corner stone of journalism practice. Every violation of truth, according to Emerson, is a stab at the heart of human society. During those six rounds of detention I remained unfazed because in my journalism life thoroughness is an article of faith. I always sent a note to my wife, Uyai, urging her to hold her head high because I had done nothing for which she could be ashamed. A courageous, diligent woman, she had to be both the father and mother to our young children, doing a rectangular journey from home to school, to work, to prison and to school again to pick the kids from school. Her show of dedication to me and the family on those difficult occasions was priceless, invaluable and inestimable. Her multi-tasking skills were on full parade. I owe her a debt of gratitude.

During these rounds one man also played a prominent part especially when I was being tried at St Anna's Court in Lagos. Segun Osoba who was President of the Newspaper Proprietors Association of Nigeria (NPAN) mobilised thousands of journalists through the streets of Lagos into the court premises. As I arrived in a horrible, rickety, windowless Black Maria and saw the sea of heads Osoba had assembled in my support my heart leapt for joy. I cried, the cry of joy in a situation of joylessness. And when someone mounted road blocks on our way as we were about to start Newswatch Osoba, courageous warrior, moved against those roadblocks. I owe him a debt of gratitude.

Osoba and Sam Amuka Publisher of Vanguard are like Damon and Pythias, a celebrated pair of friends. The two of them seem joined at the hip. They seem to have been cut from the same cloth. Eventhough they are both in their 80s they will not stand and stare while their profession is being throttled by power mongers. In every important journalism activity they are there giving statesmanly leadership and guidance. A few weeks ago when the media community was trying to review its Code of Ethics in line with global standards these two elders were present and pleasantly sherpherding us to the goal. I wonder how many eighty something year olds are still active in their professions. Pretty few. The media community is lucky to have them. So the media community must show at every turn their gratitude to these two elders of their profession for standing by them every inch of the way, through sun and rain.

When I was Secretary General of the NPAN during Abacha's regime the media had a difficult situation to deal with: how to handle the Mass Media Commission which was intended to kill the media dead Amuka said to me "Ray, you are the engine room of the NPAN, you must prepare a communiqué for all our meetings at home and bring. We will just cross the T's and dot the I's so that we do not spend a long time here. If we spend a long time arguing and debating every issue Abacha might send his boys to pick up all of us here and the media will be dead." His advice was an invaluable template which I adopted in those dangerous days. I owe him a debt of gratitude.

My Journalism Journey

Even though I had been tried for murder and mutiny, two allegations that carry the death penalty, for writing what the men of power don't want to read, I have also been honoured as International Editor of the year 1987, one of the Outstanding Young Persons of the World 1988 as well as being elected President of the NPAN and International President of the Commonwealth Journalists Association (CJA). The Akwa Ibom Polytechnic has named its Department of Mass Communication after me while the former Vice Chairman of ExxonMobil, Mr Udom Inoyo has established the Ray Ekpu Award for Investigative Journalism. I could not have bought these pieces of recognition with money. I am truly grateful to everyone who has in one way or another contributed to the recognition of this old man from a little known village in Akwa Ibom State. But a greater chunk of the appreciation ought to go to God who put these destiny helpers on my path and made them to be my helpmate. Achievements in journalism in Africa are not low hanging fruits because of the low appreciation of the journalists work in our beleaguered continent. Today journalists are still badly treated in various parts of Africa including Nigeria. Obnoxious legislation is still being pursued with vigour. Photographers' cameras are collected and smashed by security men. Journalists are locked up for the most frivolous of reasons. Several Nigerian journalists including my friend Dele Giwa have been killed. Several others are missing. For surviving in my practice for 49 years I am grateful to my maker. John D. Rockefeller used to say when asked how he made his money, "God gave me my money." I can say without any equivocation that God gave me my journalism.

Load-Date: February 1, 2023

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's murder suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria , say ex-DIG who probed the murder

Dele Giwa's murder suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria, say ex-DIG who probed the murder

Nigerian Tribune

October 26, 2015 Monday

Copyright 2015 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 654 words

Body

---

Twenty-nine years after the murder of renowned journalist, Dele Giwa, a retired Deputy Inspector General of Police, Chris Omeben, who conducted the investigation, said the unresolved assassination was the most frustrating case he handled in his career.

Giwa, the founding Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch Magazine, was killed through a parcel bomb at his Ikeja, Lagos residence on October 19, 1986.

Omeben, who turns 80 on October 27, told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN), on Monday, that the high-profile investigation was marred by interferences from 'high places.'

The DIG explained that even when he had narrowed in on the principal suspect, who could have thrown more light on the riddle, the suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria.

"They said somebody brought a parcel and his son Billy received the parcel and took it to his father (Dele Giwa), who was having his breakfast that morning.

"On the breakfast table was a man called Kayode Soyinka, he was there Dele was there and then the son Billy handed over the parcel. And as he did so, I heard Soyinka left the table and went to the adjacent room.

"It was while he was there that the parcel detonated. Dele was injured and eventually died. The metal partition separating the dining room and the kitchen was destroyed.

"Beyond that, everything in the kitchen was destroyed. If metal could be mangled this way by the bomb, what of human flesh, what happened to Soyinka? Nobody could give me an answer.

"My conclusion was that Soyinka knew what was coming and he left the room to hide behind the wall.

"I took note of all these, went back to conduct an identification parade. We had an identification parade and got people of different physical attributes to be identified by the day watch.

"Eventually, when one of those paraded was said to bear a resemblance to the person that delivered the bomb, in spite of my insistence to have the man quizzed, we could not because interference now came from high places to protect the man.

Dele Giwa's murder suspect was allowed to escape from Nigeria , say ex-DIG who probed the murder

"The man was said to be related to the wife of a governor at that time and as a result of his connection, we came to a dead end on that lead," the former police chief, who was in charge of the research department of the police CID when Giwa was killed, said.

Omeben told NAN that the setback did not in any way deter him from using the evidence he had to follow the lead on Soyinka, and that he called on the Newswatch authorities to produce Soyinka.

"I have enough evidence to quiz Soyinka now. Please, Ray Ekpu can I have Soyinka now? They resisted up till today. Up till today, Soyinka never appeared before the police.

"They started to insinuate that the assassination was masterminded by Babangida, Akilu, among others. They said that Akilu ought to have been investigated.

"As a matter of fact, I interrogated Akilu and he told me that yes, they had invited Dele Giwa some few days before the assassination over a negative comment he made about Nigeria in a New York newspaper.

"He said that they had to invite him to tell him that he was wrong for portraying the country in bad light in the international press. Akilu insisted that the invitation was not enough to accuse the government of complicity in the assassination of Dele Giwa. He satisfied me with his explanation.

"Togun also absolved himself with his own explanation. The parcel bomb was said to have the Federal Government logo on it, which to me was not enough evidence. It was more of a circumstantial evidence. I can prove it!

"Go to any printing press if you are a 'good' criminal and you are planning well, they can print it for you and place it on the parcel, and it will look as if it came from the government.

"But for me to satisfy myself, I said please gentlemen, can I have Soyinka? Nobody! Soyinka ran away to London, that was my principal suspect. He did not appear until when I left the CID. I was retired from the police in 1989 and what happened after that, I don't know,"

Load-Date: October 26, 2015

---

End of Document

Nigerian journalists and the military coup in Niger

The Guardian

August 17, 2023 Thursday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1145 words

Body

---

Let me begin this piece by commanding the Nigerian Guild of Editors, NGE, for rightly describing military intervention in governance anywhere in the world as an aberration. It is an aberration because soldiers are trained in the act of war and not governance. They are charged with the responsibility of defending the territorial integrity of their nations.

Rising from its Standing Committee meeting held in Lagos, the NGE in a communique" urged ECOWAS to employ strategic engagement and diplomacy in ensuring that democratic structures are restored in the country (Niger)"

In other words, the body of editors is clearly against the military coup in Niger but opposed to the use of force to restore the democratic structures in the country.

I also note that the Guild urged ECOWAS to use diplomacy. It didn't say Nigeria's President, Bola Tinubu shouldn't use invade Niger, unlike the narrative being pushed erroneously by a section of the media. The decision to use force, if necessary to restore democracy in Niger was taken at a meeting of ECOWAS Heads of State and Governments in line with the sub-regional protocol on unconstitutional change of government. It wasn't a decision taken by Nigeria or President Tinubu, who is currently the chairman.

The opposition of the NGE military incursion in governance is clearly understood considering our nasty and unpleasant experiences with military interventions in Nigeria. That's why I'm surprised that a few journalists in their comments attempted to justify the military coup in Niger.

Any journalist who joined the profession in Nigeria during the military regimes would not have any reason to justify military intervention anywhere in the world, except he has some personal scores to settle with the present occupants of power at different levels in Nigeria.

If I knew what I know now about the military intervention in the governance of a nation, I wouldn't have erroneously jubilated over the coups of December 31, 1983 and the August 27, 1985.

I'm of the view that Nigeria's democracy and development would have advanced more than what we have today if not for the military misadventure of January 15, 1967, when we experienced the first military coup.

Nigerian journalists and the military coup in Niger

The military junta led by General Johnson Aguiyi Ironsi suspended Nigeria's federal constitution and promulgated the unitary decree which we are still struggling to overturn till today. The federal constitution encouraged competition among the regions. This competition brought about development, and each region developed at its own pace. Nowadays, state governors spend more days in Abuja than their state capitals with the belief that closeness to the powers in Abuja would attract development to their states. Now, we clamour for state police in a country where we once had local government police. No thanks to the unitary decree. The military that accused politicians of taking 10% of contract sums ended up taking up 70% when they were now in charge. They became more corrupt than the politicians they chased out of power for alleged corruption. They nurtured and sustained corruption in different forms.

Journalists can write against military action in Niger without necessarily supporting the coup there. The junta in Niger should be told in clear terms that they had no right to use the guns given to them to defend the nation to shoot themselves to power. If they felt strongly about the dominance of France in their nation, they should have dropped their uniforms, embrace politics, form a political party and use the anti- French narrative to canvass for votes in the next election.

In a bid to sustain themselves in power, they are moving towards Russia and the destructive Wagner Group led by the notorious Yevgeny Prigozhin. The Wagner people don't fight for free. They are mercenaries (commercial fighters) loyal only to money. They don't fight to win in order to sustain the contract.

What's more, the Wagner group recently challenged President Vladimir Putin, the same man that trained and empowered them, by invading Russia. This led to their banishment to Belarus. Now, they want to keep them busy in Africa. How can any rational being tolerate the idea of having such a dangerous group like Wagner near the Nigerian borders?

My colleagues who are editors today must have been young reporters during the dark days of General Sani Abacha.

As a young journalist with the Tempo Magazine that was a thorn in the flesh of Abacha junta, I know what I experienced. We couldn't even go to our office. We resorted to guerrilla journalism as our contribution to forcing the military to return to the barracks. One of my colleagues in The News magazine, Bagauda Kaltho was killed in Kaduna by the Abacha killer squad. A renowned editor Dele Giwa was letter – bombed during the regime of General Ibrahim Babaginda. Many newspapers, including the Guardian, Punch, etc were shut by the military. Some editors, Kunle Ajibade and Niran Malaolu, were jailed for a ridiculous reason of participating in a phantom coup.

Some had to use the "NADECO ROUTE" to escape from Nigeria to begin a new life in exile.

In my newsroom in AIT, we had over seven security operatives masquerading as reporters to monitor some of us they referred to as NADECO journalists. These nasty experiences will never make me to support any military coup anywhere in the world. If the military governments weren't good for us here in Nigeria, what makes you think they will perform magic in Niger?

Power should flow from the people, not from the barrel of the gun. Democracy is never a perfect system. It's not a hundred meter dash. Democracy once produced demagogues such as Adolf Hitler of Germany and Benito Mussolini of Italy who instigated the World War 11, that led to the deaths of millions of people. Yes, both men were elected by the people. They didn't come to power through military coups. Should that make us to reject democracy? The answer is a resounding NO. Democracy requires patience. It has in- built mechanisms to correct its own mistakes. The spate of impeachments of governors, Senate Presidents and Speakers of both National and State Assemblies had abated.

Let me emphasize that you can oppose the planned ECOWAS military intervention without necessarily supporting the coup or painting coupists as heroes. Doing so could send dangerous and unintended signals elsewhere. I'm worried about the way some of our colleagues are writing in support of the coup. Whatever you write today is being read worldwide, including by those who hold the instruments of coercion to stage a coup.

We shouldn't play into their hands. We should be extremely careful

Nigerian journalists and the military coup in Niger

Isah is Head of News, Silverbird's Rhythm FM and former President of the Nigerian Guild of Editors.

In this article Niger coup

Nigerian media

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 18, 2023

---

End of Document

Dimgba Igwe's Journalism Masterpiece

The Sun (Nigeria)

September 5, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1020 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Exactly six years ago on September 6, 2014, while jogging to keep fit on an early Saturday morning routine, habitual exercise, my bosom friend and co-author, Pastor Dimgba Igwe was killed by a hit-and-run mystery car that disappeared never to be found, leaving him bloody and helpless in the half-light of the slowly breaking day.

Dimgba Igwe left behind a journalism masterpiece titled: Advanced Features, Secrets of Writing Successful Articles. It's a book that unlocks the secrets of writing to be published. It's targeted at journalists and non-journalists—freelancers—who want to be able to write and get published. It covers a broad range of topics: freelance journalism, writing news articles, features, opinion articles, memoirs, biographies, travel writing, ghostwriting and what the author calls "writing to sell."

It's a book that has been hailed as a journalism classic by those who should know. People like Reuben Abati, Femi Adesina, Kunle Ajibade, Mike Awoyinfa and Prof. Olu Obafemi who wrote the foreword. Dimgba Igwe himself explains why he wrote this book, his last testament to a profession he loved with the unbridled passion of a devotee. In the opening pages, the author explains why he wrote the book:

"It was freelance contributions that brought me in direct contact with the late celebrated editor, Dele Giwa. Impressed with my work, he hired me right away to work in the Sunday Concord. That was a big break for me then and for which I consider him one of my journalism heroes. My freelance experience would have been confined to the local media market if my friend, Peter Jazzy Ezeh, had not opened the international frontiers to me through a useful introduction. In that sense, you could say I owe this book to him. To Ezeh, an avid bookworm, I am indebted.

"During the military clampdown of 1994 when our newspaper, the Concord Press, was shut down by the junta, my friend and 'twin brother' Mike Awoyinfa, challenged me to channel my frustration into writing a book rather than contemplate business ventures. 'With all your brain, how can you think of going into business?' he sneered when I threatened to quit journalism for the business world in the face of frequent military clampdown. This book is one of the evidences that I finally yielded to Awoyinfa's intellectual conceit, if not outright blackmail! That probably explained why Awoyinfa who is a devotee of media styles took time to read and edit the manuscript, after all others had worked on it, taking care of my stylistic imperfections.

Dimgba Igwe's Journalism Masterpiece

"The others who read, edited or made valuable suggestions include Femi Adesina, editor, Daily Sun; Dr. Reuben Abati, chairman, editorial board, The Guardian, Kunle Ajibade, author of a best-selling prison memoir and executive editor, The News magazine and of course, Dr. Olu Obafemi, a professor of English who wrote the foreword. I can't thank these highly esteemed professionals and academics enough for their candid remarks, criticism and suggestions, most of which were responsible for whatever merits you find in the book.

"So many people want to write books, essays, speeches, newspaper and magazine articles but don't know how to begin. So many people have stories to tell and can, indeed, render vivid accounts of their experiences in normal conversations but freeze when it comes to putting such exciting experiences into writing. Why? Does that describe you? Then this book is for you. It opens doors to the highly challenging and lucrative world of freelancing, it offers vital keys to ghostwriting, memoir writing, negotiating and marketing strategies for such intellectual products."

WHAT OTHERS SAY ABOUT THIS BOOK

Reuben Abati: I have read quite a number of publications on the art of successful writing; Dimgba Igwe's Advanced Features: Writing Successful Articles is a memorable, refreshing, and matchless contribution written in exquisite prose. It is the work of a man of practical undisguised interest in the subject. Igwe is at once a guide, teacher and analyst. His book is addressed to the freelance writer but it will be of great use to all writers in the English Language, journalists, travel writers and biographies especially. It is a labour of love and a professional testimony from one of Nigeria's most prolific public affairs analysts.

Mike Awoyinfa: This book makes me jealous. How I wish I had written it. It is a book everyone aspiring to make headway in journalism MUST read. It covers all the broad rubrics of journalism. Read it.

Kunle Ajibade: Dimgba Igwe got a job as a full-time journalist in Sunday Concord under the late Dele Giwa after a successful stint as a conscientious and confident freelance writer. That experience conferred on him the authority of a master. On the pages of this carefully crafted book, therefore, journalism comes alive in truly magisterial and inspiring way. This is hardly surprising, for Igwe believes strongly in the job and remains incredibly fanatical about its articles of faith.

Olu Obafemi (Ph.D): The book is fresh, rich and accessible and original—told straight from the heart, by one of Nigeria's most creative and inventive, dyed-in-the-wool journalists and writers. It is not just a book for journalists, professional and amateurish, but for anybody willing to come to grasp with contemporary knowledge about the human experience in a globalizing world, seen from the eye of the newsmaker. It is an inevitable read.

Femi Adesina: I have not read many books on freelance journalism, but I doubt if I'll read a better one than this. Practical, informative, educative without being unnecessarily didactical, and written in free flowing, easy to read language. Indeed, I was almost sorry to have finished reading it...And every editor or media manager must read this book or forever remain marooned in the misconception that you need an army of staff to run your publication(s). This book is surely a revolution and a revelation.

Enquiries 08033445125, 08026019981

The post Dimgba Igwe's Journalism Masterpiece appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/35/159927522660.jpeg>

Load-Date: September 5, 2020

End of Document

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

The Sun (Nigeria)

June 12, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Voice of the Nation

Length: 1131 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

It was a 90-minute interview, an encounter spanning the duration of a football match. But not for once did we talk football. For those who don't know, Dr. Patrick Dele Cole is one of the legends of the journalism profession in Nigeria. A historian and diplomat with a PhD from Cambridge, the man who followed in the footsteps of Alhaji Babatunde Jose to become the Managing Director of the Daily Times after it was hit by a crisis of catastrophic proportions, Dr. Cole was the man sent on a rescue mission. And he did rescue the titanic newspaper ship—let's call it SSS Daily Times—introducing fresh ideas, bringing in new talents from the New York Times, bringing in creativity, creating exciting feature stories—such as the famous PAGE SEVEN—bringing in razzmatazz columns, columnists and intellectually grounded editorials. Dr. Patrick Dele Cole, now 81, is the genius and talent hunter who brought to Nigeria, the legendary journalist Dele Giwa, then working in the New York Times. He was also the one that brought Dr. Stanley Macebuh from where he was teaching English first at the University of California, Berkeley and later at Columbia University, New York. All these game-changers in Nigerian journalism are gone. Dele Giwa, then 39, was killed by a gruesome parcel bomb which he personally opened and was blasted into eternity on October 19, 1986. Dr. Macebuh also died early at 68 on March 7, 2010.

On meeting Dr. Cole at home on Saturday evening, I asked him questions on all these great men and his own contribution to journalism. I found a diffident man who was not willing to be glorified as a great achiever in the newspaper front. I asked him how he felt stepping into the shoes of the legendary Alhaji Babatunde Jose, the man who built Daily Times and took it to greater heights. And he replied: "Alhaji Jose was a legend and you can't compete with a legend. What I fought against was that many of the top journalists were political by the time we got there in 1976. I told them: 'If you want to have a political agenda, then you shouldn't be working in this newspaper. You go out and do politics.'" He recalls that "at the beginning it was a bit difficult but so far as I was concerned, my conscience was clear. I told them: 'Just do your work. Report. Raise the standard. Make sure we sell our newspapers." One achievement he is proud of is making Daily Times readers outside Lagos to read fresh news, not stale.

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

It was an unforgettable encounter with this newspaper manager, diplomat, historian and a leader who tells me he has had a good life. As proof, he points to a group family photograph he took a few decades ago sandwiched by his wife, children and grandchildren. He points one by one to each child and gives a snappy introduction of how old the child is now and what he or she is doing today. For example, his big-time entrepreneur son, Tonye Cole is the founding partner of Sahara Group. I asked Dr. Cole the secrets to longevity and he brought out a bottle filled with pills, meaning old age is about taking your drugs. He laments that old age is a lapse into forgetfulness. "You even forget your enemies," he says.

BAN ON TWITTER

The interviewing was winding to an end. As a parting shot, I asked Dr. Cole his views on Nigeria's Twitter ban and his mood changed, bursting into a sermon on today's Nigeria.

"What concerns me is that in Nigeria we have freedom of speech," he begins. "Any attempt by any government to restrict the freedom of speech is detrimental to democracy. Democracy provides a field for the competition of ideas. If Buhari has better ideas than Twitter, he should say it. Truth is never less of a truth because others are denying it. No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him. There is technology today to go around Twitter. They will send it to your phone. So if you want to continue, you will get Twitter but you will get a different version. It will be based from South Africa. But you will get it every day."

"Look, Twitter is not Nigeria's problem. Farmers are today endangered in the hands of herders who are carrying AK-47 and shooting and burning people. That is a problem. The problem we have in Nigeria is some kind of military-style terrorist organisations who will go to a school, take your children and ask for ransom and you do not do anything about that. And what you are doing is to ban Twitter."

"My advice is that he should withdraw this ban or suspension of Twitter. There are other things more important to do. In fact, it is a losing battle. I just told you how to go round it. It is a technological thing. You cannot stop the flow of information. The only countries that have been able to stop the flow of information to that area are North Korea and China. Do you want to be like North Korea? You can't. Well, China, yes. But then, you can't compete with China. China has muscle, they have one-quarter of the world, so they can stop the news. They have enough internal news within themselves to keep going. But Nigeria? Come on! You don't even make pencils. You don't make biro. Everything you have in Nigeria you import. And you want to close Nigeria. How? The border you tried to close is a stupid thing. How can you close the border? First of all, Customs. Your argument is that the border is porous. Now, who are the people you have put in the Customs to make this border porous? Is it my brother? Is it your brother? So if the border is porous, you will try and seal it. Make sure that the Customs people there are working right. But if you enable those people by imposing more and more corrupt and inefficient officers at the border, then obviously it will continue to be porous. Whether you close it for two years or more, whenever you open it, the rubbish will continue. In a country that is enamoured to importing, instead of growing rice, we import it, all the things we can do, we prefer to import. Simple things like zipper, pencil, all types of things which in any other country you will see that the people are able to fix them. To plaster a wall, so that it is done right, we have to bring people from Cotonou."

"What Buhari wrote (on Twitter) is more or less saying that you Easterners, you didn't die enough. So we will kill more of you. More or less what he was saying. That if you are not careful, that you are too young to know the gravity of what happened. My point is that if you have a problem with Easterners wanting Biafra, why don't you sit down on the table and talk to them? You have Easterners, you have Igbo people in your executive council. Why don't you sit down with them and ask: 'What's all this?'"

The post No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

Load-Date: June 12, 2021

---

End of Document

Whitewashing impunity and iniquity

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

August 2, 2022 Tuesday

Copyright 2022 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 667 words

Body

---

A peek, any peek, into Nigeria's difficult history as a country would immediately betray that there are those, many of them in fact, who have contributed in no small measure to complicating the Nigerian story.

Spread across military and civilian circles almost in equal measure, whenever Nigeria's book of woes will be opened, these men and women will no doubt get dishonorable readings for their misdeeds.

However, it appears that as time has taken its toll on some of these men and women, the tendency to whitewash their actions and make them less undesirable and more presentable than they can ever be has become appealing to many who revel in drawing perverse parallels.

Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida was Nigeria's military president from 1985 to 1993, a period in which Nigeria found out that like an onion bulb, darkness can have many layers. He became military president of Nigeria after he deposed Muhammadu Buhari in a palace coup d'état. It was under Babangida's watch as military president that some of the worst atrocities committed against Nigeria and Nigerians were committed with reckless abandon and even glee.

Many argue that it was under Babangida, in the time colloquially known as the Babangida Era, that the political culture of corruption which today stands deeply embedded in the country really blossomed.

Executions and assassinations were also hot commodities during the Babangida era. Having survived two coup d'état attempts, he had no qualms ordering the 1985 execution of Mamman Vatsa and the 1991 execution of Gideon Orkar. Under Babangida, hundreds of soldiers also went on trial.

But it was not just soldiers. On October 19, 1986, Dele Giwa, a Nigerian journalist, Editor and founder of Newswatch magazine was killed by a parcel bomb in his home at Ikeja, Lagos, while in his study. The assassination occurred two days after he had been interviewed by State Security Service officials. The assassination has never been solved but a few Nigerians agree that it was sanctioned by the state of which Babangida was head at the time. In 2001, Babangida refused to testify before a national human rights commission about the murder, passing up in the process an opportunity to clear his name once and for all.

Whitewashing impunity and iniquity

In 1993, at historic national polls, Moshood Abiola swept to victory. But he was never to become President of the country. It was yet under Babangida that the election was annulled.

Under Babangida's iron fist, dozens of activists and journalists spent years in detention under horrific conditions.

Yet, in spite of this seemingly endless list of atrocities conceived, hatched and executed under Babangidas watch as military president, there are many who consider him a hero. These people, wading in the pool of ignorance they have deliberately muddied, have argued that Babangida is a hero for the way his coup detat succeeded in unseating Muhammadu Buhari who was then military president of the country.

Those who have been peddling this extremely reprehensible and laughable line of thought on social media and elsewhere have argued that given how low the country had sunk under Muhammadu Buhari by 1985, Babangida's palace coup of 1985, which opened the door to an era during which some of the deepest wounds on the conscience of Nigeria was inflicted, was an act of grace for Nigeria. This line of argument is shocking to say the least.

Nigeria may be at an all-time low given the failed promises of a government that whitewashed all its principal actors while successfully brainwashing Nigerians to vote for it not once but twice.

If the mistakes of the past are to be corrected, the correction will not be by the hands of those who don mendacity, mischief and even malice like garbs.

Babangida remains who he is for all that happened to Nigeria under his watch. Buhari remains who he is for all that is happening to Nigeria under his watch. Between them, there may be plenty villains but there is certainly no hero.

\xa0Kene Obiezu,

keneobiezu@gmail.com

Load-Date: August 2, 2022

---

End of Document

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

The Sun (Nigeria)

June 12, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Voice of the Nation

Length: 1131 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

It was a 90-minute interview, an encounter spanning the duration of a football match. But not for once did we talk football. For those who don't know, Dr. Patrick Dele Cole is one of the legends of the journalism profession in Nigeria. A historian and diplomat with a PhD from Cambridge, the man who followed in the footsteps of Alhaji Babatunde Jose to become the Managing Director of the Daily Times after it was hit by a crisis of catastrophic proportions, Dr. Cole was the man sent on a rescue mission. And he did rescue the titanic newspaper ship—let's call it SSS Daily Times—introducing fresh ideas, bringing in new talents from the New York Times, bringing in creativity, creating exciting feature stories—such as the famous PAGE SEVEN—bringing in razzmatazz columns, columnists and intellectually grounded editorials. Dr. Patrick Dele Cole, now 81, is the genius and talent hunter who brought to Nigeria, the legendary journalist Dele Giwa, then working in the New York Times. He was also the one that brought Dr. Stanley Macebuh from where he was teaching English first at the University of California, Berkeley and later at Columbia University, New York. All these game-changers in Nigerian journalism are gone. Dele Giwa, then 39, was killed by a gruesome parcel bomb which he personally opened and was blasted into eternity on October 19, 1986. Dr. Macebuh also died early at 68 on March 7, 2010.

On meeting Dr. Cole at home on Saturday evening, I asked him questions on all these great men and his own contribution to journalism. I found a diffident man who was not willing to be glorified as a great achiever in the newspaper front. I asked him how he felt stepping into the shoes of the legendary Alhaji Babatunde Jose, the man who built Daily Times and took it to greater heights. And he replied: "Alhaji Jose was a legend and you can't compete with a legend. What I fought against was that many of the top journalists were political by the time we got there in 1976. I told them: 'If you want to have a political agenda, then you shouldn't be working in this newspaper. You go out and do politics.'" He recalls that "at the beginning it was a bit difficult but so far as I was concerned, my conscience was clear. I told them: 'Just do your work. Report. Raise the standard. Make sure we sell our newspapers." One achievement he is proud of is making Daily Times readers outside Lagos to read fresh news, not stale.

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

It was an unforgettable encounter with this newspaper manager, diplomat, historian and a leader who tells me he has had a good life. As proof, he points to a group family photograph he took a few decades ago sandwiched by his wife, children and grandchildren. He points one by one to each child and gives a snappy introduction of how old the child is now and what he or she is doing today. For example, his big-time entrepreneur son, Tonye Cole is the founding partner of Sahara Group. I asked Dr. Cole the secrets to longevity and he brought out a bottle filled with pills, meaning old age is about taking your drugs. He laments that old age is a lapse into forgetfulness. "You even forget your enemies," he says.

BAN ON TWITTER

The interviewing was winding to an end. As a parting shot, I asked Dr. Cole his views on Nigeria's Twitter ban and his mood changed, bursting into a sermon on today's Nigeria.

"What concerns me is that in Nigeria we have freedom of speech," he begins. "Any attempt by any government to restrict the freedom of speech is detrimental to democracy. Democracy provides a field for the competition of ideas. If Buhari has better ideas than Twitter, he should say it. Truth is never less of a truth because others are denying it. No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him. There is technology today to go around Twitter. They will send it to your phone. So if you want to continue, you will get Twitter but you will get a different version. It will be based from South Africa. But you will get it every day."

"Look, Twitter is not Nigeria's problem. Farmers are today endangered in the hands of herders who are carrying AK-47 and shooting and burning people. That is a problem. The problem we have in Nigeria is some kind of military-style terrorist organisations who will go to a school, take your children and ask for ransom and you do not do anything about that. And what you are doing is to ban Twitter."

"My advice is that he should withdraw this ban or suspension of Twitter. There are other things more important to do. In fact, it is a losing battle. I just told you how to go round it. It is a technological thing. You cannot stop the flow of information. The only countries that have been able to stop the flow of information to that area are North Korea and China. Do you want to be like North Korea? You can't. Well, China, yes. But then, you can't compete with China. China has muscle, they have one-quarter of the world, so they can stop the news. They have enough internal news within themselves to keep going. But Nigeria? Come on! You don't even make pencils. You don't make biro. Everything you have in Nigeria you import. And you want to close Nigeria. How? The border you tried to close is a stupid thing. How can you close the border? First of all, Customs. Your argument is that the border is porous. Now, who are the people you have put in the Customs to make this border porous? Is it my brother? Is it your brother? So if the border is porous, you will try and seal it. Make sure that the Customs people there are working right. But if you enable those people by imposing more and more corrupt and inefficient officers at the border, then obviously it will continue to be porous. Whether you close it for two years or more, whenever you open it, the rubbish will continue. In a country that is enamoured to importing, instead of growing rice, we import it, all the things we can do, we prefer to import. Simple things like zipper, pencil, all types of things which in any other country you will see that the people are able to fix them. To plaster a wall, so that it is done right, we have to bring people from Cotonou."

"What Buhari wrote (on Twitter) is more or less saying that you Easterners, you didn't die enough. So we will kill more of you. More or less what he was saying. That if you are not careful, that you are too young to know the gravity of what happened. My point is that if you have a problem with Easterners wanting Biafra, why don't you sit down on the table and talk to them? You have Easterners, you have Igbo people in your executive council. Why don't you sit down with them and ask: 'What's all this?'"

The post No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

No matter where Buhari runs, Twitter is going to chase him, says Dr. Patrick Cole

Load-Date: July 13, 2021

---

End of Document

GandDollar Gate: Beyond Ja'afar's video

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

July 9, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 942 words

Body

---

While we knew and respected each other from a distance, I first met Ja'afar Ja'afar in 2015 when I was serving my second stint as the editor of Friday Leadership.

Journalists have a way of knowing themselves through various networks even if they had never met. Journalism is a profession like any other that builds one's reputation in the eyes of the world. Knowing the hassles one goes through to put a paper to bed or produce an article, colleagues rate themselves even from afar.

Ja'afar, with his equally double-barrelled named journalist twin brother, AbdulAzeez AbdulAzeez, is one of those not too young to write and not too old to dare firebrand journalists that enjoy their work not necessarily because of the fame it can bestow, or the money that isn't there, but largely because of the adrenaline that courses through one's veins when faced with danger. Saying the truth can be dangerous.

He may be seen as a controversial young chap by many, but hey - truth, most times, comes wrapped in controversies. Is there a prophet that was not seen as controversial in the beginning? Or a revolutionary that was welcomed without invoking controversies in society? Any change from the known or a challenge to the established order brings with it a certain dose of controversy.

We all know, not just suspect, that many of our leaders are sleazy. They steal our commonwealth, especially through contract inflation and collusion with contractors - their partners in crime. At the end of the day, no work is done or where done, poorly executed while funds have been disbursed for them.

In other cases, to cut their losses, contractors who had been short-changed by government officials deliver substandard projects and services. In most cases, they abandon the projects midway. And those who should hold them to account cannot because they had eaten from the forbidden pot.

Unfortunately, it is always the ripped-off citizens that hail their cheats and damn those who expose them.

Corruption, it has been said, is not chickenhearted; it always fights back. This is why it is hoped that it is not the case when we see pictures of pre-puberty school children, whose future is being mortgaged by the corrupt, being used as cannon fodder, bearing placards denouncing Ja'afar and "promising" to vote for Ganduje next year.

GandDollar Gate: Beyond Ja'afar's video

While the Ja'afar video is under probe, I would not opine on their veracity or otherwise but call on all relevant authorities to do what is needed because such a case can only be likened to the Godwin Daboh versus Joseph Tarka or even the Nasir el-Rufa'i versus the Senate saga. They are defining events that can shape our thinking as a nation.

Ja'afar risks being regarded unfavourably if the video is doctored, but he also will be a celebrity of sorts if the video is proven to be genuine. He will become our modern-day Dele Giwa and perhaps get his sculpture erected in the Journalists' Hall of Fame when we get one.

Governor Ganduje will politically fizzle out in ignominy if the video is authenticated, but his hand will be strengthened if they turn out to be doctored. People will read it as desperation by his political enemies, but especially it would be said that they set out to embarrass President Muhammadu Buhari.

The way to give a bite to the anti-corruption crusade is to give people like Ja'afar political appointments if he comes out victorious because such people would have a reputation to guard jealously. There are others like him, but the orientation of our leaders is to give appointments to "team players". Their definition of a "team player" is a person who will partake in defrauding people without letting the cat out of the bag.

There had been cases of people society expected uprightness from but had entered into a "quid pro quo" arrangement and smiled to their banks. Anybody who will expose vice anywhere deserves commendation.

However, my chief concern is the contractor who agreed to be part of this sting operation, assuming it happened. He risks losing it all. No longer get any patronage from that angle, because the governor must know him very well. He has a family to cater for and has commitments and obligations, yet he was fearless enough to go through with this. He is a patriotic citizen who can sacrifice his interests for Nigeria. Not many like him around.

But if he can take this kind of risk for Nigeria, what is Nigeria going to do for him?

People fighting corruption this way not only risk their livelihoods but also their lives. So it won't be out of place for the country to give him some kind of social protection for such an exemplary act. After all is said and done and he is proved true, the whistle-blower's reward would also be a good idea, in addition to whatever else may follow.

There must be a deliberate policy by the government to protect such people and their families, or they would be left vulnerable to the mercy of wounded public officials or the "esprit de corps" that is strong among the class of our "polithiefians".

Those in authority only hire their own to gain control and form an army of corruption to fight back. They emasculate the upright physically, mentally and financially.

The fight against corruption must be intensified and won. For as many smooth operators, there will always be patriots who will blow the whistle. However, the fight will be lost or won depending on how the government treats or mistreats all involved.

If corrupt acts take place, the government must show its teeth and protect those who bell the cat. But if a reputation is tarnished unfairly, authorities must take action to deter others.

Hassan Gimba is the Publisher and Editor-in-Chief of Neptune Prime.

Load-Date: July 9, 2023

Pupils learn about journalism, others on career day

The Nation (Nigeria)

November 14, 2019 Thursday

Copyright 2019 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 526 words

Body

---

Notable professionals from various fields of endeavour came together to counsel pupils of Home Science Association Secondary School, Alakuko, Lagos State, during their 2019 Career Day last Wednesday.

The session featured professionals from the media, aviation, medicine, agriculture and guidance and counselling.

Principal of the school, John Kenny Olokose, said unlike in the past, when parents limited their wards' career choices, there were many more fields now in which they could excel.

Olokose said the decision on which direction to head after secondary school solely rested on the pupils.

He said opportunities now abound in several fields, with pupils having the freedom to decide where to go.

He said: 'Many of you have dreams. You can now contextualise the dreams. In the next 10 years, you can be a big achiever. If you do not have a dream, start having one now. Dream your dreams. But note that it takes sacrifice to actualise your dream.'

Speaking on journalism, Editor of The Nation, Mr. Adeniyi Adesina, told the pupils there were two ways to become a journalist - by studying Mass Communication, or acquiring a degree in any course of study and then getting on-the-job training.

He said other professionals, including doctors, architects and lawyers, are journalists. He identified the ability to write as a crucial skill for journalism.

Beyond acquiring a certificate, Adesina said being a journalist required hard work. He said a journalist does not sit in the office but goes to the beat to gather information and then returns to his desk to write stories or feature articles.

He stated that the profession has a constitutional role and as such helps in making leaders accountable to the nation.

He said: 'This is the only profession recognised by the constitution.'

'You must hold the government of the day accountable as a journalist because your role is to serve the people.'

He also educated the students on the different aspects of journalism: print, broadcast and online.

Pupils learn about journalism, others on career day

When asked if it is safe to practise journalism considering the fact that ace journalist, Dele Giwa died as a result of parcel bomb, he said the attack on journalists in the past was largely carried out during military rule.

He said with the return to democracy, things are stabilising and the government now observes the rule of law.

Doyin Kukoyi, presenter of the popular programme, Gbajumo Osere, on DSTV Channel 157, told the students they would need to excel in English and Mathematics to study journalism.

She said studying Mass Communication could also take them into different aspects of journalism as well as public relations and advertising.

She added: 'One of the greatest powers you have is the ability to pass on information to every human being. The power is in passing the message across to a mass audience.'

Kukoyi said every journalist must be distinct in the use of English Language and also have a Unique Selling Point.

Other professionals who spoke included a pilot with Air Peace and a former student of the school, Captain Adebayo Manuwa; a medical doctor, Dr. Macaulay Abimbola; an agriculturist, Nurat Omotayo Atoba; and a counsellor, Oluwatoyin Williams.

Load-Date: November 15, 2019

---

End of Document

Gideon Orkar: The man who saw tomorrow

The Punch

October 30, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1356 words

Body

---

Tunde Odesola Published 27 April 2020

Tunde Odesola

Tick-tock, tick-tock, both hands of the clock tiptoed to 12 midnight. It was December 31. Hunger and anger waved at the year, 1983, which said its goodbyes and trudged towards the calendar door. Economically, 1983 was bad for Nigeria and her naira. The masses had nothing but the skin covering their bones. Stuffed up to the throat with corruption, apathy and impunity, the nation held no hope for the citizenry.

But the masses were thankful. Thankful for surviving the year and the 'austerity measures' imposed by the prodigal Shehu Shagari administration, which swept into power in October 1983 on the wings of a violent election. Like an answer to an anxious prayer, a young Fulani soldier, Muhammadu Buhari, jumped on Dodan Barracks, Lagos, near the stroke of midnight with his band of bumbling, self-righteous soldiers and kicked out Shagari and his focusless National Party of Nigeria. The nation broke into wild jubilation, hugging Buhari's New Year present.

After just one year and eight months in the saddle, however, Major General Buhari was booted out of office by the man who ran the bloodiest military junta in the history of the country, General Ibrahim Babangida. No regime in Nigeria's history recorded a higher number of deaths of military personnel and civilian activists than Babangida's murderous regime.

During the Babangida years, journalist Dele Giwa was shredded by a parcel bomb, over 150 senior Nigerian military officers crashed midair and perished in a Lagos swamp; poet-soldier, Major General Mamman Vatsa, whom Babangida was best man to, wasn't spared by the little man now marooned on Minna hilltop. Vatsa was tied to a stake and shot to death in 1986 over an alleged coup plot along with many other brilliant soldiers. The gun of Babangida's misrule dripped with blood.

On Sunday, April 22, 1990, about five years into Babangida's bloody rule, a junior soldier, Major Gideon Orkar, led the most audacious coup in the annals of the country by attempting to oust the fiercely-corrupt Babangida from power. The Orkar coup demystified Babangida, who fled, tail between legs, to Abuja, where he relocated the seat of power to from Lagos after escaping being killed, through the courage of his ADC, Colonel UK Bello, who spirited him and his family out of Dodan Barracks via the backdoor. Bello later returned to the barracks to face the coup plotters but was killed inside an armoured tank. Subsequently, the coup was foiled and the plotters were arrested. Orkar, a Tiv from Benue State, and 41 other soldiers were shot to death on July 27, 1990.

Gideon Orkar: The man who saw tomorrow

Babangida abandoned power in 1993 when he couldn't bear the local and international backlash resulting from his cancellation of the June 12 presidential election won by the late MKO Abiola. Sani Abacha, arguably, the only major general Babangida was taller than, later demolished the sandcastle Babangida foisted on the nation and christened Interim National Government, side-footing the weightless leader of the ING, Ernest Shonekan, out of Aso Rock – after just three months in power. Abacha was nothing but greed. IBB was everything but good. The lucifer of deception embraces the devil of greed.

The Orkar coup clocked 30 years old a few days ago. So much water has passed under the Nigerian bridge. During the coup, Nigeria was headless for many hours as senior military officers rallied troops and engaged the revolutionary junior soldiers in a fierce battle to control Lagos. Never in its 53 years of existence had Lagos witnessed the amount of ammunition fired on the day as soldiers fought in the trenches on April 22 through 23, 1990. Lagos went into a cardiac arrest with the heavy artillery bombardment.

After seizing power, Orkar accused the Babangida government of corruption, nepotism and killings. In his nationwide speech, Orkar cut off Sokoto, Kano, Katsina, Borno and Bauchi from the geographical expression called Nigeria. He said, "On behalf of the patriotic and well-meaning peoples of the Middle Belt and southern parts of this country, I, Major Gideon Orkar, wish to inform you of the successful ousting of the dictatorial, corrupt, drug baronish, evil man, deceitful, homosexually-centred, prodigalistic, unpatriotic administration of General Badamosi Babangida."

He continued, "We have equally commenced their trials for unabated corruption, mismanagement of national economy, the murders of Dele Giwa, Major-General Mamman Vasta, with other officers as there was no attempted coup but mere intentions that were yet to materialise, and other human rights violations.

"The National Guard, already in its formative stage, is disbanded with immediate effect. Decrees Number 2 and 46 are hereby abrogated. We wish to emphasise that this is not just another coup but a well-conceived,-- planned and executed revolution for the marginalised, oppressed and enslaved peoples of the Middle Belt and the South.

"Our history is replete with numerous and uncontrollable instances of callous and insensitive, dominatory, repressive intrigues by those who think it is their birthright to dominate till eternity the political and economic privileges of this great country to the exclusion of the people of the Middle Belt and the South. They have almost succeeded in subjugating the Middle Belt and making them voiceless and now extending (the) same to the South."

It's 30 years since Orkar and his men stormed the Dodan Barracks by 1:40am. It's 54 years since Majors Chukwuma Nzeogu and Emmanuel Ifeajuna hatched Nigeria's first coup on January 15, 1966, killing 22 people, including the Prime Minister, Tafawa Balewa. It's 54 years since northern officers launched a 'July Rematch' counter-coup that killed the Head of State, General J.T.U Aguiyi-Ironsi, and many other leaders.

However, not even during the military bloodiness did clannishness dominate governance as Nigeria is currently witnessing under the Muhammadu Buhari regime. This is the first time in the life of Nigeria when herdsmen will kill Middle Belt and southern Nigerian citizens while the Federal Government does absolutely nothing to check the ethnic cleansing. It's the first time the Federal Government will openly say herdsmen are right to kill and plunder if the Middle Belt people and southerners do not give out their lands to herdsmen for RUGA. It's also the first time that all service chiefs and all paramilitary organisations, except two, are northerners.

World Bank President, Jim Yong Kim, disclosed in 2017 that Buhari urged the bank to concentrate development in the northern region of Nigeria. The non-appointment of the Igbo into the National Defence Council and the National Security Council is in breach of Section 217(3) of the constitution which says the composition of the Armed Forces must reflect federal character.

After repeated denials, it recently came to light that northern states have long been benefiting from the Federal Government's Conditional Cash Transfer programme while states like Lagos and Delta didn't benefit. Buhari's state,

Gideon Orkar: The man who saw tomorrow

Katsina, has the highest beneficiaries with 133, 227 indigenes getting cash transfers. Katsina is followed by Zamfara (130,764), Jigawa (99,044), Kano (84,148), Plateau (78,430), Kebbi (76,026), Kogi (62,129) and Benue (58,943). Also, Nasarawa (48,687), Kaduna (35,348), Kwara (32,218), Gombe (26,532), Akwa Ibom (24,929), Yobe (24,814), Bauchi (23,305) are on the list of top beneficiaries. The number of beneficiaries in Osun, Oyo and Cross River states are 15,572, 13,811 and 11,998 respectively while Edo, Bayelsa, Rivers, Abia, Anambra and Imo have 11,368, 9,805, 9,596, 9,347, 8,105 and 7,220 beneficiaries respectively.

Babangida's administration, which Orkar sought to overthrow, clearly appears to be a saint when compared with the Buhari regime in areas such as fairness in appointments, security and infrastructural development. Without a doubt, Buhari's place as Nigeria's most cliquish leader is sealed in infamy and this mortal failing will be the everlasting memoriam of his presidency. Truly, Nigeria deserves Orkar's pity. Orkar deserves a posthumous national award.

Load-Date: October 30, 2021

---

End of Document

PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!

The Nation (Nigeria)

April 26, 2023 Wednesday

Copyright 2023 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 4628 words

Body

---

Former General Editor, Africa Now and Publisher of Africa Today.

When I left Concord newspapers as London Correspondent in October 1983, I was not sure what to do next. I did not know where my next job would be. This was the time when I needed a job the most. I had just got married, and my wife and I were expecting our first child. So it was not only myself that I had to feed and take care of as I used to, I was now responsible for the upkeep and wellbeing of my family. Meanwhile, the media circle in London, as big as it was, and still is, could be actually a very small community.

The news of my departure from Concord had spread among my London colleagues very speedily. My choice of where to work next was limited. But I thought my best bet was with West Africa magazine, the oldest African weekly based in the city. It was just a walking distance away from my former office at the Concord and was owned by the Nigerian government through the Daily Times of Nigeria. It had the late Kaye Whiteman as its editor.

Kaye was David Williams's protégé, and he knew me very well. I approached West Africa and held a meeting with him. We discussed my situation. He particularly wanted to know what had happened and why I had to leave the Concord. I explained to him that Chief Abiola wanted me in Nigeria and I was not ready for reposting to Nigeria at that stage for personal reasons and also because, in the first place, I was not a local correspondent employed in Nigeria and posted to work for Concord in London like the Sketch did. He was sympathetic with my predicament but unfortunately said he could not offer me a job.

Why he couldn't, I really did not know. I thought it might have to do with how to pay my salary. Where I came from at the Concord, owned by a multimillionaire publisher, I was never owed any salary, and it was never paid late to me. Any prospective employer, especially in the pan-African news magazine publishing circle in London at that time, feared if they could afford to pay me. I issued the cheque to pay myself and other staff of the company in London at the end of each month anyway. I took his decision not to offer me a job in good faith and left.

A few years later, after I had moved on, Kaye, in a remarkable twist of irony, found himself having to write about me in his famous 'Matchet's Diary' column in West Africa. He had to publicly admit that he once regretted not hiring me when I came to him looking for employment in 1983. He wrote: 'I can reveal with some mortification that I once turned him down for a job on this journal, but you can't win them all.'

PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!

What prompted him to write about me was the high profile lecture on Nigeria I was invited to deliver at the renowned School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, in 1993. He was very generous in his comments about me in that article. He was, without a doubt, one of the most respected British journalists who could speak authoritatively about my London career, most especially my exploits over the years as a foreign correspondent in the city.

Therefore, it is imperative that I reproduce here in full Kaye Whiteman's comments on me in that 22-28 February 1993 Matchet's Diary column in West Africa magazine. He titled it, 'Kayode - Commonwealth Crusader.' Here is what he wrote:

'WITH HIS FORTHCOMING talk to the Royal African Society on Thursday, February 25 (1993), Kayode Soyinka consecrates his position as one of the foremost African journalistic practitioners in London. The talk is to be at the School of Oriental and African Studies in Bloomsbury at 6pm, and his subject is 'Nigeria: the Year of Transition,' but there is other evidence of the London Bureau Chief of Newswatch's current high profile. I have to commend him, for instance, for having written creditable, and sufficiently different, obituaries of the late Sir Adetokunbo Ademola in both The Independent and The Guardian (here he has had a complete corner, but it is sad that neither The Times, the paper of record, nor the Daily Telegraph, have found space to record the passing of such an eminent international personality).

'Kayode also, a few weeks back, took it upon himself, in a letter to the Editor of The Independent on the subject of the Calcutt report and present pressures to control the British press, to express astonishment that any British government 'could ever dream of introducing legislation to curb the press, no matter the recent abuses of its so-called power'. He goes on to wonder 'if anyone is considering the effect such new press-gag laws as the government is contemplating would have on journalists and media-government relationships around the world, especially in the Commonwealth - and Africa in particular, where we journalists have had to fight against all the odds to assert our independence and operate in an atmosphere of freedom'. He concludes by saying: 'Britain should be giving a lead and not behaving like those tinpot dictators who see the press as their worst enemy.'

'Like his boss Ray Ekpu he has been prominent in the Commonwealth Journalists Association and has been around in London for well over 10 years, having started off as Correspondent for Chief Abiola's Concord, before moving to Newswatch when it began in 1985. His place in press history, as well as his own coming of age as a journalist, came from his presence on the spot when the late Dele Giwa, founding father of Newswatch, was parcel bombed in Lagos in 1986. An incident so horrifying is bound to put iron in the soul. I can reveal with some mortification that I once turned him down for a job on this journal, but then you can't win them all. I have always considered him something of a 'newshound,' covering all the London ramifications of the Dikko kidnap and subsequent trials, for example. This was shown more recently in a sound piece of investigative journalism he did on John Onanuga, the Nigerian involved in the bizarre Norman Lamont 'Threshergate' affair. Onanuga, as already recorded in this column, first claimed that it was Lamont, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who purchased cheap champagne and Raffles cigarettes at Threshers, then retracted his statement having found himself clearly out of his depth.

After the tabloids began to hound him with misleading stories suggesting his presence in this country was illegal, Kayode conducted an interview with him in Yoruba in which he clearly admits on tape that 'it was Lamont who bought things from me.' And as Kayode reports, even Thresher admits that they could find no evidence to suggest that Onanuga was an illegal immigrant in Britain.

For the record, he comes from a well-known Nigerian family. He is the brother of former weekly Concord editor Bayo Onanuga, who resigned last April after the banning of the publication for a front-page critique of the running of the Nigerian economy. Which brings me back, almost, to where I started, with Kayode and the press.'

What a testimonial! As I was delivering my lecture that evening in an auditorium that was filled to the brim, Kaye was among the familiar faces that I saw in the audience. I noticed that he was listening with rapt attention to every word I uttered. He went on to do a report of the lecture in the Matchet's Diary, again, in the 8-14 March 1993 edition of West Africa. He titled it as 'Debating Nigeria' and wrote:

PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!

'Having given him some solid advance publicity, I should record that Kayode Soyinka's talk at SOAS on Nigeria's transition (see this column two weeks ago) was a stimulating evening. It attracted a lot of people, and a lot of controversy, and I understand a text is eventually to be published.'

Let me simply note that Kayode is a convinced democrat, who believes that an imperfect civilian regime is better than a military one any time, although there were quite a few to disagree with him, citing the Second Republic as an example.

Thus the interminable khaki versus agbada argument got into full swing. It was a good-humoured evening, as evidenced by the remark from the floor when Segun Johnson introduced himself as representing the Organisation for the Restoration of Democracy in Africa. Quick as a flash came the response 'think of Nigeria first.' I must commend Kayode for airing one of my own preoccupations when he deplored the lack of sense of history of today's Nigerians ('Have you read the memoirs of Chief Adebo?' he asked the audience). Kayode does his bit, as I have noted, in the obituary field, apropos of which I note that finally, a month after the event, that well-known paper of record The Times of London has managed to note the passing of that great Nigerian, Sir Adetokunbo Ademola. Unbylined as it was, internal evidence suggests that this one, at least, was not done by Kayode.'

Kaye Whiteman was very generous to me in his comments on my London career and his reports on this particular event. I feel I owe him a debt of gratitude. He also did an elaborate review of my first book, Diplomatic Baggage: MOSSAD and NIGERIA - The Dikko Story, when it was launched. This was on 31 January 1995, at the Nigerian Institute of International Affairs (NIIA), Lagos, under the chairmanship of the late Dr. Olusola Saraki, and in the presence of Dr. Umaru Dikko himself. The review appeared in the 6-12 March 1995 edition of West Africa.

The book was on the kidnapping that occurred in broad daylight on a well-to-do London Street within half a mile of Kensington Palace on 5 July 1984 of a former minister and close aide of deposed President Shehu Shagari of Nigeria. The kidnapping was a sensational occurrence which grabbed the headlines in the media globally. Dikko was the fiercest opponent of the military junta in Nigeria led by Major-General Muhammadu Buhari which had just toppled the democratically elected government of President Shagari in which Dikko was a very powerful and influential minister. He was drugged, boxed into a packing-case together with three of his captors and nearly flown to Lagos where he would have been put on trial and probably given a life sentence.

I chose to write about this incident because, throughout my 17-year career in London as a correspondent, it was the most bizarre and the most fascinating story for me of Nigerian and African interest. Even Nelson Mandela, when I met him in February 1995 in his first year in office as President of South Africa, and presented him with an autographed copy of the book, told me he and his co-prisoners on Robbin Island heard about the Dikko Kidnap while they were in prison - 'You Nigerians,' he quipped.

Besides, I used the book to tell a story about Nigeria and to explain that what happened on that afternoon which to all intents and purposes was an affront on the British government and people, and must be condemned no matter how miscreant Dikko might have been; it was not typical of what one might be tempted to describe as a typical Nigerian attitude or behaviour. Rather it was just a spill over of political power play in Nigeria which unfortunately spilt over on the streets of London.

Lastly, I had to choose this topic for a book to write because I knew I was ending my long career as a foreign correspondent in London and I thought that having this book done would speak for me and represent what I did and all those years of reporting from London. In short, this book was something to show, even years after I might have gone, that Kayode Soyinka passed through here as a London Correspondent. I feel happy and very proud that Diplomatic Baggage is used widely in many universities around the world by students of Anglo-Nigerian Relations, International Affairs and Diplomacy and Africa Politics and politics generally. I thank Wolfson College, University of Cambridge, for inviting me to come in as a Visiting Scholar to write the book, and the Commonwealth, through what used to be known as the Commonwealth Media Development Fund (CMDF) for granting me the funds for the Scholarship. However, in an interesting twist of irony, after the collapse of West Africa, Kaye ended up writing for me at Africa Today, my own pan-African newsmagazine. It was established in January 1995 but made its debut on the global newsstands at the end of April of that year with the May 1995 edition. Kaye wrote consistently for Africa Today until his death 17 May 2014.

PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!

I spoke with him on the telephone two days before his death, and he did not betray any sign of ill-health. His voice was strong, and we discussed story ideas for the next edition of Africa Today. The sad and shocking news of his sudden death was broken to me as I arrived in Lagos, Nigeria, on a visit. The least I could do to honour such a generous benefactor was to write a well-deserved and befitting appreciation and tribute to him. I recognised his support for me in the tough task of publishing Africa Today and placing it consistently on the global newsstands. He was an accomplished writer, journalist, and editor. Not only was he an expert on Africa but he was a great friend of the region, and Nigeria in particular, where he was considered an honorary citizen. The tribute was published in Africa Today itself, the UK Guardian and several other newspapers around the world, including in Nigeria and around the Commonwealth, where he had many friends. At one stage in his career in the early '80s, he had been a spokesperson in Brussels for the old European Economic Community (EEC). From 1999 to 2000, he served as the Director of Information at the Commonwealth Secretariat, Marlborough House, London, under Secretary-General, Chief Emeka Anyaoku. He died aged 78.

However, when Kaye couldn't offer me a job at West Africa, I knew I still had to get myself a job fast. I was determined to get one before my wife gave birth. Meanwhile, we had a new responsibility immediately after we got married on 15 October 1983 by buying a house in the Mill Hill area in northwest London. So we now had to pay the mortgage as well. My wife felt naturally concerned about the untimeliness of losing my Concord job and the discomfort that it would give us, especially with our new responsibilities. Who wouldn't be? Being newly-wed is not the best time for a husband to lose his job. But Titilope was very understanding. She was my pillar of strength throughout that difficult period. Still not knowing where my next job would come from, I kept reassuring her not to worry, that an opening would show up and I would get a new job soon.

As luck would have it, one day I received a telephone call out of the blue from Lagos that turned out to be very crucial for me. It effectively put an end to my sorrow of job hunting. It was the voice of an influential Nigerian figure on the other side of the telephone. It was Chief Olu Adebanjo, a renowned journalist of the very old school of Nigerian journalism.

Chief Adebanjo used to be the editor of the famous Daily Express. He had become a politician and was at the time serving as Special Adviser and Federal Minister of Information to President Shehu Shagari - being the first and only person to date to have combined these two strategic positions. He had heard about my predicament and the circumstances that led to my disengagement from Concord newspapers as London Correspondent. He knew I was in the market in London looking for a new job. In our telephone conversation, he told me he had spoken on my behalf with Peter Enahoro, the Publisher of Africa Now. He asked me to go and see him, telling me that Enahoro would employ me. Chief Olu Adebanjo, may his soul rest in peace, was a Godsend.

The following morning after that telephone conversation, I went to Dilke House, on Mallet Street, right opposite the University of London Student Union Building, where Africa Now had its office. Chief Adebanjo had already got me an appointment to see Peter Enahoro. And he was in the office when I got there. I was filled with awe as I entered his posh office and sat in front of Peter Enahoro, the legendary and famous 'Peter Pan,' for real.

When I was growing up, Peter Enahoro was a household name in Nigerian journalism and politics. He was the fabled editor of the Daily Times of Nigeria. In fact, he had earlier edited the Sunday Times at the tender age of 23 in 1958. Four years later in 1962, he was made the editor of the Daily Times when he took over from another distinguished editor, Babatunde Jose. At both national newspapers, the most influential and most widely read in Nigeria, he had run the most powerful regular column under his pen name 'Peter Pan.' He had used that column to prick the conscience of many Nigerian government officials and politicians. He had built a big reputation for himself as a gadfly in the conscience of the nation with his writings. When you read Peter Enahoro, you cannot but admire his mastery of the language. His effective use of satire can crack the ribs, as could be experienced by reading his bestseller, How to be a Nigerian.

PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!

And, lest we forget, he came from a political and media family. His senior brother, the late Chief Anthony Enahoro, was also a celebrated journalist who holds the record as the youngest national newspaper editor in Nigeria; at the age of 21, he was editor of the Southern Nigerian Defender based in Ibadan and owned by Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, one of Nigeria's founding fathers.

As a politician, Chief Enahoro fought many battles. He had the historic honour of being the one to propose and raise the motion in Parliament in Lagos for Nigeria's independence and was Nigeria's first Federal Minister of Information in the country's First Republic. When the first military coup in Nigeria was staged 15 January 1966 and ended the first post-independence democratically elected government, led by Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, curiously enough, Peter Enahoro did not use his popular column to condemn it. On the contrary, he seemed to be enamoured of the young military officers who staged the coup as some of them were said to be his friends.

However, when the counter-coup of 29 July 1966, led mainly by northern Nigerian soldiers took place, his position as editor of Daily Times became somewhat untenable, and he had to resign in 1967. Enahoro was a threat to and target of the new military men in power. If he had not left the country after the 29 July 1966 coup, he certainly would have been arrested by the new soldiers who had taken over power. Peter went into exile in Europe in 1967. He first settled in Germany where he became editor of Deutsche Welle. From there he moved to the United Kingdom in 1976 where he edited Africa Magazine owned by former Nigerian diplomat, the late Ralph Uwechue. From there he left to become the editor and a director of New African owned by the Algerian, Afif Ben Yadder. In 1980, he finally started his own Africa Now.

Here is a man who had an eventful career as one of the best editors of national newspapers in Nigeria. He was perhaps the country's best known international journalist and publisher. Considering his stature in the profession, journalists of my own generation couldn't have been privileged to work with and under Peter Enahoro.

In fact, we had no such right anymore because he had served and paid his dues as a journalist and editor in Nigeria long before our time. And here I was, as inexplicable circumstances of life would dictate it for me, a young journalist, just about two months from my 26th birthday, seated right in front of this larger-than-life and legendary editor and publisher. I was ready to work under Peter Enahoro in 1983. It was a rare privilege, and I am sure many reading this would understand why I was so overwhelmed and awed as I stepped into his office at Dilke House. I could see him radiating success. He was stylish and very flamboyant. Not only was he urbane but he was also very humble - a very nice man, indeed. He also loved playing his golf. He was the first Nigerian and the only African publisher I saw with a big cigar, driving a Rolls Royce in London. His Rolls carried a special number plate too: PEN121. It was a combination of the initials of his names and month and the day of his birth. We started our discussion on why I had to leave Concord. I explained the whole thing to him, just as I had done to Kaye Whiteman at West Africa.

He was very understanding and was amused by Chief Moshood Abiola's 'pettiness' to sack me himself, especially as there were no justifiable reasons. At that time in 1983, Peter Enahoro was still in self-exile and had been out of Nigeria for about 16 years. However, he was very conversant and up to date with the goings-on in the country. He still regularly wrote about Nigeria and the events taking place in Africa in his column in the monthly Africa Now. He told me that he needed an editor for the Nigeria desk at Africa Now and that he would offer me the job if I were willing to take it. Enahoro warned me though that Africa Now might not be able to offer me the same salary I was earning at Concord, but that they would not be too far from it if they could not match it.

I had no choice really. Of the three pan-African monthly newsmagazines in London at that time, with global circulation, Africa Now was the one with a true journalism giant like Enahoro as publisher in the industry. I thought it would be a great privilege for me to work with and for him. I grabbed the opportunity with both hands and accepted to be the General Editor of Africa Now. That appointment in 1983 was a major turning point in my career. First of all, it was a promotion.

It was my first Editor's job, and I got it just about two months from my 26th birthday. It was a transition I had to quickly get used to. I had switched from being a daily newspaper reporter dealing with breaking news to an editor for a pan-African newsmagazine with monthly frequency. This required special skills and a higher level of writing stories and news features in a way that would give them a long shelf life. On a more personal note, it was a great relief to my agony of sudden (albeit brief) period of joblessness. I got the job before our first child was born on 15 January 1984. Appropriately, we named our daughter Oluwatumininu, meaning 'The Lord comforts me.' The Yoruba have a tradition to look at the circumstances around the family at the time of a child's birth; this could dictate the type of name the newly born is given. Our names always connote a distinct meaning.

PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!

At Africa Now, I was in charge of reporting Nigeria. The magazine was, at that time, very widely read in Nigeria, Africa and throughout the world. It published Special Reports on Nigeria regularly. It didn't take me long to get used to the new environment and establish good relationships with other editors that I met there.

In fact, I chose John Gritten, the former Production Editor of Africa Now, as the first Managing Editor of Africa Today when I established it in 1995. I regularly travelled for Africa Now to Nigeria, which offered me the opportunity of making contact with and seeing some of my former colleagues and friends in Concord at its Lagos headquarters again. I worked very closely with Peter Enahoro. By the time I joined Africa Now, the magazine had established a very close relationship with the Shagari government in Nigeria.

Enahoro supported that democratically elected government so much that when it was toppled in January 1984, and General Muhammadu Buhari became Nigeria's Head of State, Enahoro refused to support that military government. He had had a picture of President Shagari hanging on the wall behind his desk at his London office, which he refused to pull down until democracy was restored in Nigeria.

In 1984 we were to publish our annual special report on Nigeria, and I was sent to the country to package it. Enahoro did not expect that General Buhari would grant us an exclusive interview that would normally go inside that special report. Enahoro had been very critical of Buhari.

The main reason was the way many politicians had been indiscriminately arrested and locked up indefinitely by the regime; those that were charged and tried in court were sentenced to ridiculously long years of imprisonment. I had to lean on Buhari's Chief Press Secretary, Wada Maida, who had been a friend and my colleague in London as London Correspondent of the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN), to get that Buhari interview done. They were all surprised when I reported back to London that we got the interview.

I even got the Finance Minister in that government, Dr. Onaolapo Soleye, to grant us an interview for the magazine which was also published in that special edition. The way we reported Nigeria was very important to Enahoro. He liked to go through all copies of Nigerian stories going into the magazine. It was okay by me because it made me eager to listen to his comments, especially on my stories.

I remember him telling me, after going through all the features going into that 1984 Special Report on Nigeria, that the article he enjoyed reading most was the one on the state of the Nigerian civil service, whose writer we could not reveal because he was an insider - a serving permanent secretary!

During my time working under Peter Enahoro at Africa Now I not only became better at writing - one cannot work under such a brilliant and elegant prose stylist, storyteller and wordsmith and not know how to write - but I was also able to learn more about Nigeria from him, most especially its political history and how the military became involved in its national life. Peter Enahoro is an encyclopaedia of Nigerian political history. It was always a pleasure just sitting down with him at his office when we were not under the pressure of deadlines, or busy with production, and listen to him regaling us with one story after another on political happenings and individual characters in Nigerian politics and government.

In all, it was a short but memorable time I spent at Africa Now - just a little over a year. I left in 1985 to join my friends and former Concord colleagues at the start of Newswatch magazine. I must say, that it was with great reluctance that I left Africa Now to join Dele Giwa and his colleagues at Newswatch. I remember bringing Dele Giwa to meet with Peter Enahoro at Africa Now while I was there. What a sight that was for me, bringing together two great journalists and editors who have undoubtedly made indelible imprints on Nigerian journalism. On the day I handed in my resignation letter, Peter called me at home later that night to persuade me not to leave. We had a long telephone conversation. Unfortunately, my mind was already made up. I had had a very strong relationship with Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed and Ray Ekpu at Concord. They had been good to me and Titilope, my wife. They were supportive of me throughout my time at the Concord, particularly during the period of my disagreement with Chief Abiola.

PETER ENAHORO (Peter Pan) TO THE RESCUE!

I saw an opportunity to reunite with them at Newswatch, which I wanted to take. I am eternally grateful to Peter Enahoro for coming to my aid during one of the most critical and trying moments in my career. He is by some distance the most experienced, and best editor and publisher I ever worked with. I will always appreciate him for rescuing me by giving me a job when Chief Abiola decided to throw the baby out with the bathwater.

*Peter Enahoro, aged 88, was born 21 January 1935. He died in London on Monday, 24 April 2023.

*Kayode Soyinka, is publisher of Africa Today. This Special Tribute is from his recent memoir: BORN INTO JOURNALISM - MEMOIR OF A NEWSPAPER REPORTER. The memoir is now available in Nigeria at Rovingheights Bookstore, Landmark Event Centre, Plot 2 and 3, Water Corporation Drive, Victoria Island Annex, Lagos. It is also available at Rovingheights Bookstore in Abuja.

Load-Date: April 27, 2023

---

End of Document

Stanley Macebuh: Unforgettable pathfinder of modern Nigerian journalism

The Guardian

February 9, 2023 Thursday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1000 words

Body

Dr. Stanley Nkwachikwelumamaya Macebuh was a rare breed in the freshest sense of the term, a charge of fine electricity who all on his own changed the face of journalism practice in Nigeria.

Stanley was at once a scholar, philosopher, cerebral journalist, informed commentator, mentor, liberal, technocrat, icon, legend, connoisseur, all rolled into one diminutive body of irresistible charisma.

As the founding Managing Director of the Guardian Newspapers, Stanley bequeathed on this country in word and deed "the Flagship of the Nigerian Press."

He died at age 67 by 4.15 in the morning on Sunday, March 7, 2010 at the National Hospital, Abuja. Born on December 28, 1942, the incredibly intelligent lad attended Government Primary School, Port Harcourt, where he broke all the academic records.

He took a scholarship to Ngwa High School, Aba, where he excelled at the very top of his class. He was then admitted for his Higher School Certificate at the esteemed Kings College, Lagos, where his intellect was the staple of legend. He even taught at Kings College, a prodigy.

Kings College legends such as Dr Yemi Ogunbiyi and the immortal "Motor-Park Economist" Ashikiwe-Adione-Egom can never tire of giving testimony of Stanley's good works.

Stanley took his prodigious intellect to the English department at the University of Ibadan from 1963 to 1966. He departed the shores of Nigeria in 1967, just before the outbreak of the civil war, to study at the University of Sussex in England.

It is a mark of his genius that he acquired his DPhil (Doctor of Philosophy degree) at the age of 26.

The University of California, Berkeley, California, USA then poached him as an in-house African philosopher during the Civil Rights Movement era in the US.

Stanley Macebuh: Unforgettable pathfinder of modern Nigerian journalism

It was Stanley's Doctoral Dissertation supervisor who recommended the wunderkind to the American authorities for him to join the UCLA Faculty at Berkeley, California.

He distinguished himself for two years at Berkeley before two other universities in America, Columbia University of New York and City College of New York, both engaged in a battle to have him on their faculties.

Both universities had to agree to share his multiform services! Stanley therefore set the record of lecturing in the two universities at the same time, and it was organized in such a way that he taught full-time at City College and part-time at the Institute of African Studies of Columbia University.

Stanley had risen to the post of a tenured Associate Professor of English in the US before he was invited by Patrick Dele Cole to return to Nigeria to breathe fresh air into the Daily Times newspaper as the Editorial Adviser. He brought along the legendary Dele Giwa, and Nigerian journalism would never be the same again.

Stanley initiated the policy of separating the Editorial Board as the think-tank of the newspaper from the reportorial regimen.

Back then, it was the feature writers that supplied the editorials more or less as afterthoughts.

When the politics in Daily Times got out of hand he left, only to later join forces with the financier Alex Ibru to found The Guardian, which he from the very beginning intended to be not just a great liberal newspaper but the "Flagship of Nigerian Journalism."

Stanley's audacious dream was to make The Guardian among the five best newspapers in the English-speaking world. Stanley was a man who cherished ideas, and he hired all makes of intellectuals who even disagreed with him ideologically. He believed in the sanctity of intellectual disputation.

The editorial board he set up was made up of Onwuchekwa Jemie, Sonala Olumhense, Femi Osofisan, Eddie Iroh, Sully Abu, Yemi Ogunbiyi, Chinweizu, Odia Ofeimun, Edwin Madunagu, Herbert Ekwe-Ekwe etc.

Stanley put his foot down that all opinion articles must come in within the 800-word ambit, stressing that anybody who could not make his argument within 800 words had not properly organized his thought in the first instance.

He also championed the cause of addressing everybody as "Simply Mister" against the Nigerian grain of addressing ill-assorted potentates as Chief, Prof, Dr, Engr., Rev. etc.

The labour of his ideas would eventually clash with the capital of the family that set up the newspaper. Stanley perforce had to leave The Guardian and tried his hands at business, but that was not his forte. He helped some financiers to set up Sentinel magazine and the Post Express newspaper but his lofty ideas could not gel with the owners. He was at the inception of democracy in 1999 appointed Senior Special Assistant (Special Duties) to former President Olusegun Obasanjo.

The gruff ways of Obasanjo could not have suited the urbane subtlety of Stanley. He later became the Deputy Chief of Staff to Obasanjo, but in the course of Obasanjo's second term in office he was in and out of the system.

Before his death, he was engaged as a consulting Editorial Adviser to Nduka Obaigbena's ThisDay. Stanley made his mark as an intellectual, publishing in 1973 a seminal study of the iconic African-American novelist and essayist, James Baldwin.

He is said to have worked for many years on another academic tome on Jewish-American studies, provisionally entitled "The Tyranny of Things".

His very close associates reveal that Stanley regretted until his death the non-completion and publishing of the book after he had written well over 400 pages.

Even so, his return to Nigeria in 1977 denied him of his ultimate ambition of getting employed at Harvard University and eventually retiring there as a Professor Emeritus.

Stanley Macebuh: Unforgettable pathfinder of modern Nigerian journalism

Stanley's life deserves all celebration, and he richly deserves the accolade of "Father of Modern Nigerian Journalism". An aesthete, he not only had a rich taste for fine stylistic writing but also had an abiding love for fine cognac. He is sorely missed by all fine minds. They no longer make legends like Dr. Stanley Macebuh.

In this article Stanley Nkwachikwelumamaya Macebuh

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 22, 2023

---

End of Document

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1313 words

Byline: David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of Newsservice, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

Dele Giwa

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiyu.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: June 26, 2021

---

End of Document

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1313 words

Byline: David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of Newsservice, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

Dele Giwa

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiyu.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: February 23, 2021

---

End of Document

Nyaknno Abasi Osso: The search engine before Google

The Nation (Nigeria)

August 27, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1406 words

Body

---

'Libraries store the energies that fuel imagination. They open up windows to the world and inspire us to explore and achieve and contribute to improving our quality of life. Libraries change lives for the better.' Sydney Sheldon

By Utibe Ukim

When I chose Mass Communications over Medicine, it was because I had been so impacted by the Nigerian Chronicle published by the Cross River State Newspaper Corporation Calabar, that hanging a stethoscope around my neck lost its appeal. My father loved it and through him, I got 'familiar' with names like Nelson Etukudo, Ray Ekpu, Martins Usenekong, Antigha Bassey, Clement Ebri, Etim Amin and Signor Tofu (pen name for Elder Onofiok Ufot, multi-talented father of advertising great, Udeme Ufot, who at the time, was registrar of the University of Calabar), all great writers of the time.

If that newspaper was great, it owed a lot to its library and the work of the man who started and ran it, Nyaknnoabasi Osso, Nigeria's leading documentation specialist, whose birthday we celebrate today.

Nyaknno is the founder of Biographical Legacy and Research Foundation's (BLERF). He served previously as Special Assistant on Liveary, Research and Documentation to President Olusegun Obasanjo and as the Chief Librarian at Newswatch where he published the ground-breaking Newswatch Who's Who, a definitive biographical documentation of distinguished Nigerian achievers in all walks of life. He has been a friend and mentor for most of my life.

Through the years, Nyaknno has invested his entire life and resources collecting, assembling and managing millions of books, journals, newspapers, magazine and documents in a way no other Nigerian has. His home and offices in Abuja are filled with rare historical resources and reference materials fit for national archives.

BLERF has grown out of his passion to document our past through the lives and biographies of millions of Nigerian achievers so we can take lesson into our future. In a country where only little value is given to proper record keeping and preservation of historical documents, and where public and private libraries have been closed and entire stock of reference materials sold to paper recyclers, Nyaknno's passion challenges us to rethink and take action to save what remains.

Nyaknno Abasi Osso: The search engine before Google

Tinubu tasks US on collaboration with democratic African States

The celebrated Olusegun Obasanjo Presidential Library in Abeokuta is his brain child. Twenty five years of his life and capacity are expressed in the beauty, content and rich treasures of that Centre. It was his major preoccupation from 1988-2013.

His current project, BLERF, is a world class news media research centre Nyaknno funds from his personal resources. It and boast a rich collections of more than two million books, journals, bound volumes of newspapers, magazines, clippings, rare photographs, CDs, flashes, hard-drives collected since 1971.

His dream for the centre is bigger than his purse which slows his speed at converting the idea to reality. BLERF's website( www.bleref.org) has close to 35,000 names, the largest collection of Nigerian achievers, worldwide. The target is to grow the list to one million within the next five years. Such an enormous documentation project will require partnership and CSR investments to bring to life. Without strong financial partnership, this will only remain a dream.

I must have met Nyaknno around 1982 and was immediately struck by his love for everything in print! I spent what seemed like eternity in his office, receiving scant attention as he read and marked pages after pages of various local, national and foreign publications heaped in front of him. He would throw a question at me with his trademark laughter while his head lay buried in his work. The traffic in and out of his office was heavy. I soon found out it was production time and many reporters, writers and editors needed his input for the next day's paper. I quickly figured it wasn't a glamorous job in the newspaper publishing ecosystem and wondered why this smart and intelligent young man chose such a career path.

Nyaknno's story is a one of discovering his passion early and pursuing it with resolute devotion. It's been a life of big dreams, lots of intellectual adventures, and an uncanny ability to strike the right connection at the right time. Call it, seizing the moment.

As an only child of parents who had buried seven children before him, childhood meant extreme protection. But when he saw other children playing in the school field across his home, he dressed up, joined them and earned himself a place in primary school. While the Bible and the Catholic Digest introduced him to serious reading in secondary school - where his love for history once made him to write out 72 pages at a school history examination- it was his first day at a gap job while awaiting admission to study medicine at the University of Ibadan that got him hooked on books.

When he left his village of Ete in Ikot Abasi local government area of present day Akwa Ibom State to join his uncle, the late Prof Jumbo Udo at the University of Ibadan, the plan was to enroll at the University of Ibadan College of Medicine. He wrote the exams and the gap job at the University Library was only to keep him busy. On his first day at work, he was chased home at midnight by the University Librarian. He had found his passion and nothing was going to stand in his way. That was in 1971. Out went Medicine to the protestation of his Uncle and family.

Throughout his life, providence has always positioned him in the path of opportunity. Media librarianship wasn't something he imagined when he left Ibadan to join the newly established University of Nigeria Calabar Campus. A chance meeting with Ray Ekpu at the Cross River State Library, Calabar did it for him. An introduction and candid opinion that Ray's writings could benefit from in-depth research earned Nyaknno the job of setting up and running the library at the Nigerian Chronicle. Ray would later introduce Nyaknno to Dele Giwa in 1980.

There's an interesting story about how Nyaknno joined Newswatch. Giwa in the company of the late Chief Ime Umanah had arrived his home at lunchtime one Sunday in July 1984. No pleasantries, just a simple instruction from the man he so admired. 'Get dressed immediately. We are going to Lagos to start a magazine called Newswatch.' A few hours later, the trio were on board a Nigerian Airways flight to Lagos. Newswatch found its engine room. Nyaknno got himself a playing field that came to define his career trajectory.

Nyaknno Abasi Osso: The search engine before Google

At Newswatch, Nyaknno built a rich library that powered the intense editorial requirement of the news weekly. If you ever read and loved any editorial work in the magazine, his fingerprints were all over them. When reporters and editors needed information on anything under the sun, they went to Nyaknno. He would deliver within minutes.

In those days without computers and internet, Nyaknno was the search engine that powered search, quality content and the award-winning journalism Newswatch came to be known for. How he did it so well can only be summed up in the inspiration he drew from a meeting and handshake with Neil Armstrong, the first man to walk on the moon: Lasting legacies are built by doing what no one else has done before!

I visited him at work and at home, a short walk from Newswatch, after my NYSC. I couldn't spot the difference. Every space at home was taken up by books, just like the office. It has remained that way till today no matter where he's lived. Sometime I imagine that family is the only intrusion he has permitted to share his affection for everything in print in the 52 years since he said yes to book!

Nyaknno has interned or visited hundreds of major libraries across the world. So you can understand the pains he feels when he speaks about the dearth of public libraries in Nigeria. He wants Nigeria to return to building public libraries to speed up the development of our young people. As Bill Gates puts it, 'investing in public libraries is an investment in the nation's future.'

It would be a fitting tribute to Nyaknno for governments, individuals and corporations to commit to funding public libraries and supporting laudable private initiatives like BLERF so they in turn can, like Sydney Sheldon said, inspire us to explore and achieve and improve our quality of our national life.

Utibe Ukim Journalist, writer and media entrepreneur

Load-Date: August 28, 2023

---

End of Document

Murder in the Consulate

The Nation (Nigeria)

March 2, 2021 Tuesday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1304 words

Body

---

Thanks to U.S. President Joe Biden, the world now knows conclusively the horrible fate that befell the dissident Saudi journalist Jamal Khashoggi at the Saudi Consulate in Istanbul, Turkey, on October 2, 2018.

Khashoggi was lured to the Consulate to pick up papers that would seal his divorce from his Saudi-born wife and clear the way for him to marry his Turkish fiancée. Life was about to take a more agreeable turn for the exiled journalist, a reporter and columnist for the Washington Post.

He headed to the Consulate that day, accompanied by his fiancée. The visit would be brief; she would wait outside, and they would return to their residence with a passport to their wedded future.

Hours passed by, and he did not come out of the Consulate. Alarmed, she alerted the Turkish authorities. Surveillance video showed a man wearing the clothes Khashoggi had on when he entered the Saudi Consulate. But the man was not Khashoggi.

Khashoggi did not show up that day, or the next, or the day after. It would turn out that he had set out on a one-way trip, a mission of no return.

What happened to Khashoggi?

Hours before he was due at the Consulate, a chartered flight from Riyadh, the Saudi capital, had landed at Ankara airport, in the Turkish capital. On board was a team of Saudi officials, including the chief security officer to the Saudi Crown Prince and de facto Saudi ruler, Mohammed bin Salman (MBS), whom the Western media had been lionizing as a modernizer and reformer. The Saudi king, in whose name he rules, has long been incapacitated by infirmity and superannuation.

An x-ray of their hand luggage revealed a curious collection of artifacts: a bone saw, and other accessories of, let us call it, macro surgery, to dignify the butcher's trade. With their diplomatic cover, they cleared security and headed to the Saudi Consulate.

Murder in the Consulate

Several hours later, they headed back to the airport and flew back to Riyadh in their chartered jet, mission accomplished, with no telltale fingerprints. Or so they thought.

But Turkish intelligence had videotaped the mission in all its bestial and blood-curdling detail. To advance his stature and his claim to being a major in Middle East politics, President Recep Tayyip Erdogan leaked the recording to some key members of the international community, including the United States.

If there ever was a smoking gun, this had to be the mother of all smoking guns.

It showed the men who had flown in from Riyadh early that day throttling Khashoggi, cutting off his fingers perhaps to prepare him for the main act, and then hacking him to pieces, leaving others to stuff the parts into sacks and clean up as best they could. A local contractor helped dispose of the grisly remains.

Consulate staff hurriedly put new coats of paint on the Embassy precincts, but tell-tale signs were still much in evidence when Turkish officials visited several days later to inspect the crime scene.

At first the Saudi authorities denied any involvement. 'The former guy,' as Biden called his execrable predecessor in a sublime putdown, echoed the Saudi authorities. He said he had spoken with the Saudi crown prince and that he had vehemently denied any involvement. The media must therefore not rush to judgment.

Later, indulging his predilection for saying one thing in a sentence and unsaying it in the very next, if not in the same sentence, the former guy said of the Saudi authorities that 'maybe they did and maybe they didn't.' He would go on to suggest that some 'rogue elements' might have carried out the killing.

In the face of iron-clad evidence, the Saudi authorities changed tacks. The killing, they said, had been carried out by some free-lance executioners acting entirely on their own without their knowledge and without their approval.

But the attentive audience knew that this was no freelance or impromptu outing. The gruesome operation had to have been approved from the very top. The team of murderers included the crown prince's chief security officer, personnel from his security detail, and top medical officers in public employment. The logistics could not have been perfected on a whim.

Pivoting on the narrative of the rogue assassins, the Saudi authorities rounded up 11 unnamed officials, among them, it is believed, some of those who had jetted to Ankara on that gruesome mission in October 2018, and put them on trial before a secret court in an effort to pin Khashoggi's murder entirely on them. Five of them were reportedly condemned to death.

The whole thing was a sham through and through, and Trump the former guy knew it. His intelligence officials had compiled for his benefit a detailed report of the murder. Nobody expected him to evince a sense of grief, much less outrage.

After all, while in office, he routinely called the American media and the working press 'enemies of the people,' except the section owned by Rupert Murdoch, especially its broadcast arm Fox News.

But some empathy, surely, was indicated for a beleaguered person who sought refuge in America the land of the free, contributed his skills and insights to an American institution over the years and wanted to be a part of the American experience?

Fat chance.

Trump does not do empathy. Reprisals against the Saudi authorities were also out of the question. Saudi Arabia was a staunch American ally and a proxy in its conflict with Iran, a friend of Israel, the world's largest oil-producing country, and a client in lucrative arms deals reportedly worth $100 billion. Why allow the killing of one journalist get in the way of such good business?

That, alas, is what passes for realpolitik-politics without sentiment.

Murder in the Consulate

Not even Jimmy Carter's White House, with its affirmation of human rights and humane values, would have made a calculation different from Trump's. In these matters, 'national interest' is what really counts. To those who define and are charged with protecting that interest, every other consideration is sentiment.

At the time of the Khashoggi murder, Democratic hopeful Biden, as he then was, had expressed outrage. He had vowed to make the Saudi authorities pariahs over the murder and their horrid human rights abuses. But President Biden is now less sure-footed.

To his credit, he declassified and released with minor redactions the intelligence report on the Khashoggi murder that the former guy had embargoed. That report implicates Saudi's crown prince unambiguously and takes the matter out of the realm of conjecture.

But as to practical consequences, Biden and 'the former guy' are on the same page, even if not in moral terms. Biden would pursue no direct sanctions that could place America's vital interests at risk.

If there is any consolation in this bestial matter, it is that the truth has finally been revealed.

There is a local angle to this tale.

For 36 years years, Nigeria's authorities have concealed the facts and the truth of the parcel-bomb murder of Dele Giwa, the crusading founding editor of the iconic newsmagazine Newswatch, in his home in Ikeja, Lagos.

A ranking police officer tasked with the investigation, my brother Herbert Tunde Dare, was murdered while pursuing the assignment with his accustomed doggedness.

Other investigators, sought to drown the matter in a tide of perjury, evasion, prevarication, and obfuscation. Besides the fact of the murder itself, they came up with nothing that can be called credible.

But nothing stays secret forever.

There may well be, lying in some dank official vault, a classified report on the investigations that official after succeeding official has sought to conceal, for reason of self-preservation or esprit de corps. There may well be a crucial witness who will conclude one day that he has nothing to lose by telling the world who killed Dele Giwa.

May the principal suspect and his collaborators live to witness that day.

Load-Date: March 3, 2021

---

End of Document

Chronicles of an uncommon journalist

The Nation (Nigeria)

November 16, 2022 Wednesday

Copyright 2022 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1043 words

Body

---

Book review

Title: Dotun Oyelade Reporting... (Memoirs of a Newshound)

Authors: Dotun Oyelade, Tola Teriba and Ayodeji Ajisope

Reviewer: Isaac Olawale Albert

Publisher: Aikon Integral Concept, Ibadan (2022)

Prince Dotun Oyelade, is a broadcast journalist, publisher and politician. But he restricted the coverage of his publication, Dotun Oyelade Reporting...(Memoirs of a Newshound), to the first two aspects of his life: journalism and publishing. He intends to write on his political life in the years to come but flagged some of his political landmarks in the work to include being Publicity Secretary to Alliance for Democracy in 1999 and Private Secretary to Governor Lam Adesina from 1999 to 2003. He was Special Adviser on Public Communications to Governor Alao Akala from 2007 to 2011 and was also Head of the media campaign team of Governor Seyi Makinde January 2018 to May, 2019.

The interesting publication is broken into five parts of 18 chapters. The first part consists of two chapters and these have to do with how Prince Oyelade cut his professional teeth in journalism by working at NTV. The first chapter ought to have chronologically been the third but the author made it the first invariably to teach some lessons to students of journalism education. Oyelade was in Akure in 1978 to report the visit of Olusegun Obasanjo. As he charged through the crowd with his microphone to get a scoop for his federal television channel he was bullied back by some unfriendly soldiers guiding the head of state. It took him some time to get out of the panic mode. This must have been included in the book to show that it is not easy for an early career journalist to get breaking stories as taught in the classroom; it involves unpredictable risks and embarrassments. It was actually in the second chapter that Oyelade narrated how he was employed by NTA in August 1977 under the leadership of Yemi Farouqui. His supervisors on the job included Bayo Sanda, Fabio Lanipekun and Biodun Adetuberu. In the news department, Oyelade worked with Segun Oyedele, Kunle Adeigbe and a host of others. He used colourful adjectives to describe the innovations brought to NTA by each of these personalities. He called attention to the suspect image of the journalist working under the military, the intrigues of reporting the 'Ali must go student protest', attempts to repress the media etc.

Part two of the book consists five chapters focusing on Oyelade's sojourn and exploits at the TSOS/BCOS. In chapter three, he told the story of how the amity between Governor Bola Ige and Dr. Yemi Farounbi led to the founding of TSOS and how the station was provided the best facilities and conditions of service for practising journalism. He listed all the people he worked with in the station but singled out Yanju Adegbite, who later became the Project Coordinator at BCOS from 2011 to 2019, as the first face to appear on TSOS TV. In Chapter 4, he called attention to a number of ground breaking reports he wrote for the station: the Lawrence Anini saga, trial of Gen. Mamman Vatsa, the Cocoa House inferno, the death of Awolowo and Dele Giwa; the inaugural AFRC meeting of the Babangida regime etc. In chapter 5 Oyelade called attention to how the corporate identity of BCOS changed when the NPN government of Chief Olunloyo came to power in October 1983 in Oyo. Chapter 7, is the shortest of the essays.

Part 3 consists of seven chapters and has to do with Oyelade's foray into publishing: another field in which he has made outstanding contributions. In chapter 8, he told the story of how it all started in February 1988 after interviewing Professor Ojetunji Aboyade, the former Vice Chancellor, University of Ife, now OAU, at the BCOS Studios. Within a month of this discussion Oyelade was hired to manage a publishing house jointly established by Professors Akin Mabogunje and Aboyade: Fountain Publication. Oyelade was with Fountain Publication for just a year; the owners were more engrossed in their academic activities. In chapter 9, Oyelade narrated how he had to move to Chief Joop Berkhout's Spectrum Books where several works were produced: including Emeka Ojukwu's Because I Am Involved. Chapter 10 has to do with how he left Spectrum Book in 1991 to register his own company, Current Publications.

: 2023: Experts urge journalists to set agenda for transformational leadership

Part 4 of the book consists of only one chapter (15th) and it is on the 'Current Studios and Publications': a broadcast commercial studio for video and audio recording and post-production.

Part 5 is on the man Dotun Oyelade. The rest of the chapter lists his achievement on the job: staff manpower development, staff welfare, motivation and reward system, execution of iconic projects, amendment to the corporation's edict with a view to identifying certain provisions inconsistent with modern day realities; reinstatement of officers wrongfully dismissed/retired; redeployment of staff of bcos from the mainstream of the civil service. Chapter 17 are people's perception of Prince Oyelade while the last chapter, the 18th contains tributes by his family members: wife and children.

The publication, Dotun Oyelade reporting...(Memoirs of a Newshound), is not an everyday autobiography but an innovative case note that has a lot of lessons for students of journalism studies. The publication describes Oyelade as a newshound. The term refers to an aggressive or energetic journalist with insightful and instructive attainments. He worked closely with several eminent politicians (Lam Adesina, Alao Akaka, and Seyi Makinde) but he said this has not made him a professional politician but a journalist in politics. In other words, the work under review is not an autobiography per se but an autobiography innovatively redefined. He prefaced each of the issues he raised with detailed historical background in a manner that makes the chapters instructive for students of history. I found this approach to academic writing to be very original and worthy of commendation.

Students of journalism studies have a lot to learn from the publication not only in terms of the exemplary way Prince Oyelade did his work but more importantly his writing skills which he excellently demonstrated here.

Load-Date: November 17, 2022

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1332 words

Byline: David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of Newsservice, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

Dele Giwa

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiyu.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/69/156142346887.jpg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/43/156713443228.jpeg>

Load-Date: September 8, 2020

---

End of Document

#EndSARS Protests: FG Asked To Probe TV Reporter's Death

Nigerian Tribune

November 6, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 623 words

Body

---

The Federal Government has been called upon to immediately conduct a transparent and independent investigation into the death of a reporter with Gboah TV, an online television channel, Mr Pelumi Onifade, who was reportedly arrested by officers attached to the Lagos State Task Force while covering the recent #EndSARS protests, and later found dead at a mortuary in Ikorodu Lagos, where his body was deposited.

A non-governmental organisation, Media Rights Agenda (MRA), made the call on Friday in a statement signed by its Communications Officer, Mr Idowu Adewale.

According to MRA, Onifade, 20, was covering the scene of a mob raid on a government facility at Oko-Oba in Agege Local Government area of Lagos State for his media organisation (Gboah TV), where he was serving as an intern when operatives of the task force stormed the scene and engaged people who attempted to loot palliatives at the Ministry of Agriculture store in the abattoir area of the state.

MRA noted that despite the fact that Onifade wore a jacket identifying him as a journalist, he was reportedly arrested and dragged away by men of the task force on October 24, 2020, and that his television station had issued a statement that the family and the media outfit he worked for had searched for him for days before they eventually discovered his body at the mortuary in Ikorodu. This is a distance of up to 20 kilometres apart.

The late Onifade, a second-year student of the Department of History at Tai Solarin University of Education(TASUED), Ijagun, Ogun State, was an intern with the television house.

Speaking on the issue, MRA's Programme Director, Mr Ayode Longe, said 'Mr Onifade's death is one too many and is particularly ironic as he was arrested while covering protests that had engulfed the country as a result of police brutality and extra-judicial killings.'

'This latest incident must not go un-investigated. The Federal Government must make every effort to establish the circumstances of his death, identify his killers and make them face the wrath of the law.'

Reminding the Federal Government of MAR's call on the occasion of the International Day to End Impunity for Crimes Against Journalists earlier this week for the establishment of mechanisms to combat impunity for attacks and violence against media workers in order to ensure accountability for such acts and discourage future attacks, Mr Longe said 'the killing of Onifade has given additional urgency to such a call.'

#EndSARS Protests: FG Asked To Probe TV Reporter's Death

He said in this day and age, no attack against any journalist, and certainly not the killing of a journalist, should go unpunished as such cases of impunity only breed more impunity.

Mr Longe reiterated that government should fulfil its international obligations by launching a serious and transparent investigation into all unresolved cases of murders of journalists since the 1986 assassination of the former Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine, Mr Dele Giwa, and several other journalists whose deaths have not been resolved, including the instant case of Mr Onifade.

He said MRA was not only standing with the Onifade family is demanding, among other things, that the police officer or officers who killed him must be identified and prosecuted and that pending a full investigation, the officer who led the squad that arrested the young journalist should be held responsible and if he is unable to provide a convincing account of what happened after they left the scene of the arrest and show that Mr Onifade left his custody alive, should be prosecuted for the killing.

He also called for substantial compensation to the Onifade family for the wrongful killing of their son and a public apology to the family by both the Lagos State Government and the state police command.

Load-Date: November 7, 2020

---

End of Document

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1313 words

Byline: David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of Newsservice, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

Dele Giwa

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiyu.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: March 24, 2021

---

End of Document

'How journalism became love of my life'

The Nation (Nigeria)

October 11, 2023 Wednesday

Copyright 2023 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 3698 words

Body

---

Apostle Bola Adewara is the Publisher of E-Life, a Christian digital magazine, committed to spreading the gospel. He spoke on his voyage in journalism and how his works are impacting lives. Excerpts:

What inspired you to become a journalist?

My romance with journalism started from home because my dad was a literature enthusiast. Under our bed was a giant box containing all manner of newspapers and magazines of the 1950s, 60s and 70s. Magazines like Flamingo, Drum, Trust, West African Pilot, Tribune, Nigerian Yearbook, etc. I was always visiting this box, reading those papers to know what had happened in Nigeria before I was born. My love for stories, writing and reading began from there. I still have so many of these publications with me till date in my library.

When I got to secondary school, because I had read far and wide, I have stories to tell. I formed the press club called Zee Press and the cartoon end, called Scorpion. We did so many writings, even with our poor English. When I gained admission to Kwara State College of Technology in 1982, I also started writing and pasting on the wall. After Kwara Tech, I was home one day when a brother noticed that I was always writing, and he gave me his portable typewriter to upgrade me from using the pen. Later, my dad bought a brand new one for me. All the things I was writing them, I took to the New Nigerian Newspapers. I remember meeting with the editor who encouraged me to come to the office once in a while and I kept at it. Later, another newspaper came in Kaduna called Today and there was also Reporter by Yar Adua. I always went to these offices until I got admitted to the University of Ife to study Philosophy/History combined.

One day, after my service years in Sokoto and returning to Lagos, I heard that my former lecturer, Dr. G.G Darah, was the Editorial Board Chairman of the Daily Times. I decided to pay homage to him and maybe he would give me some money to manage. I was unemployed and didn't know what to do with my life. On getting to Darah's office, he was glad to see me. He asked what I was doing. I told him I just finished my service year and was unemployed now. He stood up, held my hand, took me to the Newsroom of Daily Times, and handed me over to the deputy Editor, Toyin Makanjuola (TMack). The man took me to the sub desk headed by Abu Olanrewaju. These were the people who began to train me as a sub-editor. There, my journey as a journalist started professionally. So, the inspiration started from my background. You become what you feed yourself with.

'How journalism became love of my life'

What was journalism like when you started after graduation?

I noticed that journalism was a poor paying job. Very few journalists had cars. Virtually all the staff in Daily Times were on foot. Salary was so poor. But Dr. G.G Darah told me that I should not remain a sub editor that the beauty of journalism is in reporting, meeting people, seeing things happening. I can't forget that advice. Immediately, I began to think of what else to do, rather than reporting in office every afternoon as a sub editor to work on the reports brought by reporters. I met with Mr Saliu Haruna, editor of Evening Times and he encouraged me to start writing on the emerging home video industry. He gave me a full page called Video Link. The home video industry was just starting then, I found myself going to all film locations in Lagos. The industry started at Meiran, then moved to Iyesi. I was on location of all the major early home videos. I saw the industry from its infancy. I know the history, the personages and manifestations of the industry. I was the only journalist in Nigeria concentrating on the Home Video Industry in the very early 1990s. From Aje niyan mi, financed by an Igbo marketer, by Kenneth Nnebue NEK to Ti Oluwa Nile, Ayo Ni Mofe by Mainframe in Osodi, Lagos, Living in Bondage, to these modern times, I saw it all. I was also the first journalist to interview many of these artistes. Many of them were poorly paid then. They only survived on interest. Please give it to the Yoruba artistes for keeping the faith until the Igbo people came in with big money to change the face of the industry.

If journalism was poorly paid then, how could a young man like you opt for it?

Just like the theatre industry, journalism also had a great challenge. Few papers were paying well then. Observer in Benin, Statesman in Enugu, Standard in Jos, New Nigeria in Kaduna, Tribune and Sketch in Ibadan, Herald in Ilorin, Chronicle in Port Harcourt, Triumph in Kano, many, if not all of them were owned by their state governments except Tribune by Chief Obafemi Awolowo.

Chief MKO Abiola started Concord newspapers in 1980 to build his political career and challenge the dominance of Tribune in the West, and by the end of 1983, Concord had become the most read newspaper in Nigeria. Abiola brought his money into the organisation and his early editors like Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed, etc. became the first journalists in Nigeria to ride in Mercedes Benz. Guardian came as an elitist broadsheet on 22 February 1983 through Stanley Macebuh, Femi Kusa, Lade Bonuola, etc. It was financed by Alex Ibru. Vanguard came the following year in 1984 by journalist Sam Amuka-Pemu. Newswatch magazine came on 28 January 1985, after Dele Giwa and co had issues with MKO Abiola. These new publications tried to change the face of the media in Nigeria while Daily Times remained a training ground for them.

Later, it was clear to me that there was no future in Daily Times. When people like Innocent Oparadike, Peter Enahoro, etc were appointed as the MDs of the organisation, it was clear to me that Daily Times was dying very fast. By 1998, many people were leaving the sinking ship. I was a young man, not ready to sink with it. I left for Vanguard in 1998, where the Sunday Editor, Fola Arogundade, a great man gave me an opportunity to write for the Sunday edition. From there to Sunday Post Express where Muyiwa Akintunde, the editor also gave me opportunities to work with him briefly. It was after that the God gave me the idea of Elife, when I was a member of KICC, Mende Maryland Lagos under the pastor who taught me purpose, Wale Adefuye.

What did you intend to achieve with Elife? How far have you gone with it?

Elife came at the worst moment of my life. When I left Post Express as a stringer, I got a job with a woman in Opebi Road, Ikeja. She was to produce a magazine called Meru, which according to her was to explain traditional healing, traditional medicine and exalt tradition institutions in Africa. With this woman, I started interviewing the babalawo, native healers, and chiefs, mention them. The woman would sit we staff under a tree in the afternoon, talking about energy all the time. She was driving us into Ifa worshipping gradually. The editor then was Dele Omojuigbe. Thank God that he was a sound Christian who had the power of discernment, even as at that time. I believed Dele's spiritual frequency jammed with the traditional frequency of the woman who was a chief in so many Yoruba towns. But at the end, Dele survived the challenge and left the organisation. It was a lesson for me and I also left not long after. The bigger lesson for me was the need to know Christ and that took me to KICC where I came under the influence of Wale Adefuye, the Lagos Pastor of the church. It was through him I heard a sermon by Pastor Matthew Ashimolowo on Define your Future. That sermon made me to leave paid salary and think of what to do with my life.

'How journalism became love of my life'

That sermon showed me that God has blessed every man with a gift which we should discover and run with. I found out that my gift is the ability to speak and write. So, I decided to invest this in a gospel publication which came as Elife.

Can you share a memorable experience from your career that had a significant impact on you?

There were many, like my encounter with Professor Peller. But the most memorable was the day Oba Funsho Adeolu, (Chief Eleyinmi in Village headmaster) the late Sataloye of Ode Remo drove me out of his palace because I was a journalist. I had gone to his palace one morning to have an interview with him. One by one, his chiefs came, and they began talking about another Oba who messed up. I was seated opposite him, not paying any physical attention to their discussions. I had a music player and an earpiece in my bag. I brought out the earpiece to put in my ears. Immediately Kabiyesi saw me, he shouted at me: 'Bola! Bola! Ki lo fe se yen? (what are you doing) O fe record oro wa? (You want to record our discussions?) Get out of here immediately. He shouted at me angrily.

I wanted to show him that it was a music player, not a recorder. But he was just angry and sent me out before everyone. I went out and left the palace. I walked to the street to get public transport out of the town. I was still waiting when someone ran after me and said Kabiyesi wanted to see me. I tried to refuse to go back. But realising I could be courting bigger trouble, I returned with the guy.

Getting to his palace, Kabiyesi apologised, saying he thought I wanted to record their discussion and gave me the training I wouldn't forget. He said being a journalist himself, he would have silently listened to what he and his chiefs were discussing and gone to publish.

That was what he thought I was doing. I shouldn't have brought out my recorder when I did. I should have just recorded it in my memory and downloaded it when I got to the office. Journalists, he added, should have sharp and retentive memories to record issues as they unfold without alerting people around. Learn how to eavesdrop on the conversations of some top people. You will need these facts someday. It was a lesson I will never forget. Don't alert anyone that you are a journalist. As the situation warrants, record all events in your memory!

What do you find most rewarding about your work as a journalist?

I have thought about this recently and these are my findings: being a journalist can be a highly rewarding and impactful profession. I have been able to play a crucial role in informing the public about current events, issues, and developments, helping people stay aware and educated about their surroundings. A journalist is a chronicler of history. It has assisted me to give voice to the voiceless, to amplify the voices of marginalised people, less privilege, bringing attention to social injustices and giving a platform to those who might otherwise go unheard. Journalism is constantly learning about new topics, industries, and people. Access is another benefit I got. I have been able to build connections with people I never imagined I would meet, interact with a diverse range of people, including experts, Church and industry leaders, and everyday individuals. Journalism has assisted me to hone my communication skills, both written and verbal. I have learned how to convey complex information in a clear, concise, and compelling manner. Travel opportunities is another.

Are there any stories or issues you are particularly passionate about covering?

I like to call it gospel journalism, after all, there are finance journalists, environmental journalists, economic journalists, judicial reporters, etc. I see myself as a journalist of the gospel. Being a gospel journalist, specifically one who reports on Christian matters, comes with unique benefits and opportunities that are aligned with the focus on faith-based content. Reporting on topics related to faith, spirituality, and positive stories within religious communities can provide a deep sense of spiritual fulfillment and purpose, especially in a country like Nigeria where people are sensitive along religious lines. Gospel journalism gives the opportunity to promote positive values such as love, compassion, forgiveness, and understanding, contributing to a more harmonious society. It inspires and uplifts readers and viewers, providing them with stories of hope, faith, and resilience. Such stories can motivate others to overcome challenges and strengthen their beliefs. Gospel journalism educates our audience about religious traditions, beliefs, and practices, fostering understanding and tolerance among people from different faiths.

'How journalism became love of my life'

backgrounds. It assists in promoting peace, contributing to personal growth, telling impactful stories that touch lives and shape destinies.

How do you keep up with the evolving media landscape and changing technologies in your field?

It's difficult when you don't really love this job. Journalism is not about the cash or wealth you can make from it. It's about the interest thereof. However, it will get to a stage where you will have to face the reality of life, the reality that interest will not put food on the table. Reality that you will have to pay school fees, maintain your family and pick your responsibilities at home and in the society. At that level, you must be proactive and evolve ways to survive.

For me, I delved into writing on a bigger scale; writing my own books, promoting and selling them, writing speeches for people, writing books on and for institutions and personalities, writing biographies, doing book projects, etc. I am also a web master, a job that brought me into another area of life, introduced me to another level of clientele. I told you earlier that I know my areas of gifting are writing and speaking. I soon found public speaking as another medium of expression. All I was writing on mentoring in newspapers and E-life magazine soon became what I began to speak on. You need to have good friends, men who will inspire you as friends. I have a couple of them around me who were always on me to start speaking rather than just writing. This is the genesis of Mentoring masterclass.

You veered into internet publishing long before many news media embraced the platform. How was it in those early years...

Those days, there was nothing like websites. If there was, it was not popular, and no newspaper was on the Internet. When the idea of E-life was being conceptualised between 2000 and 2004, I thought until I got the physical cash of N5 million before I could start. I had no business idea or experience. Yet, I wanted to create a magazine. I remember I made a proposal to Mrs. Connie Madubuko, now late. Connie was to assist me with about 250k, but in my ignorance, I told her I needed 5 million, and if she couldn't give that, I was ready to go away. That was when I met a friend, Lekan Otufodurin, who suggested doing E-life on the Internet. I returned home for more research, and I got to know of Success Digest, published by Sunny Ojeagbase. I learned I needed to have a computer and learn how to design websites. I went for training here and there, and I hit the Internet with E-life. It came with a bang, but no money was made publishing it. What became my cash cow was building websites for Churches and several organisations.

Because no newspaper was on the Internet, I was not encouraged to publish E-life. I never took it seriously because churches were running away from the Internet because of the initial scams and shenanigans that came with online publishing. It often amazes me now how churches bombard the Internet with their content. In those days, sites like www.god.com, www.jesus.com, www.bible.com were controlled by pornographers, pedophiles, and criminals. They woke up before the Church. I was active online, populating the Internet with various pro-gospel websites like nigeriansermons.com, nigerianchurchdirectory.com, nigeriagospelmusic.com, xtphotos.com, etc. I built over 250 websites for Churches locally and internationally. We thank God that Churches are doing well on the Internet today. All this experience I compiled in my first book, Become an Internet Evangelist.

You have authored several books. Could you tell us about some of them and how they have been impacting positively on lives of Christians?

The happiest day of my life was when I released my first book, 'Become an Internet Evangelist'. As a bibliophile person, I mean a lover of books, I had prayed that just as I collect other people's books and keep them in my library, others too would collect my books and keep them in their libraries. As books written by others impact my life, so would my books also influence others.

Being active on the Internet as early as the year 2000, I noticed that pornographers, paedophiles, etc. were also very busy online. It made many Churches run away from the Internet. So, the book was to narrate my experience and encourage the Church that the best way to respond to the shenanigans online was not to abandon the Internet but to flood it with gospel contents. All we need is to know how to go about it. The following books, 'Diary of an Angry Christian', 'Message to the Ignorant Church', and 'MARRIAGE: 40 Things You Should Know', are the collections of my posts on social media, especially those of them that went viral. The most successful of my books is Discover the Secrets of Mentoring, which sold over 15,000 copies online. To date, it's still selling. Mentoring is a thing we hardly do in this part of the world. Some people mention mentorship but scarcely know what it's all about. The book is an excellent piece of lectures on the topic. There are three others, 'Unprofitable Relationship', a compilation of 50 relationship questions people sent to me at various times as an online counsellor. The Lord told me to compile them, give answers to them and make a book of it so that people can learn from the mistakes of others. 'Truths You Won't Hear On Sunday Service' is a compilation of thoughts, explanations and truths many preachers would not ordinarily touch on Sunday service. Sunday service is more of a celebration day, which is why the weekly Bible Study period is often called Digging Deep. The book is digging deep for Christians. Beyond Ignorance, another form of digging deep, answers 50 controversial questions in the Church. Those are the questions we ask daily and have yet to find satisfactory answers to.

'How journalism became love of my life'

Steve Osuji: Lament for death of integrity in journalism

You are a teacher, an Apostle, journalist and a writer. Which of these do you want to be primarily known for?

It is difficult to say which one I prefer. But, certainly, I wouldn't say I like the pastor thing because apostles, pastors, evangelists, prophets, etc., are not titles. These are offices. Now, in Nigeria, the chase for titles has made people start calling themselves Pilot XYZ, Barrister XYZ, Surveyor XYZ, Town Planner XYZ. Nigerians have turned them into titles because of our craze for vanities and prestige. More so, I don't like the pastor or bishop things because it tends to put you on the spot. Once people hear you are a pastor, they tend to watch out for faults. Others want to test your patience. Pastors are human beings. Let them breath. Stop putting them on the spot. While I am not ashamed of the gospel, I don't like the titles. You don't need to see titles before you know I am a Christian.

When you are not writing books or preaching and teaching, what else do you do? How do you relax?

It's difficult to say I have other hobbies than reading and writing. Fortunately or unfortunately, I have a sound library in my home stocked with all the materials and gadgets I need for writing, printing and broadcasting Mentoring Masterclass, a program I run on YouTube. When I wake up in the middle of the night, I move to the library to relax. What is that relaxation? To write, read. However, I thank God that long ago, I bought many musical instruments like saxophone, viola, piano, and box guitar. I have it all in my home because I made sure all my children learn to play an instrument. I also play the saxophone very well. Perhaps, that, and chatting with my wife, is the only hobby outside the book thing.

What would you say is your vision for your ministries in the next five years?

I have a programme called E-life Mentoring Masterclass currently running on YouTube. I am working hard to do more speaking in the years to come. I discovered that there are so many liars and wrong preachers in our society teaching the wrong things, which is why there are so many miseries around. I have a 100-course outline on Mentoring Masterclass, which I want to invest the rest of my life. Our people must be mentored. The younger generation must change their perceptions so that Nigeria and Africa can change. Our people want a changed Nigeria but are not ready to change themselves. The change must start with us. My vision as a gospel journalist is to invest the rest of my life into Mentoring Masterclass so we can see a better Nigeria, a better Africa!

How do you see the reading culture of young Christians, especially in this age of technology?

I keep telling people that thinking people don't read again is invalid. Don't they read on social media? The issue is that writers should learn how to catch their desires. Writers should meet them where they are and know how to lure them into reading our works. More so, there is no union or association of writers again. Have you seen Christian writers or authors coming together? We are just on our own. There are so many things the Church can learn from the world. We should learn how to give freebies, organise local and international seminars, workshops, and book fairs, and how the Church leaders can help promote our books in our Churches. People do read. We are not harvesting them the way they are.

Would you say that Christian parents encourage their children sufficiently to imbibe the culture of reading?

'How journalism became love of my life'

Sadly, reading is a personal thing. It's a hobby you consciously pick once you know what you benefit from it. Most parents are not setting good examples in most ramifications of life. In many homes, the father is on social media. The mother is on the phone, and the children are on the phone. Also, schools have started giving assignments that push children to be on the phone 247. This phone culture will not kill us. It has gotten so bad now that many old writers are not writing again. Christians who should put down their experiences in book form would say no one would read. We are sitting on a time bomb of gradual ignorance and illiteracy!

Load-Date: October 12, 2023

---

End of Document

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1313 words

Byline: David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of Newsservice, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

Dele Giwa

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiyu.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: May 26, 2021

---

End of Document

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1313 words

Byline: David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of Newsservice, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

Dele Giwa

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiyu.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: April 25, 2021

---

End of Document

Protecting the battered rights of murder victims

The Guardian

September 19, 2023 Tuesday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1361 words

Byline: Editorial Board

Body

---

Enactment of a law to protect the rights of victims of murder, as advocated recently by the family of the late former Head of State, General Murtala Mohammed, is critical to building a just, peaceful and egalitarian society. When families of victims are unable to get justice for the unjustifiable killing of their loved ones, and bottle up their anger against the state, it has dire consequences for the society. Sadly, this country is replete with too many instances of unresolved murder where the unlawful killers are not found or are not prosecuted, thus free from answering for their criminal deed. Such situations, as lamented by the late Mohammed family, violate the rights of murder victims.

Family of the late military ruler, Murtala Mohammed, made the call recently at the 30th remembrance in Lagos of their son and brother, 27-year-old Zakari Mohammed, a graduate of Finance from the University of Canterbury, Kent, who was shot dead in Abuja on August 13, 1993. Dr. Aisha Mohammed-Oyebode, who made the position of the family known, expressed disgust at the way murder trials are being handled in Nigeria. "Precisely 30 years ago, the life of our cherished brother was cut short. Though the perpetrators were positively identified, all efforts to prosecute the case failed during the preliminary investigation and arraignment phase."

According to her, the entire procedure was shrouded in confusion, and the ultimate conclusion was a glaring miscarriage of justice. To put a stop to similar developments in the future, the Murtala family craved enactment of a legislation that protects the rights of victims throughout the complex corridors of the criminal justice system and reflects the spirit of the nation, noting that on a global scale, victims' rights are recognised as an essential component of human rights.

Murder, which is simply the unlawful premeditated killing of one human being by another, has been committed by many criminally-minded people on their fellow human beings for a myriad of reasons. Countries or societies, including Nigeria, believe in the sanctity of human life, and try to preserve the same through their laws. The 1999 Constitution of the Federal Republic of Nigeria (as amended), under Fundamental Rights, states that, "Every person has a right to life, and no one shall be deprived intentionally of his life, save in execution of the sentence of a court in respect of a criminal offence of which he has been found guilty in Nigeria."

Protecting the battered rights of murder victims

Despite this constitutional provision, murder is still perpetrated for political, economic, religious and other reasons in the country. From time to time, people, including prominent citizens, are killed for unknown reasons and their families thrown into perpetual sorrow while the killers walk about freely on the streets without being brought to justice due, most times, to inefficiency and complicity of the law enforcement agencies as well as unduly long period of prosecution that ends up undermining the cases. In other climes, murder cases are treated swiftly and diligently, as security agencies in those nations swing into action to arrest, investigate and prosecute the masterminds and appropriately punish those found guilty. In Nigeria, the police frequently disappoint by the shoddy way they investigate and prosecute murder cases that get the culprits eventually freed even when culprits confess to the crime. The situation has consequences for the society as families of the victims of unlawful killings remain in everlasting anguish and their demands for justice are never assuaged.

Too many murder cases in Nigeria have remained unresolved. They include high profile cases such as that of former governor of old Oyo State, Chief Bola Ige, who was killed in December 2001 while serving the nation as attorney general of the federation and minister of justice; prominent journalist, Mr. Dele Giwa, who was murdered by a parcel bomb in his Lagos home in October 1986; pro-democracy activist, Kudirat Abiola, wife of the presumed winner of the annulled 1993 presidential election, Chief M.K.O Abiola, who was killed in 1996 while her husband was in detention for his struggle to regain his mandate; Funso Williams, a PDP governorship aspirant in Lagos State who was murdered at his home in Dolphin Estate, Ikoyi; Aminosoari Dikibo, a chieftain of the Peoples Democratic Party in the South-South. There were also the cases of a deaconess of the Divine Touch Parish of the Redeemed Christian Church of God and mother of seven, Eunice Olawale, who was murdered in July 2016 while evangelising between 5:a.m. and 5:30 a.m. in her neighbourhood in Abuja; former Chief of Defence Staff, Air Marshal Alex Badeh, who was murdered in December 2018 while returning from his farm, and was the only person killed out of the three occupants of the vehicle taking them; National Vice-Chairman of the defunct All Nigeria Peoples Party (ANPP) and Muhammadu Buhari's presidential campaign coordinator in 2003, Marshall Harry who was brutally murdered in his Abuja residence before the 2003 presidential election, and Otunba Dipo Dina, the 2007 Action Congress (AC) governorship candidate in Ogun State, who was assassinated in January 2010 in Ota area of the state.

Although these cases hit the limelight because of the huge political status of the victims, they actually constitute a tiny fraction of unsolved murders across the country. More than 10 years ago, a young pregnant woman, Amina Ogunbadejo was brutally killed, along with her unborn baby, by an assailant who disappeared into thin air afterwards. Even though the victim, before she died, identified and named him as a neighbour who was owing her a paltry sum of money, the police neither traced nor brought him to justice, obviously due to their inefficiency. It is worrisome that till today, the families of the victims continue to suffer the trauma of their sudden deaths.

The dead person may be gone and not able to reveal or fight the killers, but the failure to resolve the murder has serious effects on the family and the society. Family members of murdered individuals are always at the risk of suffering prolonged depression, anxiety and post-traumatic stress disorder. The fear and uncertainty that come with unresolved murder can also have lasting effects on the mental and emotional wellbeing of the relatives. The family of an assassinated person often experience a feeling of injustice when they perceive that the killers of their loved ones are getting or have gotten away with the heinous crime and the loss of life is not receiving the desired attention. The family and friends of the deceased become frustrated, and citizens lose respect in the criminal justice system. The trending issue of Ilerioluwa Aloba, also known as Mohbad remains a source of concern for the music community, especially as there are threats of protests and civil disobedience.

The society, represented by the government that makes it a grievous crime for a person to unlawfully terminate the life of another person has a responsibility to ensure that the victim gets justice when the crime is committed against him. Where the criminal justice system often fails to bring closure to cases of murder, families of the victims are tempted into taking the law into their hands by going after the perceived or suspected killers, a situation that may result in recurring assassinations. For peace and justice to reign, the law enforcement agencies, particularly the police, must handle murder cases with the seriousness they deserve, without bias and in a way that justice will be seen to be served.

In this article

Late General Murtala Mohammed

Rights of murder victims

Related

CNPP tasks Jonathan on Uwais report, presidential race

9 May 2010

Former President Jonathan remains my son (3)

4 Nov 2015

Was 1966 handover, or takeover?

12 Jan 2016

RISQUA: My Father Was Selfless, He Never Owned A House

14 Feb 2016

ABDULMALIQ: Murtala Was A Detribalised Nigerian

13 Feb 2016

Crisis in Osun State: Is handing over of schools to original owners a better option?

26 Jun 2016

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: September 19, 2023

---

End of Document

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1389 words

Byline: Tokunbo David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Eric Osagie "We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard" - Voltaire
The man we are celebrating here today died at [...]

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of NewsService, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

<figure><figcaption>Dele Giwa</figcaption></figure>

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiq.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/69/154018470978.jpg>

Load-Date: December 3, 2018

---

End of Document

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 22, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1323 words

Byline: David

Body

---

Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price.

Eric Osagie

"We have a natural right to make use of our pens as of our tongue, at our peril, risk and hazard"

- Voltaire

The man we are celebrating here today died at the age of 39. Most of us have since crossed that age. He was exposed to danger and had no protection for the job he did. Dele Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986. History records the cause of his death as 'letter bomb'.

Since his death 32 years ago, several other journalists have either been maimed or killed, for just one ground – the same reason for which Dele Giwa met his end via a letter bomb. Materials published following his death, from accounts of Kayode Soyinka, who was the last man with him when his death came, point to the fact that the letter bomb came from government quarters. Several other accounts also corroborate this. Sadly, no one has been held to account for his death or even for delivering the letter bomb, even when leads had been given.

READ ALSO: Turkey expects results of Saudi Journalist, Khashoggi, probe 'soon'

Despite the fact that his death via letter bomb came with some shock and disbelief, many had thought that the unfortunate incident would signal an end to the murder of journalists. But that turned out a wishful thinking. Several accounts abound in the shelves of many libraries and websites, depicting scores of journalists that have been killed in Nigeria after Dele Giwa. For instance, New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) listed some of

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

the names as Enenche Akogwu (Channels TV), who was killed in Kano on January 20, 2012; Zakariya Isa of Nigeria Television Authority, who met his end on October 22, 2011, in Maiduguri; Sunday Gyang Bwede of The Light Bearer, who was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos, Plateau State; Nathan S. Dabak equally of The Light Bearer, who also was killed on April 24, 2010, in Jos; Bayo Ohu of The Guardian, who was shot at and killed in cold blood on September 20, 2009, in Lagos; Samson Boyi of The Scope, who was killed on November 5, 1999, in Adamawa State; Sam Nimfa-Jan, who, until he was killed on May 27, 1999, in Kafanchan, Kaduna State, worked for The Detail; Fidelis Ikwuebe, who worked as a freelancer and was murdered on April 18, 1999, in Anambra State; Okezie Amaruben of Newsservice, who met his end on September 2, 1998, in Enugu State; and Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian, who was killed in Abeokuta, Ogun State, on February 26, 1998.

There is also Ikechukwu Udendu of Anambra News, who was killed on January 12, 2013, in Anambra State; Nansok Sallah of Highland FM, who had life snuffed out of him on January 18, 2012, in Jos, Plateau State; Edo Sule Ugbagwu of The Nation, who was shot at and killed in his house

in Shasha area of Lagos State on April 24, 2010; Ephraim Audu of Nasarawa State Broadcasting Service, who was murdered on October 16, 2008, in Lafia, Nasarawa State; Paul Abayomi Ogundesi of ThisDay, he was killed in Dopemu area of Lagos State on August 16, 2008.

Have we forgotten ThisDay's Godwin Agbroko, who was killed on December 22, 2006, in Lagos? Have we forgotten Bolade Fasasi of the National Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ), who was murdered on March 31, 1999, in Ibadan, Oyo State, or Chinedu Offoaro of The Guardian whose sad and painful end came on May 1, 1996, in Lagos? How about Baguda Kaltho of TheNEWS, who 'disappeared' on March 1, 1996, in Kaduna? We are still looking for him though the Lagos

State government has long named its press centre in Alausa after him.

I guess these names don't bore you. We shall keep remembering them as sad pointers to a past where impunity reigned and where courageous pens were silenced with bullets, not superior arguments.

Statistics also have it that 110 journalists were killed worldwide in 2015 alone. This was contained in the reports of Reporters Without Borders (RSF) in its annual report of 2016. Of this number, 67 were killed in supposedly peaceful countries, while the rest were killed in war zones. Thirty-One were killed between January and September of 2016 in Libya, Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Brazil, Ukraine, Syria, Mexico, Turkey and Afghanistan.

The report also highlighted the plight of 54 journalists, who were held hostage at the end of 2015. It said 26 of them were in Syria, while 153 journalists were in prison with 23 of them in China and 22 in Egypt.

Syria, Yemen, Libya, Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Mexico, India, Brazil, Ukraine and Guinea were also listed by CPJ as most dangerous countries for journalists in 2016. Nigeria made the list in 2003, but no longer.

READ ALSO: UN says journalists still face difficulties in Somalia in spite of progress

A further breakdown of available statistics showed the beats covered by victims of fatal attacks. According to CPJ, Business beat constitutes 6 percent; Corruption, 23 percent; Crime, 23 percent; Culture, 13 percent; Human Rights, 16 percent; Politics, 42 percent; Sports, 6 percent; and War, 68 percent. These statistics are self-explanatory. It shows exactly why violence against journalists is high in some countries. The CPJ analysis also showed the types of deaths suffered by journalists. It put deaths from crossfire/combat as constituting 42 percent, deaths from planned assassinations at 45 percent, and deaths from dangerous assignments at 10 percent. You can now say where Dele Giwa's unfortunate murder falls in and why.

Dele Giwa

From the statistics above, Dele Giwa was murdered for standing up to the lies and impunity of the ruling class. He paid the ultimate price. Sadly, the issues for which his life was brutally cut short are still with us. That means many more journalists may have to also pay the ultimate price, if our society will know the truth and follow it.

Giwa, Death, and Journalism

With the advent of new media, the threat has increased. There has been a rising wave of threats to, and at times, outright arrest, imprisonment or prosecution of online media proponents and bloggers. The first time this trend reared its head was in Bauchi State, when a civil servant who criticised his governor over Facebook was arrested and detained.

The trend grew and reached alarming proportions not too long ago when some bloggers were arrested and detained at Ikoyi Prison in Lagos for publishing materials that those who were offended frowned at. The most recent was the arrest of the publisher of abusidiyu.com, Mr. Sidiq Usman, for what was termed "cyberstalking."

However, violence against journalists is a trend that should worry you and me. The reason government is scared is because of its rising profile of impunity. Governments at all levels in Nigeria have operated in a manner that suggests antagonism to media. And the reason is simple – corruption.

The first victim of a corrupt society, where impunity has replaced order, is the free press. I have not seen any corrupt government, which is at home with the free press.

The man we remember today died 32 years ago. If he were to take a peep into the profession he exited so sadly, can we guess what he would say of safety of journalists in Nigeria over 30 years after? Dele Giwa was a great man. He had a lion heart. He was strong-willed and I am sure he wanted the best for his society and that was the reason he went beyond press statements to dig into stories that caused some people sleepless nights. His life is, therefore, a challenge to us all to work for the type of journalism that delivers for the media organisation, the society and the journalists as well.

READ ALSO: Police urge journalists to protect national security

---

Note: This piece, reviewed, was delivered on October 19, 2016, at the Dele Giwa's remembrance anniversary organised by Lagos Council of the NUJ and Dele Giwa Foundation

The post Giwa, Death, and Journalism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/43/160845553424.jpeg>

Load-Date: December 20, 2020

---

End of Document

70 years of Ojeagbaseism

The Sun (Nigeria)

January 2, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1228 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Hallelujah!!! Let me start by giving thanks and all the glories to our Father. A Father like no father. He who created us and gave us life in abundance. He who preserved us all through this journey of life. He who shielded us from the snares of death and from the great pandemic that disrupted the world in 2020 and took away lives too many to count. Beloved, let me wish you a truly happy New Year.

Look at your neighbour eye ball to eye ball. Shake hands and say: "Congratulations for surviving 2020, the dreadful year of Covid-19. In 2021, we shall sing Redemption Song."

Today's column is for my friend and brother Dr. Emmanuel-Sunny Ojeagbase who clocked 70 on December 31, 2020. As I write this column, plans are on the way to organize a 70th birthday ZOOM party for him. I cannot wait to write this piece after the birthday party. To meet the deadline for this column, I just have to go with what I have. In this age of advanced technology, I sent Dr. Ojeagbase a birthday greetings on WhatsApp: "To God be the glory. Happy 70th birthday to a great man of God and a great man of Journalism. I rejoice with you on reaching this landmark age. My prayer is that you will see more and more years in good health and prosperity. You are a survivor because the Lord is in your corner. Continually, you will be a winner to the glory of He who sent you. Happy birthday."

He replied: "Thank you, my brother, Mike. Thank you for ALWAYS being there. I thank GOD for letting our paths cross. May GOD continue to bless you and your wonderful family every day of your life. Love you!"

So, how did our paths cross such that we became "neighbours" sharing the upper floors of two three-bedroom flats in Egbedore area of Lagos, in those days of humble beginnings? It's a long story which started from Kaduna where I was the Chief Correspondent of Chief MKO Abiola's Concord newspaper group and I wrote for the legendary editor of the then Sunday Concord the late Dele Giwa compelling articles which dazzled him, such that he created for me

70 years of Ojeagbaseism

a column called "Reporter's Notebook" where I started as a columnist. Then for Sunny Ojeagbase who was the Sports Editor of Sunday Concord, I also wrote a piece on Diego Maradona that impressed him and got it published. From Kaduna, Dele Giwa arranged my being brought down to Lagos to work directly under him. There I became close to Ojeagbase living next to each along Akowonjo Road, Egbeda. From Concord, he moved to The Guardian as Sports Editor.

At that Egbeda flat in 1984, we witnessed the births of our children. Then one day, Ojeagbase had this divine call to start Nigeria's first sports newspaper. It was the great motivational speaker Ubong King who said: "A man with a vision is a mad man until the vision comes to pass." Ubong King did not live to see 2021. He died on December 26, 2020 at the age of 48. May his soul rest in perfect peace. And may the souls of all the millions who died last year rest in peace.

When Ojeagbase had this vision, this burning zeal to start a sports newspaper, I was the first person he approached. He came into my room with a letter of resignation which he asked me to go and drop at The Guardian. I was hesitant. I was thinking: Is he thinking right? Does this guy want to commit suicide?

For the typical journalist who is used to being paid a monthly salary, who hadn't imbibed the spirit of entrepreneurship, leaving paid employment was akin to suicide. I was a bit hesitant in going to drop the resignation letter. The whole episode reminded me of when King Arthur in his dying days asked Sir Bedivere to go and throw his sword, Excalibur, into the lake but he declined. As a kid, I was fond of reading Arthurian legends. Like Sir Bedivere, I resisted but eventually submitted the resignation letter and the rest is history. Ojeagbase, armed with nothing, went to start Sports Souvenir, Nigeria's first sports newspaper which he was selling with his wife and children at the National Stadium, Surulere, during big matches. From there, God blessed him and the business grew, leading to Complete Sports and the array of international sports magazines and newspapers making him the undisputed King of Nigeria's Sport Journalism.

Ojeagbase writes in his memoirs: "The first time I deliberately took a faith-based, life-altering decision, knowing I was depending solely on GOD in taking the step, was when I boldly decided to start our sports publishing business without a single penny in my bank account. Before then, I had tried every method I knew to raise capital for the business. But none of them worked. Then, in October 1984, I was confronted with a big hurdle...a hard choice. The choice was that I either kept my sports editor job and adjusted to receiving lesser pay, or I quit the job and launched the sports publishing business without seed capital. I opted for the latter, putting my faith in GOD to see me through. It was a risky decision, no doubt. And I almost lost everything because of that single action, including social standing, prestige and self-worth. But in the end, the GOD I trust proved Himself to be dependable! The publishing business endured all the initial hardship that came its way. This business has been existing for more than 30 years now. And it is going very strong to the glory of Almighty GOD, our Sustainer and Great Provider."

The story of Dr. Ojeagbase goes beyond sports. It is the story of a survivor. If you read his book, "Testimony of a Kidney Failure Survivor," you will read about the "Secrets That Helped Me Overcome Sure Death and Prove the Faithfulness of GOD!"

His story is like the story of Job. A man who battled satan and won. A man of God afflicted with life-threatening illness like diabetes and kidney failure but survived it all to write about his experiences. Trusting in faith healing, Dr. Ojeagbase one day, without telling his trusted wife, decided audaciously to do away with all his diabetes drugs. He writes: "There is a bridge linking Amuwo to Okota. As we approached the bridge, I told the driver to park the car at the foot of the bridge to discharge my 'cargo' without telling anyone what it was. As I threw away the cellophane bag containing my diabetes medication in the stream running under that bridge, I reaffirmed my trust in GOD that what He said in the Bible that I believe, will come to pass in my life."

That action nearly cost him his life, but for God. Many years after, a doctor forced him to return to his diabetes drugs. From kidney transplant in India to dialysis treatment in Lagos and Atlanta USA, God has miraculously rescued Dr. Ojeagbase from the shadows of death. And God has blessed him with a faithful wife Pastor (Mrs.) Esther Ojeagbase who is a big part of the Ojeagbase story. That he has lived to see 70 years is by God's love, goodness and mercy to a servant who has trusted in Him. A man whose story will take many books to write. A man who has mentored many. A quintessential self-made man who survived death as a teenage soldier during the Nigeria Civil War to a legendary sports journalist, to a motivator, to the progenitor of Information Marketing and Internet Entrepreneurship in Nigeria, to a kidney survivor, to an Evangelist preaching the Good News of salvation.

70 years of Ojeagbaseism

The post 70 years of Ojeagbaseism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: February 24, 2021

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

Leadership (Abuja)

May 17, 2010 Monday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 6289 words

Byline: Max Gbanite

Body

---

Dele Giwa, in his column 'PARALLAX SNAPPS' of Sunday Concord Newspaper, January 8th, 1984, after the military overthrow of President Shehu Shagari, by Gen. Buhari, wrote, "...the military must get Akinloye especially, if diplomatic and other so-called legal means failed to produce Adisco, the military must adopt the Ghaddafi approach, and get professional kidnappers and assassins to his trail. They will get him.

After getting him, they must then compel him, by bloody and slow torture; to disclose where he is keeping all the money he stole from Nigeria. When he has told them where the money is being kept, he must be made to effect instruments of transfer of the money to Nigeria.

If he is slow at complying, the kidnappers and assassins should ask him to indicate the hand he uses for writing. They should then begin to break the fingers of his other hand one by one until he used his writing hand to sign the instrument of transfer of money to Nigeria."

Dele continued rather sadistically that:

"As for Sunday Adewusi [the Inspector General of Police under the deposed government of Shehu Shagari ], I have a personal score to settle with the fellow, so I would like to ask Major-General Buhari to oblige me by handing the fellow over to me, and he can be sure that I would do justice to the usurper."

The above is just to illustrate the mindset of this great and prolific journalist as of that time. Could he have collected a retinue of bad friends? Well, let us get back to the main issue, which are the lines between facts and hearsay in his death.

'COLLATERAL ESTOPPEL' is known in modern terminology as issue preclusion, is a common law estoppel doctrine that prevents a person from re-litigating an issue. Simply put, "once a court has decided an issue of fact or law necessary to its judgement, that decision...preclude[s] re-litigation of the issue in a suit on a different cause of action involving a party to the first case." This is for the prevention of legal harassment and to prevent the abuse of legal resources.

Late Chief Gani Fawehinmi, SAN, (may his gentle soul rest in peace) knows about this part of law. He went to court three times, and lost; his primary evidence was adjudged hearsay by the courts; yet, he wants to re-write the laws of Nigeria, which states that 'evidence backed with facts' will get one justice, and not sentiments and hearsay backed foibles.

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

Gani Fawehinmi, in a press release before his death, said that, "since the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission chaired by the retired Justice Chukwudifu Oputa had recommended that the Dele Giwa murder case be reopened, coupled with the signed statement of police investigator, Abubakar Tsav, no other time could have been more auspicious than now to reopen the case, more so that all the suspects and witnesses in the case are still alive."

He continued, "In view of the recommendation...however long, the culprits can still be brought to book. General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida today has no immunity and he is alive. Col. Halilu Akilu, former Director of Military Intelligence (DMI) is alive. Lt.-Col. A. K. Togun, former Deputy Director, State Security Service (SSS), is alive."

(Culled from Saturday Tribune, October 20th 2007).

Yes, Nigerians agree with the late erudite lawyer that the case be reopened. However, to point accusing fingers at His Excellency, General Ibrahim B. Babangida, GCFR, mni, Brig. Gen. Haliru Akilu (former DMI-DG), and Brig. Gen. A.K. Togun (former SSS-DG), all retired, is where with all due respect to the great lawyer, I vehemently beg to differ.

Admittedly, Dele Giwa's death was one of the saddest moments during the tenure of Gen. Babangida. And the fact that the method of death was by a 'letter bomb' made the matter even worse, especially, given that that was the first of its kind in our checkered history. Having stated that, does it mean that those being accused by Gani Fawehinmi were the culprits? The answer is emphatically NO, period.

I say this without equivocation, because Gani's evidence was based on 'hearsay' and not facts. He submitted the following evidence to the court: (1) Statement from Mr. Kayode Soyinka (hopefully not related to Prof. Wole Soyinka); (2) Statement from Giwa's son, Billy; (3) Statements from Mrs. Funmi Giwa (Dele's wife); (4) Medical reports of Giwa's death; (5) Burial documents, and (6) A letter from Giwa to him (Gani), dated October 17, 1986 informing him of the request from the security services to meet with them.

It is on the registry of these security agencies that they have in the past met with Dele Giwa numerous times, yet Giwa never wrote to Gani or informed him of his previous meetings. What is so significant about this particular meeting? What is troubling to many people is that after the explosion, Gani ordered that Giwa's house be sealed from everyone including the Police. That is a clear obstruction of Justice. However, the Police did not arrest him. According to the police, it took special dialogue (ten days) before Gani could allow them (the Police) to conduct a preliminary investigation of the crime scene. The inability of the Police to secure the crime-scene, collect and collate evidence, unfortunately, denied Gani some of the crucial evidence required to back up his accusation, if it were true; and the Police were equally denied the opportunity to find and apprehend the real killers; whatever evidence that was left after ten days was probably contaminated.

Police investigators referred Kayode Soyinka's statements to be conflicting, and when they (Police) came back to confirm some of his assertions and discrepancies, he fled the country immediately. When The Police approached Chief Ray Ekpu (Giwa's Partner and friend) who took over command from Giwa, to produce Kayode, he (Ekpu) wrote the Police a letter whose paragraph reads; "I am sure you're aware that Mr. Soyinka does not work here, he works in our London office and he only came here on an official business which would not have lasted beyond one week, But because of the tragic incident which affected his health, he stayed here for about a month, leaving the office unmanned for the period. You may wish to reach him through the address of our London office."

Please does this letter indicate the concern of colleagues who are gravely concerned, and mourning the death of their friend and, needed to assist the Police with their investigations?

The Police attempted to ask Ray Ekpu, and other associates at Newswatch to explain 'what type of business and assignment' that brought Kayode Soyinka to Nigeria, but Gani refused. Police wanted to interview Giwa's wife and son, Gani refused. Why?

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

Kayode Soyinka, the only witness in describing his survival and the blast to BBC correspondence and other media houses said, "I was having breakfast with Dele Giwa together, sitting arm's length from each other when the parcel was delivered. The parcel had the markings of Presidential seal, then as I got up to use the bathroom, the explosion happened, the intensity of the blast was such that the table was blown up, Dele's two legs were virtually blown off, a big fire ensued, the ceiling was blown up....I was thrown to the other end of the room unconscious, Dele Giwa's pajamas, the same fabric and color as mine was on fire, the room was filled with smoke....Then I got up, ran out of the room...met Giwa's wife in the adjoining room and told her what had happened, before running outside to call for help."

Then on another Press briefing the same man Kayode Soyinka stated that, "Mrs Funmi Dele Giwa sustained injuries on her hands when she tried to force-open the glass doors to the study where the explosion occurred."

Is it possible to be thrown unconscious by the blast, and quickly regain consciousness to explain what Giwa was wearing, how his legs were blown up, recognize Mrs. Giwa, ran to the streets to get help, all within this period of confusion-chaos?

That, too, baffled the top-cop investigator who took over the case; the then Deputy Inspector General of Police (DIG), now retired, Reverend (Dr.) Chris Omeben, who investigated the case (i.e. the explosion that killed Giwa) without any influence and interruption from the military, asserted in his book "In thy hands O' God," that after a thorough investigation of the crime scene, he could not link Giwa's death to either Brig. Generals Haliru akilu and A.K. Togun (both rtd.).

He substantiated his claim on page 135 of his book when he essayed, "That the parcel was brought to Giwa, immediately Soyinka excused himself to the toilet and before he went far, the sound came off. He (Omeben) asked himself, why was it that Mr. Soyinka was not wounded or even killed? The answer to him is that Mr. Soyinka may have gone down just before the explosion. Again, why did he excuse himself immediately the parcel was brought? As a visiting colleague, he ought to have been curious about the parcel, instead of excusing himself immediately the parcel was handed over to Dele Giwa." Reverend Chris Omeben reasoned. "He examined the scene again and noted that everything in that area within a certain level above the ground was smashed, including Giwa himself who was sitting on his study chair. It therefore followed that if Soyinka was still standing or moving towards the toilet before the bomb went off, he could have been caught before he took cover. In this case, either he sustained serious injury or he would be killed instantly like his host. Therefore, according to Chris, Mr. Kayode Soyinka is suspect number one."

When the Police bomb experts were later allowed into the house, more than ten days after the explosion occurred, they gave their assessment of the explosion; the bomb blast was centrifugal, it blew down part of the ceiling, the windows were shattered, the bathroom windows shattered and the windowpane and steel bent, and the door to the bathroom blown apart.

Yet, Kayode Soyinka, the lone witness escaped with only an ear perforation!

Billy Giwa (Dele's son) in his statement to the press said, "The security guard-malam guarding our house gave him the parcel which the malam claimed to have received from a motor-cyclist."

Giwa's business associates at Newswatch in narrating their own version posited that the parcel was delivered by armed men in a 504 Peugeot car which the security-malam refused to collaborate. Nevertheless, Gani went to first, the High Court from there to the court of appeals, and to the Supreme Court, with little or no evidence. The first two courts rejected his request for 'MANDAMUS' (i.e. Independent Prosecution of the security heads). The Supreme court set aside the Court of Appeal's ruling and directed that the issue be referred back to the High Court and should be heard by a High court Judge, except the Chief Judge of Lagos state.

The duo of Akilu and Togun retained the services of the late erudite legal luminary, Chief Rotimi Williams; at the Lagos High Court hearing, Gani lost. His evidence were said to be insufficient to establish a prima facie case to warrant the trial for murder of the two officers. The court described the information which Gani presented as evidence for prosecution as 'hearsay'. The evidence in Gani's hands were as follows: Statement from Giwa's son

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

Billy, statements from Kayode Soyinka, statements from Giwa's wife Funmi, medical reports of the death, burial documents, and a letter from Giwa to him dated October 17, 1986 informing him of the request from the security services to meet with them.

While the court proceedings were going on, it is on record that the Military-led government never interfered with the independence of the Judiciary.

Then one day Dele Giwa's partners, not happy with the way Gani was handling the case came to their senses, and on the front page of Punch newspaper of Wednesday November 5, 1986 was a headline, 'Twist in Giwa's Murder Mystery: NEWSWATCH DISOWNS FAWEHINMI,' by Innocent Anyim. The story reads:

"Newswatch directors have dissociated themselves from Chief Gani Fawehinmi's move to prosecute two military officers for the alleged murder of Dele Giwa. In an emergency press conference addressed by the Acting Chairman of the Board of Directors, Alhaji Abdulaziz Ude, and attended by all other directors yesterday, the Newswatch said Chief Fawehinmi's action was hasty, ill-timed and capable of aborting police investigation into the incident: We wish to state categorically that Chief Fawehinmi does not have our authority or that of the family to proceed on what we consider a hasty and ill-timed action, the directors said...what Fawehinmi has done, they continued, 'is jumping the gun. His action can only have an effect of aborting investigations and depriving Nigerians of the opportunity of hearing the results of police investigations."

Max Gbanite,

New Jersey, USA

The first case, suit M/51/86 was on November 7 1986, heard in the High Court by Chief Judge of Lagos State, then, Justice Candido Johnson. The Chief Judge dismissed the application on the grounds that applicant (Gani Fawehinmi) had not established a prima facie case for the granting of the application. The CJ wrote, inter alia:

"It appears to me important to appropriate that the need to endorse any certificate (for or against private prosecution) would only arise when a decision has been taken one way or the other. Here as it appears no decision has yet been taken.....It is necessary to remind ourselves that an A-G or DPP or any other officer of the A-G's department in exercising the power conferred in section 191 of the constitution performs a quasi-judicial function. The known procedure is for the police who has a public duty so to do to conduct a detailed investigation into a crime committed and submit the report of such investigation to the Attorney-General or any of his officers to enable them consider and decide on the merit of the report so as to determine the justification for undertaking a prosecution or declining to. It is conceded that in the appropriate circumstances the report of investigation by a private prosecutor may be useful. In carrying out this great and complex assignment the AG or DPP or any member of the staff so delegated, is not expected to act on any rule of thumb. He is not expected to be the product of a solid and judgment taking account of the provision of section 191 (iii) of the Constitution besides the evidences available to it.

How do we construe the statement credited to the DPP? I have myself had the privilege of going through the materials submitted to the DPP and made available to the court. I must say it appears one sided as nothing is there to show what the account of the proposed suspects are, to provide a balanced view of the accusation.

If therefore in that situation, the DPP defers the exercise of his discretionary power, he would, in my considered view appear to have exercised that discretion judiciously. Refusal is not the same as deferment. It is an applicant on a refusal that qualifies to apply not an applicant whose request is deferred. After all there is no time limit for the exercise of power vested on the A-G or DPP to prosecute, although one would expect such power to be exercised within a reasonable time.

Even if one considers the reasonableness of time, I would say that the incident that gave birth to the death of the late Dele Giwa is not only unique in its form but also complex and would require sufficient time to conduct detailed and balanced investigation, a report on which the appropriate authority would reasonably act. The timing here appears hasty and premature. It appears impulsive without giving reasonable time and chance for a detailed and balanced investigation into this sordid incident.

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

In the circumstances and having regard to the review made above, it is my ruling that this (ex-parte) application is misconceived and it is therefore dismissed. Leave to apply for mandamus is hereby refused."

Gani Fawehinmi was undeterred by the above decision of Chief Judge of Lagos State, then, Justice Candido Johnson. He went to Court of Appeals and the judgment was upheld. The Court of Appeal then consisted of Idris Kutigi JCA, Owolabi Kolawole JCA, and Nnaemeka Agu JCA; their points of determination were:

- (a) Whether the appellant (Gani Fawehinmi) had made out a 'prima facie' case to entitle him to the leave sought from the High Court.
- (b) Whether the learned Chief Judge was right in law in dismissing the appellant's ex-parte application.
- (c) Whether the Appellant had 'locus standi'.

Nnaemeka Agu JCA, as he then was, after carefully examining the issues with his fellow Justices of Court of Appeal (JCA) all in agreement, wrote on their behalf the following:

"The result of all I have just said is that the 'locus standi' of the appellant must have to be examined and decided in the light of Section 6(6) (b) of the 1979 Constitution. He can only have a locus if the matter involves a determination of his civil rights and obligations. In this country, the result of all the cases is that the common law concept that a person who has a locus and can sue is only one who has a legal right, or whose legal right has been adversely effected or who has suffered or is in imminent danger of suffering an injury, damages or detriment personal to himself. This is the result of all the decided cases including Adesanya's case (Supra). Thomas and Mrs. V. Olufosoye (1986) I.N.W.L.R.669....Indeed the definition of mandamus in section 18(5) of the High Court Law of Lagos State contemplates the existence of such personal and private interest before the order can be issued. It provides as follows:

'For the purpose of this section 'mandamus' means the order of mandamus made action commanding the fulfillment by a person of a quasi-public duty in which another person has a personal and private interest. Such personal and private interest has not been shown. It is clear that neither the fact that the appellant was a friend and counsel for the deceased, as he deposed to in his affidavit in support, nor the fact that he is seeking to be a private prosecutor if the respondent takes action under Section 342 of the criminal procedure law for what I have said, is sufficient to give him a 'locus standi.'

'For this reason, I should strike out the appeal on the ground that the appellant has no 'locus standi'."

On further examination of other issues, he wrote:

"Although at the stage, what is being sought is not the order of mandamus itself but leave to apply for it, the court cannot ignore the fact that in the end, if the application for the order is made, its grant must have to be made discretionary...." He went further to state that, "On these principles, it would be wrong to say that the function of the learned C.J at that stage was merely to be satisfied about compliance with the rules..... I believe that the learned C. J. was right. For the general rule is that before the applicant is entitled to the order, he must have addressed a direct, distinct and specific demand or request to the respondent to do a duty imposed upon him by law and the respondent must have unequivocally either expressly or by necessary implication, manifested his refusal not to comply....The right of a private prosecutor to prosecute under Section 342 of the Criminal Procedure Act is completely subordinated to the duty, function and right of the Attorney General in that behalf. This point is underscored by the powers conferred upon him to, at any stage of the proceedings, take over and continue with any prosecutions, including one commenced by a private prosecutor. As it is so and in view of the guarantee of personal liberty in the constitution, the decision to prosecute must be a serious and solemn function, which the Honorable Attorney General might not allow himself to be stampeded into."

The above explained why the Court of Appeals struck out the case as lacking 'locus standi'.

Chief Gani Fawehinmi refused to accept the ruling and filed case SC.43/1987 in the Supreme Court, asking the apex court to determine:

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

- (a) Whether the appellant had a 'locus standi'.
- (b) Whether the appellant had established a 'prima facie' case entitling him to leave to apply for mandamus; and
- (c) Whether the Court of Appeal considered and determined the merits of the substantive application for mandamus on the consideration of the ex-parte application for leave and if so whether the approach of the Court of Appeal was wrong.

The lead judgment on the case was written by A. O. Obaseki JSC (Justice of the Supreme Court). It took him about thirty-two pages of presentation, and in it he allowed the appeal of the appellant and set aside the decisions of the Court of Appeal and the High Court. He also granted leave for the appellant for an order of mandamus. Not that the Court of appeal and the High Court erred in their respective judgments but because, the Supreme Court observed that they focused on certain issues not yet before them. Justice Obaseki, JSC in his judgment stated:

"The Court of Appeal erred in law in striking out the appeal on the ground that the appellant has no locus standi." (The Particulars of Error; the learned Justices of the Court of Appeal misdirected themselves in law and thereby came to a wrong conclusion when they said): "Therefore a private person who takes out a mandamus to compel a public functionary to prosecute or to give himself a fiat to prosecute must first show that he has a locus standi."

Obaseki JSC went further:

"The learned justices of the Court of Appeal erred in law in considering and determining the merits of the substantive application for mandamus (yet to be filed) instead of restricting themselves to the consideration of the ex-parte application for leave to apply for mandamus which was the matter before the High Court in relation to which an appeal was lodged."

Other JSC members at the time the late Mohammed Bello, then Chief Justice of Nigeria; Kayode Eso, JSC (rtd.); late Augustine Nnamani, JSC; Muhammed Lawal Uwais, JSC (later became the Chief Justice of Nigeria, and now retired); Abubakar Wali, JSC (rtd.); and E. Babasanya Craig, JSC (rtd.) who went along the line of judgment essayed by Obaseki, and was clearly articulated by Craig JSC on page thirteen (13) of his judgment, he wrote:

"In regard to the issue of prima facie case, Chief Fawehinmi has stated that a prima facie case is made when an applicant brings the application in the form required by Order 35r.1 of the Lagos High Court Rules, and shows due compliance with Section 342 of the Criminal Procedure Law. This is not quite right. In my view, a distinction should be made between making a prima facie case to the DPP to enable him endorse the information under Section 342 of the CPL and making a 'prima facie' to the court to enable the court grant leave to apply for an order of mandamus.... In the first instance, when the applicant presents to a law officer all the documents (i.e. information.... and recognizance) required to be produced under Section 342(a) and (b) of the Criminal Procedure Law, he has thereby made out a case and is entitled to demand that the law officer should endorse the information as required by law.... But in the latter case, an applicant does not make out a prima facie case merely by presenting to the court documents which he had tendered to the law officer. To make out a prima facie case before the court, the applicant should in my view, disclose in his affidavit sufficient facts which would make the court want to hear the other side. The facts disclosed would of course depend on the peculiar nature of the application. But the court remains the sole judge of whether not sufficient facts have been disclosed to warrant the other party being called upon. In all this, the court is guided by its judicial discretion."

And the highly respected Justice Kayode Eso followed with this averrement: Nnaemeka Agu, JCA (who later went to the Supreme Court) referred to this and said (of course with the constraints of the earlier decisions of this court), 'It is this public interest and zeal that complicate the problem of courts in such a case (such as the instant one). Yet what the justice courts are bound and have sworn to administer is justice according to law, completely devoid of bias or sentiments.... I agree that neither bias nor sentiment should filter into justice. Indeed, once that happens, it ceases to be justice, yet the interpretation placed by the courts, once it is non-biased, non-sentimental should be broad enough to bring out the true essence of justice according to law. A narrow interpretation, straight-jacketed on the fear of a judge not being a legislator, into the confines of words which might even be equivocal, is, with respect, a negation of the true essence of justice'.

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

Simply put, the Supreme Courts directed that the case be returned to the Lagos High Courts, but that the Chief Judge of Lagos State who heard the first case must recuse himself, while another Justice hears the case. This argument was further elucidated by Babasanya Craig, JCS who wrote that:

"In conclusion, I hold that the appellant has failed to make out a prima facie case for leave to apply for an order of mandamus and his application for such order is refused. In the result, the appeal fails and it is dismissed."

As directed by the Supreme Court, Gani Fawehinmi, took the case back to Lagos High Court, presided by Justice Longe whose judgment was announced on February 23, 1988, as reported by The Guardian Express of same day under the caption 'TOGUN, AKILU CAN'T BE TRIED-COURT RULES.' "The two army security officers, Col. Haliru Akilu and Lt. Col. A. K. Togun, charged with the murder of Dele Giwa, cannot be tried, an Ikeja high Court ruled this morning....for seventy five minutes, Justice Longe based his squashing order on the following:

- Â· That the information supplied by prosecution lacked merit both in form and substance.
- Â· That information for their trial was not properly filed by prosecution.
- Â· That the trial of the security officers would amount to an abuse of the process and that there was no link between the death of Mr. dele Giwa on October 19, 1986 and the security officers.....

The encounter between the security officers and the late Dele Giwa shortly before his death, happened while the security officers were performing their duties, adding that the trial cannot therefore be based on that.....He however observed that Mrs. Fadayomi needed not have filed any charges against the security officers when she had satisfied herself that the information supplied to her disclosed no offence against the accused....the Attorney General should have entered a 'nolle-prosequi' or withdraw the charges against the accused." The Justice further said that,

"The Attorney General did not oppose the objection raised by counsel to the 'accused' persons, Chief Rotimi Williams, on the ground that the information was filed by private prosecutor when the information had not been completed and especially when the 'INFORMATION IMPLICATED ONE OF THE PROSECUTION WITNESSES' that what the prosecution should produce should include evident information that the 'accused' killed the deceased, that the killing was unlawful and that the evidence to be adduced must be cogent to the linking of the killing of Dele Giwa.....there must be certainty in the evidence available for the prosecution of the two security chiefs.....that he therefore admit the objections raised by Chief Rotimi Williams for the 'accused' that the proof of evidence before the Court was mere HEARSAY.... Based on the evidence available before the court, it will be an abuse of the process of court to call the two security chiefs for trial. The information is therefore quashed accordingly."

The information on the whole mandamus appeared finished since Gani Fawehinmi never appealed against this judgment. He could have opted for libel, in which case he must be commanded by the Court to present his chief/lead witness; in this case Kayode Soyinka, however, he opted not to do so, and probably fearing that Kayode Soyinka's testimony may not hold water. Therefore, his attempt to bring up the same issue at the Oputa Panel was legally childish, ridiculous, and outrightly mischievous in character. This kind of legal antecedents may have informed the decision reached by the Supreme Court not to open the case. As clearly stated, he could have appealed Justice Longe's decision or filed for a libel against the duo.

(Court Proceedings culled from existing court records in Lagos state High Court, Federal Court of Appeal, and Supreme Court of Nigeria).

The single evidence Gani based his accusation on was 'hearsay' and it was supplied by Mr. Kayode Soyinka, a friend of Giwa, and London Bureau Chief, immediately after the explosion, therefore the following questions are indeed begging for answers and, I and many Nigerians need assistance in resolving them:

(1) Kayode Soyinka was the only man on record with Giwa at the time of the incident; why should what he claimed to have happened be accepted or believed? By virtue of being alone with Giwa, he becomes the principal suspect, yet, he refused to submit himself for additional interrogation by the Police, instead he fled to London, where,

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

according to Ray Ekpu, is more important than resolving the more serious issues about the explosion that caused Giwa's death.

(2) Kayode Soyinka's earlier statement to the world was that he was deaf from ear-perforation resulting from the blast; how did he converse on the phone with the press, especially, the BBC correspondent? Who called who on the phone first and why was his information to BBC in conflict with the one given to Nigeria press? Why did he run away without trace from Nigeria and who is he hiding from? Gani Fawehinmi could have put him into protective custody if his life was in danger.

(3) Investigators suggested that Giwa, may not have opened the parcel before it exploded; Guardian Express of October 22nd 1986, published in the front page "New Clue....could have been a time bomb or remote control." If it was timed, the explosion must certainly contain remnants of a watch or small clock; if this is not the case, it must then be remotely controlled, and if that was the case, is it possible that that parcel was a rehearsed cue for Kayode to leave the scene before the detonation because...

(4) Kayode narrated that the intensity of the blast was such that the table was blown up, Dele's two legs were virtually blown, a big fire ensued, there was smoke everywhere, the ceiling was blown up plus all other damages, yet, he was having breakfast with Giwa, and sitting at arms length to be able to read the inscription on the envelope and observe the Presidential Seal. If that was the case, how come Kayode never sustained any other injuries except the bursting of his ear drums which miraculously healed within hours, enabling him to have full press interviews....it doesn't really make medical sense; he claimed to have been thrown to the other side of the room and even became unconscious. Yet, he rushed out of the room to meet Giwa's wife in the sitting room; on another account he said that she was rushing to the study; and, yet, on another account he said that she was sitting down; and that Giwa's son Billy said that he (Billy) was with Giwa's wife (his step mother) discussing something when Kayode emerged. And Kayode, in the same unconscious state of mind was able to rush outside to call for a taxi to help take Giwa's body to the hospital; this really sounds like a mixture of badly constructed stories....the flavor is very strange.

(5) It has also been suggested by explosion experts that Kayode probably, noticing the excitement on Giwa's face for having received a parcel supposedly from the President, quietly moved to a corner and activated the bomb which he could have planted in Giwa's favorite sitting place, since he was a guest for some days before the incident and, that of course explains why he sustained only ear perforation without any body injury caused from collateral damage of the explosion. It is still too simple to simply dismiss and attribute his not sustaining any other injuries to act of miracle. Even the legendary Nigerian overseer's don't intend to give him that credit.

(6) In the sketch version of the BBC interview, Kayode was quoted as saying "When I saw him, it was apparent that the bomb must have had a major impact on his two thighs. I mean, that is obvious partly because of the way he held the brown envelope, it was directly on top of his thigh." Yet, he was unconscious and conscious at the same time and to make such close observation as to the placement of the envelope on Giwa's laps. He must have been sitting very close to Giwa, therefore, when Giwa opened the envelope potentiating the explosion, he (Kayode) could have been killed too; except if the theory of an already planted bomb is to be believed.

(7) Another troubling episode occurred at the gate before the delivery of the parcel. On live television Gani sponsored a rendition of what happened on that fateful Sunday morning; the rehearsal indicated that a car from which Giwa's gatekeeper collected the parcel from, parked on the other side of the road and that the gatekeeper crossed the road to collect the envelope. Please is this normal of a security-gatekeeper to do, or could it be that the gatekeeper knew and recognized the occupant (s) in the vehicle and thus acted as he did? It was also revealed that Ray Ekpu's gatekeeper was around the house during that particular incident of parcel collection. How far was Ray Ekpu's house from that of Giwa? What was Ray's gatekeeper doing in Giwa's house that early? When did Ray hear about the explosion to hurriedly convene a press conference attended by Gani, where they accused the government of complicity even before the police were alerted?

Question came from my numerous discussions with Brig. Gen. A.K. Togun (rtd.), one of the accused, and also from Togun's book 'Dele Giwa: My Story'

Dele Giwa - Facts And Hearsay Evidence [opinion]

Fellow Nigerians', there are thousands of questions that beg to be answered, and this writing cannot accommodate them all. However, it is worthy to note that it is virtually impossible to have witnessed at close range such an explosion and all one suffered was bursting of the ear drum, which incidentally healed within 72 hours but enabled the same patient to have a telephone conversation with BBC before the healing occurred. The miraculous-cure is highly dubious.

The international community is not oblivious to the tempestuous ways and notoriety of the country's corruption and ingenuity at forgery; therefore, that an envelope, according to Kayode Soyinka (the only eye witness) bore the inscriptions of "Office of the President of Nigeria" does not really mean that it came from there. Giwa's son Billy was of age to read the same inscription, yet, he never collaborated or commented on such observation.

Those who still believe that the security chiefs under directives from the amiable General Ibrahim B. Babangida, GCFR, had a hand in this dastardly act--though entitled to their state of minds--are not sincere to themselves and probably lack the objective capacity required to understand that law is based on FACTS, not SENTIMENTS or HEARSAY. Cases are adjudicated on facts only.

Chief Gani Fawehinmi, SAN would have made his case had he allowed the hands of justice to investigate the case properly by even challenging the government then to allow a team of Interpol to collaborate with the Nigerian Police Force in their investigations of the crime scene. Unfortunately, his sealing-off the scene for more than ten days may have contaminated the crime scene and deprived the investigators their rights to collect analyzable evidence to apprehend the real people that killed Giwa.

In the meantime as we wait for new information to come out, the late Gani failed to also make a case for Chief Bola Ige, Harry Marshall, Aminaosari Dikibo, Funsho Williams, Dr. Daramola, Architect Ugwu, Victor Nwankwo, Prof. Chimere Ikoku, and all the other unresolved dastardly murders that happened from 1999-2007; and has continued to happen till date. Before Gani died, he did not blame the security chiefs, and former President Obasanjo, and State Governors in whose State it happened?

Yes, Oputa Panel 'circus' came; we were thrilled by the spectacular display of emotions, and Gani's 'improvised explosive devices' (IEDs). Gen. Babangida, under the advisement of his lawyers, went to the Supreme Court to protect himself against these IEDs, and the ebullient Justices ruled that Oputa Panel was unconstitutional. Period. You may not like it, but it is the law, and Gani knows that too.

General Babangida, as far as the evidence submitted, never did order the killing of Dele Giwa or any other person(s). Brig. Generals Haliru Akilu and A.K. Togun (both retired) equally had no need or reasons to kill Dele Giwa.

Going by Dele Giwa's business style and antecedents, especially given that the man proved not to be a saint as can be deduced from his column in Concord Newspaper, after the military overthrow of President Shehu Shagari, in 1983.

Only Mr. Giwa and, possibly, Kayode Soyinka knows what kinds of deals the publisher may have been involved in/with that caused his untimely, though, God-approved death. May his soul and that of others mentioned above rest in perfect peace, and may only God judge their killers.

"It is about issues, not individuals." Let us keep talking and discussing. To my readers, keep reading and have fun doing it. To my traducers, kindly go to pepper-soup joints and discuss the points made here; otherwise, go to heaven!

Long live the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

Load-Date: May 19, 2010

End of Document

70 years of Ojeagbaseism

The Sun (Nigeria)

January 2, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1228 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Hallelujah!!! Let me start by giving thanks and all the glories to our Father. A Father like no father. He who created us and gave us life in abundance. He who preserved us all through this journey of life. He who shielded us from the snares of death and from the great pandemic that disrupted the world in 2020 and took away lives too many to count. Beloved, let me wish you a truly happy New Year.

Look at your neighbour eye ball to eye ball. Shake hands and say: "Congratulations for surviving 2020, the dreadful year of Covid-19. In 2021, we shall sing Redemption Song."

Today's column is for my friend and brother Dr. Emmanuel-Sunny Ojeagbase who clocked 70 on December 31, 2020. As I write this column, plans are on the way to organize a 70th birthday ZOOM party for him. I cannot wait to write this piece after the birthday party. To meet the deadline for this column, I just have to go with what I have. In this age of advanced technology, I sent Dr. Ojeagbase a birthday greetings on WhatsApp: "To God be the glory. Happy 70th birthday to a great man of God and a great man of Journalism. I rejoice with you on reaching this landmark age. My prayer is that you will see more and more years in good health and prosperity. You are a survivor because the Lord is in your corner. Continually, you will be a winner to the glory of He who sent you. Happy birthday."

He replied: "Thank you, my brother, Mike. Thank you for ALWAYS being there. I thank GOD for letting our paths cross. May GOD continue to bless you and your wonderful family every day of your life. Love you!"

So, how did our paths cross such that we became "neighbours" sharing the upper floors of two three-bedroom flats in Egbedore area of Lagos, in those days of humble beginnings? It's a long story which started from Kaduna where I was the Chief Correspondent of Chief MKO Abiola's Concord newspaper group and I wrote for the legendary editor of the then Sunday Concord the late Dele Giwa compelling articles which dazzled him, such that he created for me

70 years of Ojeagbaseism

a column called "Reporter's Notebook" where I started as a columnist. Then for Sunny Ojeagbase who was the Sports Editor of Sunday Concord, I also wrote a piece on Diego Maradona that impressed him and got it published. From Kaduna, Dele Giwa arranged my being brought down to Lagos to work directly under him. There I became close to Ojeagbase living next to each along Akowonjo Road, Egbeda. From Concord, he moved to The Guardian as Sports Editor.

At that Egbeda flat in 1984, we witnessed the births of our children. Then one day, Ojeagbase had this divine call to start Nigeria's first sports newspaper. It was the great motivational speaker Ubong King who said: "A man with a vision is a mad man until the vision comes to pass." Ubong King did not live to see 2021. He died on December 26, 2020 at the age of 48. May his soul rest in perfect peace. And may the souls of all the millions who died last year rest in peace.

When Ojeagbase had this vision, this burning zeal to start a sports newspaper, I was the first person he approached. He came into my room with a letter of resignation which he asked me to go and drop at The Guardian. I was hesitant. I was thinking: Is he thinking right? Does this guy want to commit suicide?

For the typical journalist who is used to being paid a monthly salary, who hadn't imbibed the spirit of entrepreneurship, leaving paid employment was akin to suicide. I was a bit hesitant in going to drop the resignation letter. The whole episode reminded me of when King Arthur in his dying days asked Sir Bedivere to go and throw his sword, Excalibur, into the lake but he declined. As a kid, I was fond of reading Arthurian legends. Like Sir Bedivere, I resisted but eventually submitted the resignation letter and the rest is history. Ojeagbase, armed with nothing, went to start Sports Souvenir, Nigeria's first sports newspaper which he was selling with his wife and children at the National Stadium, Surulere, during big matches. From there, God blessed him and the business grew, leading to Complete Sports and the array of international sports magazines and newspapers making him the undisputed King of Nigeria's Sport Journalism.

Ojeagbase writes in his memoirs: "The first time I deliberately took a faith-based, life-altering decision, knowing I was depending solely on GOD in taking the step, was when I boldly decided to start our sports publishing business without a single penny in my bank account. Before then, I had tried every method I knew to raise capital for the business. But none of them worked. Then, in October 1984, I was confronted with a big hurdle...a hard choice. The choice was that I either kept my sports editor job and adjusted to receiving lesser pay, or I quit the job and launched the sports publishing business without seed capital. I opted for the latter, putting my faith in GOD to see me through. It was a risky decision, no doubt. And I almost lost everything because of that single action, including social standing, prestige and self-worth. But in the end, the GOD I trust proved Himself to be dependable! The publishing business endured all the initial hardship that came its way. This business has been existing for more than 30 years now. And it is going very strong to the glory of Almighty GOD, our Sustainer and Great Provider."

The story of Dr. Ojeagbase goes beyond sports. It is the story of a survivor. If you read his book, "Testimony of a Kidney Failure Survivor," you will read about the "Secrets That Helped Me Overcome Sure Death and Prove the Faithfulness of GOD!"

His story is like the story of Job. A man who battled satan and won. A man of God afflicted with life-threatening illness like diabetes and kidney failure but survived it all to write about his experiences. Trusting in faith healing, Dr. Ojeagbase one day, without telling his trusted wife, decided audaciously to do away with all his diabetes drugs. He writes: "There is a bridge linking Amuwo to Okota. As we approached the bridge, I told the driver to park the car at the foot of the bridge to discharge my 'cargo' without telling anyone what it was. As I threw away the cellophane bag containing my diabetes medication in the stream running under that bridge, I reaffirmed my trust in GOD that what He said in the Bible that I believe, will come to pass in my life."

That action nearly cost him his life, but for God. Many years after, a doctor forced him to return to his diabetes drugs. From kidney transplant in India to dialysis treatment in Lagos and Atlanta USA, God has miraculously rescued Dr. Ojeagbase from the shadows of death. And God has blessed him with a faithful wife Pastor (Mrs.) Esther Ojeagbase who is a big part of the Ojeagbase story. That he has lived to see 70 years is by God's love, goodness and mercy to a servant who has trusted in Him. A man whose story will take many books to write. A man who has mentored many. A quintessential self-made man who survived death as a teenage soldier during the Nigeria Civil War to a legendary sports journalist, to a motivator, to the progenitor of Information Marketing and Internet Entrepreneurship in Nigeria, to a kidney survivor, to an Evangelist preaching the Good News of salvation.

70 years of Ojeagbaseism

The post 70 years of Ojeagbaseism appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: January 2, 2021

---

End of Document

Reviewing parallax view of heroism

The Guardian

August 27, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1418 words

Byline: Nsikak Ekanem

Body

---

This piece which may be viewed as a review of Ray Ekpu's column in Newswatch edition of November 2, 1987, got inspiration from separate actions recently taken by two group of persons that tend to refute thematic message conveyed in that column. They are Ukanafun Professionals' Association, otherwise called UK-Pro, and Uyo Book Club.

Peopled by few indigenes of Ukanafun local council residing in some Nigerian cities and in the Diaspora, the UK-Pro is making quest through advocacy and socio-cultural orientation for commensurate, comprehensive and sustainable development of Ukanafun community, where Ekpu hails from. Founded by Udeme Nana, a Mass Communication scholar with passionate drive for advancement of intellectualism, Uyo Book Club is on speedy drive to rejuvenate reading culture, which is dangerously speeding on reverse gear.

On August 6, Uyo Book Club put together a "special reading session" in honour of Ekpu, whose birthday anniversary was due that Sunday. The modest gathering was intellectually stimulating and socially hilarious.

Almost everyone in the Shakespeare Room at Watbridge hotel where the event took place took pride in having certain unique identification with Ekpu. This writer, who was accorded a privilege to read some excerpts of Ekpu's published works, got a marked recognition not because of doing anything spectacular but only on account of being the only person at the event that attended one of the two primary schools that Ekpu passed through – Qua Iboe Church Group School Ikot Akpa Idem in present day Ukanafun.

Given the fact that he has not appeared in his weekly column in The Guardian, Daily Independent and Daily Sun in recent time, what probably would have been Ekpu's take on the trending issue of "let the poor breathe" has been missed at the moment. But as timelessness, if not prophetic, as the works of every creative and inspirational writer remain, Ekpu's position resurfaced that Sunday and gave a soothing balm to readers who have been flipping pages and searching website of newspapers for his view on how those who are rich through political offices think of the "poor" who have been the worst hit from pangs of anti-people policies and the prodding of those in power.

Reviewing parallax view of heroism

"Nigeria's New Religion" in Newswatch issue of November 16, 1987, which I read some portions not unconsciously, dwelt on the plan by the Ibrahim Babangida-led federal government "to jack up the prices" of petroleum products through subsidy removal.

The column's currency remains intact: "As the cost of these services go up, so as the frustration of lower income Nigerians, a. k. a. the poor. The poor, regrettably, have been at the receiving end of ministerial jokes. Poor bashing has, in recent times, become the favourite pastime of some ministers who have, in the public profile and statements, managed to exhibit suffocating arrogance of colonial administrators by putting their ministerial feet in their ministerial mouths."

He added that government "is about the welfare of the people, rich and poor alike." Asserting that the poor and the weak constitute Nigeria's largest population, Ekpu sermonised that "it is more of the poor and the weak that any sensitive government ought to cater for, since the rich and the powerful can adequately cater for themselves." The column concluded: "if nothing can be done to reduce the present suffering of Nigerians, nothing should be done to accentuate it."

While Uyo Book Club has had a very successful outing, the UK-Pro chaired by Prince Ekong Udom, which, early this year, mooted an idea of commemorating Ekpu's 50 years in journalism with a colloquium on the place of our villages in the global village, has started moving the plan from drawing board to its proposed site. By the time the UK-Pro's initiative comes into full implementation, it would add impetus to that of Uyo Book Club and other organizations and persons in refuting, to some degree, Ekpu's column of November 2, 1987, which had the headline, "Parallax view of Heroism."

Although Parallax view of Heroism appeared to be in remembrance of Dele Giwa, Ekpu's friend and first Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch, whose column, Parallax Snap, was suddenly restricted to achieve following his assassination on October 19, 1986, the piece was bemoaning African nations' attitude of "the proverbial cow that does not value her tail until she loses it." Ekpu mentioned Thomas Sankara, whom he said was "manifestly honest and manifestly committed to the liberation of the black person", Obafemi Awolowo, whose "political sagacity and economic pragmatism were virtually lost to most Nigerians while he lived" as well as Samora Machel, first President of Mozambique.

In the category of living legend then that the Nigerian society did not consider worth of honouring, Ekpu mentioned Wole Soyinka, Bala Usman, Gani Fawehinmi and Balarabe Musa. He concluded by decrying that our society "tends to have parallax view of heroism, the kind of view that permits the acknowledgement of a man's contribution to the society only when he is six feet down.

The renowned journalist from a remote village called Ikot Udo Ossiom in Akwa Ibom could be said to be one of the few persons that has not been caught in the cobweb of proverbial scriptural saying that prophets lack honour at their hometowns. When he was awarded 1987 International Editor of the year, the authority of his native local council in Ukanafun caused the people to roll out drums.

The Mass Communication department of Akwa Ibom State Polytechnic at Ikot Osurua is named after him. In 2021, Inoyo Toro Foundation, an exceptional NGO that has been pushing for eradication of poverty through empowerment of teachers and other professionals, endowed Ray Ekpu Award for Investigative Journalism in Akwa Ibom.

Until Nana came up with "Rare Ray", a tribute to Ekpu at 75, so many people were of the view that Ekpu has only been a thorn in the flesh of some Nigerian power brokers, who, in turn, used to pay him back by putting him in docks and behind bars time and again. From Nana's revelation, there have been other casualties on account of Ekpu's celebrity status in journalism.

This category of casualties, like victims of rape, may find difficult to narrate their ordeals. One of such person has been a final year Mass Communication student who was then glowing with freshly accoutrements of girlishness and joy of about bagging a college degree, as well as having a husband in-the-waiting. In pre-marriage interview by her suitor, she did not know anything about Ray Ekpu. The marriage proposal crashed abruptly.

Reviewing parallax view of heroism

From a source worth relying on, one of the reasons Udom Inoyo, former Vice Chairman of Exxon Mobil companies in Nigeria and founder of Inoyo Toro Foundation, was coldly treated in the build-up to 2023 general elections by political establishment led by Udom Emmanuel was the foundation's institution of award in honour of Ekpu. The envy and contempt trailing that lofty gesture got worst in that the maiden edition of the award was won by Uyo-based journalist called Ekemini Simon, whose investigative reports sometimes brought alleged illicit act of the Akwa Ibom State government to public attention.

Notwithstanding few exceptions, Parallax view of Heroism still holds sway in many instances. Although he played substantial role in the creation of Kogi State in 1991, Yakubu Mohammed, another highflying journalist and co-founder of Newswatch, seems to be given identification of an outcast by the powers-that-be in the state. At a certain time, Ekpu himself was once given some sort of pariah recognition by certain persons at top echelon of societal scheme of things in Akwa Ibom.

Ekpu has been attributing his relative success and professional accomplishment to God, and not any extraordinary actions of his. It could be added that God or divine power functions most times on humans through instrumentality of other humans or other earthly beings. Let the instruments of such honour keep functioning.

Ekanem sent this piece through nsikak4media@gmail.com

In this article Prince Ekong Udom

Ray Ekpu

Related

Pele: World king of football had Warri ancestry

January 6, 2023

My journalism journey

January 31, 2023

The 25% Abuja cut-off mark

April 21, 2023

'Strengthening public confidence in media through ombudsman'

April 25, 2023

When Udom raises more questions than answers

May 16, 2023

The president would be held into account

June 8, 2023

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

Reviewing parallax view of heroism

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 28, 2023

---

End of Document

Loud Whispers with Joseph Edgar

This Day

October 23, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 THISDAY NEWSPAPERS LTD. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2713 words

Body

---

Tinubu, Atiku's Run and 'Quench' Campaigns

Please, if this is not a serious season, I would have been laughing all over the place. These grandpas are in a race to defeat nature. They have insisted that they are strong and ready. They have showed us themselves riding bicycles, jogging, dancing and the only thing left is for them to release sex tapes so we know that they are fully fit. In fact, the other day, one lady on Instagram challenged Tinubu to rounds of heavy sex. I quickly offered to replace him, stating my credentials as a man who has friends in APC but she declined, insisting that it was Tinubu she wanted. This one wants to kill our candidate o.

Anyways, these two Babas, once they do one small campaign, they will run abroad to refuel and come back. Last week, Atiku ran to France. Fani-Kayode alleged that he collapsed and that na drip they used to carry him inside plane. Dino released a video of Atiku eating in one canteen in France and asking us 'if this place looks like a hospital?'

Tinubu had just come back from his refuelling the other day. You see, for me, I really do not have anything against old men aspiring because the problem with the complexity of this country is not the one that teenagers with no pubic hair will solve.

But if we are going to go for old men, not brittle-legged men who look like small breeze from Bar Beach will blow them away. This is not about riding stationary unplugged bicycles or jogging with oversized tracksuits and dancing like they have put staples in their knees like Atiku the other day.

Are we not tired of sickly old men? From Yar'Adua though to Buhari and now these two? Which kind of leaders are we throwing up? Sooner than you know it, we will now be having a budget for creche at Aso Rock so that our President will be taking feeding bottles in between meetings.

Nigeria is just a big circus.

Loud Whispers with Joseph Edgar

Jimi Agbaje's Cunny Homecoming

Did I just see a report that my egbon Jimi Agbaje was on his way back to APC? In the report, I saw him smiling and saying he was very happy to finally come back 'home'. Mbok, the question is, did you ever go anywhere in the first place? Na posting you go na. You were on national assignment to PDP simple and work don finish and you have been recalled home.

Throughout Mr. Agbaje's two time attempt at the Lagos seat, he had been dogged with accusations of being a 'mole' in PDP. He usually used to fight very strenuously to deny the accusations. In a meeting with him at his campaign office during those heady days, I had asked him and he mumbled somethings. Anyways, we are very happy that he has come back home after serving his party meritoriously in his posting.

This Nigeria na scam. All of us na real scam. Kai!

Abike Dabiri-Erewa and the 'Ode' in Us

Mummy lost her temper the other day on Twitter and it took the personality of the well-respected Mrs. Oby Ezekwesili to caution her. But mummy had lost it and returned by asking that one where she was when they were calling her names on Twitter.

She was so uncouth almost like a Shomolu market woman as she ranted all over the place. She was asking if she was the one that sent us to traffic drugs and if we were there when they were all over the place begging that we should not be killed in faraway Asian countries and all of that. Typical catfight o.

The fact is that she will not be cautioned especially as this attitude is very unbecoming of a high-ranking government official. She acted as if she was put there to do us a favour. Very negative messianic tendency from an untrained and by accident diplomat.

No be this Abike wey we dey see for NTA News? Now she is seeing herself like United Nations top diplomat cascading the world and causing more confusion everywhere. From Abidjan to Brazil and South Africa to Thailand, mummy is everywhere, putting mouth. Once something happens even before the better trained and well-suited foreign office people talk, she don talk.

This her diaspora office, mbok is it a parallel Ministry of External Affairs because me I am not understanding it again. Who carries on diplomatic business on Twitter abusing people up and down.

She is kuku correct. If we are not all 'ode' why would she be in that office in the first place let alone of being representative of the millions of Nigerians in the diaspora with little or no training. Na we be the 'ode'. Thank you.

Yahaya Bello, You See Yourself?

Bro, you see yourself, now BUA said they are no longer interested in the huge expanse of land you offered them. I have read somewhere that when the Kogi State House of Assembly summoned them to find out why they hadn't paid for the land or taken possession, those ones said "sorry, we are no longer interested."

Who will be when they can just wake up one morning and enter their canoe - you know the whole place is flooded - and come and shut down the place claiming ownership. The drama with Obajana just ended with the federal government's intervention. That was sick. It was a crazy turn. Even if they gave Bello that factory, will he even know how to handle the toilet bowl let alone running a multi-billion-dollar investment.

Every responsible government is begging for investments especially at this time when unemployment is even at its highest and the one major one you have in your state, you are doing cowboy and Indian with them and then you will now be expecting others to come and take a risk.

Mbok, e be like say the state will gain more from you following madam to the GYM daily to keep you busy till your tenure is over. Mbok, I tire.

Omoyele Sowore, Leave Dele Giwa Out of It

Mr. Sowore is a friend. At least we chat on Whatsapp about this and that. This is not to say that the next time they want to arrest him, anybody should come and ask me any question o. I don't know him like that. We just chat once in a while when I am bored o.

Anyways, recently he sent me a post stating that he wants to throw up the Dele Giwa issue again. I tell my brother why not focus. You have a presidential campaign you are running and you are not doing well at all, na Dele Giwa you want to go and unearth?

I said to him, why not wait till you win and then use presidential powers to seek justice. As expected, he disagreed. You know he can argue and he no dey gree. I continued, "bro the youths who are throwing up Peter Obi and making him the issue were not even born when the man was unfortunately killed by the enemies of this country."

Those ones have immediate issues they want resolved. I continued, you should ride on them and build a bridge to Peter Obi since politics is all about compromise and negotiations. "Ahhhhh" he screamed, "I knew that was where you were going to. I am not an establishment person. You are an Obi man," he concluded.

Obi wey dey wear cheap shoe? I am not an Obi man o. I told him that if he was going to be taken seriously, he should build a base and use that as leverage to negotiate himself into power. "At least, if you work hard enough, you can get an ambassadorial posting to Jamaica so you can better understand the uses of medical marijuana, something close to your chest."

The man no gree o and I leave am go check one sexy picture one young sweet person sent to me.

For me, I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Sowore dey use this presidential run as immunity against his friends at the DSS and all those people that like to disturb him. Simple. Abi who dey arrest presidential candidate?

Ooni of Ife: The Polygamist Committee Reacts

Last week, I had mentioned, although very briefly, my concerns on the ongoing collection of wives by the highly revered king. Well, this week, the Polygamist Committee of which I am a bona fide member, has released a press release on the back of the announcement that the Ooni would be taking his fifth wife.

Let me reproduce the press release here verbatim:

"Ooni of Ife - setting up to give polygamy a bad name

We in the polygamist committee have been watching with growing concern the recent activities of the great Ooni of Ife. The highly revered monarch in the last few weeks has been collecting wives the way farmers pick cotton in the fields. As at the last count, the well-respected monarch would have pulled in at least three new wives all within a few weeks.

While watching very closely these activities, we would first like to advise parents to keep their daughters, especially the light-skinned ones away from Ife and his immediate environs until we are very sure of what is going on.

The ancient and sacred institution of polygamy is a well respected and highly disciplined initiative guided by specific rules aimed at conferring dignity and respect to all involved especially the women who find themselves very lucky to be chosen.

This doesn't seem to be the case in Ife as we are witnessing a corraling of women into a union that is at best shaky.

After two attempts at marriage in which both ended colourfully, we remain highly skeptical that the great ruler has empowered himself through, learning, tutelage and research on the very intricate web that is polygamy.

Loud Whispers with Joseph Edgar

We fail to see the maturity needed to steer responsibly a polygamous setting seeing the way and manner these marriages are being contracted.

This is making us in the committee really worried that an implosion which appears inevitable will go a long way in giving our association a bad name.

It is in this wise that we advise the Ooni to suspend further marriages and subject himself to training and tutelage before continuing with this exercise.

We in the committee have resolved to put in place a robust and comprehensive training programme that will take him through the rudiments of polygamy.

Subjects like emotional maturity, emotional balancing, sexual stamina, the joys of sex toys - because he won't have time to go round, in-law management, conflict resolution and rift management, among others.

We will also put his wives through the same training which will involve - self pleasure, humility and respect, conflict management, jealousy management, juju 101 among others.

Works by such great polygamists like Fela Anikulapo Kuti, MKO Abiola, Alafin of Oyo and Oba Tejuoso would be made available.

Lastly, the Polygamist Committee remain fearful of the situation and would like to distance itself from Ife for now except the great monarch agrees to subject himself and his wives to the 30-day training.

We wish him and his new wives well even as we seek his understanding of our position.

Thank you

Duke of Shomolu

Gen. Secretary

Polygamist Committee"

ASUU President and the Night of a Thousand Laughs

The whole thing has come down to this. Asking for transport fare after holding the country down for over eight months. It was always clear from the start that the strike would not achieve anything. Asking for trillions from a government that is broke and insisting on being paid it all was always a class act in tom foolery.

Now that a court has asked them to return to class, they are now asking for transport fare. You see both sides - government and ASUU are just taking the country for a ride and leaving our kids to suffer and the system in dire straits.

They both know the solution but are too corrupted to face it squarely. Sell the schools simple and end this periodic debacle. This is just a brief interlude which I can swear with everything I hold dear, that we will still see this same strike on the same issues.

If ASUU no call strike in the next six months, I will go celibate and for an Ibibio man to say this you know I am not saying this lightly. I tell you. Jokers.

Eyimofe Atake: When Pedigree Meets the Arts

You will not believe that I have never met this fine gentleman physically. But I have met his very beautiful wife, Dorothy. We once attended a course at the Lagos Business School but that was years ago.

Loud Whispers with Joseph Edgar

I, however, have been following his brilliant career and much more importantly his fashion sense. He drips and has the carriage to carry those beautiful pieces.

Anyways, during the week, I reached out. I am bringing my play Ogiame Erejuwa II to Lagos this December and as a prominent Itsekiri young man, I reached out. He immediately jumped on the train. The fact that the very rich and colourful story was coming to Lagos was a huge pull for him. He had supported the first showing in Warri and did not need too much push to join Amaju Pinnick and Julius Rone this time again.

So, guys, if you suddenly get to the gates of the Muson Hall and the gates are flung open for you to enter free to see the 80-man cast on stage with some of the most beautiful costumes you will ever see in your life, just kneel down on the spot and send a little prayer to Mr. Atake.

When pedigree meets the arts - I tell you.

Peter Obi: A Wonderful Sighting

My brother, Rufai Oseni, was having a tribute session for his late father and he invited me. I made it a point of duty to attend since I really do not attend such things. The wahala is usually too much and you know these Yoruba people, they will not serve Afang. Everything is Ewedu and Amala although the women who will be shaking their big bums and be daring you, usually make up for the huge disappointment that is their owambe parties.

But this one was different. Rufai is now the nation's conscience. His take on national issues has thrown him up as our own 'truth speaker'. Furthermore, he is fronting my media campaign for my December plays. We are staging an unprecedented four play series over four weekends and Rufai is the main person fronting both TV and radio campaigns. So, you see why I had to attend, make he no change him mind.

That was how I walked in and saw great writers, Jahman Anikulapo, Dr. Rueben Abati, Udeme Ufot and my brother Austin Ebose, Managing Director at Anchor Insurance. Then my other brother Timi George walked in. Timi is the Managing Director of FBN Custodian. Great guy.

As the usual Amala landed, I looked up and saw him. That was Peter Obi in his usual black outfit. Me, I even wondered how many of that black outfit he has abi na only one that they will be doing wash and dry for him. That dressing abeg is not presidential, na wetin dem dey wear go wake keep for your landlord. Not what presidential hopefuls wear.

Anyways, I imagined what the photo optics will do to my ego and to the many babes who look up to me as a huge influential Nigerian. So I called Rufai, I said, "bro can you introduce me to Mr. Obi?" He said sure.

He took me to the table. As we approached, I saw Jandor. That one was looking at me to come and greet him. Me, to come and look at 'lightweight' politician when we are walking towards Peter Obi? I made it a point to ask my intern who was with me to help me greet Jandor and snap picture with am, while I take my time and get presidential aspirant picture.

That was how Rufai introduced me to Mr. Obi. "This is Edgar, he is the Duke of Shomolu and a columnist with THISDAY." The whole hall was admiring and envying me o. My brother, Kola Adeshina of Sahara Group was beside him and looked up immediately he heard my voice. I just give am 'face' make he do like he nor know me. You know why? As Obi don hear columnists, he don stand up with respect so I didn't want Kola to dey ask me in front of Obi if that shoe he dash me size me. You know, since Kola gave me the shoe, I have not seen him. So, I just 'bone' him and put my serious journalist face on.

"Mr. Obi, I am indeed very privileged to meet you."

Those were the exact words Vice President Osinbajo told me when he came for my Play Awo. So, I save am to use am again. So I unleashed on Mr Obi those words and he smiled in his spare part dealer smile and said, "Oh a pleasure Mr. Duke."

Loud Whispers with Joseph Edgar

So I said, "Oya let us take picture" and he agreed.

As we turned, I noticed his shoe. Kai, this shoe no fine o. Which kind shoe is Labour Party presidential hopeful wearing like this? This shoe be like a cross between Cortina and rainboot. Very ugly and black. With this kind shoe, this man fit no get my vote o. He no see the shoe Udeme Ufot and Kola Adeshina wear beside am? Na wa o.

Well, what concerns me, I am not a Labour Party card-carrying member. I just hinted at my photographer to snap above the waist. Let's leave the shoe out. No energy to explain anything to anybody.

Was nice meeting Mr. Obi though. His humility was gratifying and his sense of warmth was enveloping. But that shoe sha. Kai.

Load-Date: August 22, 2023

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa - Still No Clue Yet On Killers [analysis]

Leadership (Abuja)

October 20, 2011 Thursday

Copyright 2011 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1346 words

Byline: Olaolu Oladipo

Body

---

Consummate journalist, Dele Giwa was killed exactly 25 years ago in his Ikeja, Lagos home. In this piece, examines the life and times of the slain newshound and the difficulties of bringing culprits to book.

Yesterday marked the 25th anniversary of the death of the mercurial and fearless journalist, Mr. Dele Giwa having been gruesomely assassinated by parcel bomb precisely on the 19 October 1986. Giwa, the pioneer editor and co-founder of Newswatch magazine was killed via a parcel bomb in his Ikeja home two days after he reportedly honoured an invitation from men of the State Security Service (SSS).

Though details of what informed the invitation and the answers provided remain in the realm of speculation, it is commonly believed that Giwa might have been a guest of security agents on account of some of the incisive stories published in the magazine.

On that fateful Sunday, Billy, the product of an earlier marriage to Senator Florence Ita Giwa brought a parcel to his father, from the messenger of death who reportedly rode on a bike to the Talabi Street residence of the Giwas. The victim was reportedly having his breakfast with a friend when death came calling.

In the end, the deafening explosion from the parcel of death tore through the lower part of his body, thus putting an abrupt end to the life of one of the nation's finest journalists. Reports have it that his wife, Funmi, and infant daughter were upstairs when the bomb exploded, and were unharmed.

With over two and a half decade since the unfortunate incidence, his death has continued to be a riddle that has defied all known human logic to crack. Like similar other high profile assassinations, Giwa's killers may never be known and brought to book.

Since then, other journalists have been killed in controversial and brutal manner with the state looking helpless in bringing culprits to book. Others who have shared the same cruel fate with Giwa include Baguada Kaltho, the then Kano State correspondent of The News Magazine, who was also blown to shreds by a bomb in Hamdela Hotel, Kaduna in 1996. Like that of Giwa, his death still remains a mystery till date.

The then Kogi correspondent of Concord Newspapers, Mr. Alifa Daniels, only managed to escape death in 1992 in Lokoja, but could not escape the acid bath by yet-to-be identified assailants. Another journalist, Bayo Ohu of

Dele Giwa - Still No Clue Yet On Killers [analysis]

Guardian newspaper on September 20, 2009 was killed under a controversial manner in his home when suspected assassins silenced him with bullets.

One disturbing and common trend about the murder of these journalists is the fact that security agencies and all those charged with providing security to the Nigerian citizens have not been able to fish out even one of the perpetrators of these crimes.

The ripples generated by Giwa's assassination resulted in deafening calls for an inquest into the incidence. The calls arose largely from the gruesome manner the killers carried out their dastardly act. Prior to the act, the nation was yet to witness such callous way of snuffing life out of people.

Nigerians from far and near rose in unison to mourn a consummate newshound who within a very short period of his career set a template for the practice of modern journalism in the country. Many wondered, and still do why a high flying and accomplished journalist would be cut down in his prime. The then military regime of General Ibrahim Babangida was put under intense pressure to fish out the killers of Giwa. This prompted the then Minister of Information; Prince Tony Momoh to come out with the official position of the government on the issue.

When prodded by Giwa's colleagues who by then have felt a deep sense of loss, Momoh, who had initially supported the call later, opted to back out saying "A special probe would serve no useful purpose". The position rather than assuage the feelings of Nigerians further lend credence to the belief that the killing might have been orchestrated within the government.

Members of the human rights community such as the now late Chief Ganiyu Oyesola Fawehinmi, SAN, pointed accusing fingers at former Military President, General Ibrahim Babangida (rtd.), and his security chiefs Brigadier Halilu Akilu, and Colonel Babatunde Togun (both retired) of having a hand in the killing.

To underscore his determination to unmask the killers, the late legal luminary in his quest for justice even went as far as trying to secure an order to sue the security chiefs, an attempt that yielded no fruit as a Lagos High Court exonerated them for lack of evidence.

The human rights lawyer was imprisoned on a number of times in the course of seeking justice by trying to prosecute some prominent heads of security organisations that were believed to have been involved in the murder. Although police investigated the murder, no one was ever prosecuted.

Still not satisfied, Fawehinmi went to the appellate courts where he also lost. He utilized the window provided by government by seeking redress at the Truth and Reconciliation Commission presided over by Justice Chukwudifu Oputa.

Being the country's leader at the time; General Ibrahim Babangida, refused to testify before the commission about the Giwa murder, insisting that he might not get a fair hearing, prompting many to peddle all manner of tales regarding the real killers of the journalist.

Observers believe rightly that his testimony at the commission would put an end to speculations of his involvement (if any) in the murder. Commenting on his inability to attend, the former leader blamed it on the perception that the citizens have formed an opinion and that his attendance would not make much difference in changing the perception.

Expressing his frustrations, veteran journalist and former managing director /editor-in-chief of Tribune Newspapers, Mr. Felix A. Adenaike asserted that killers of the slain editor would never be found.

Speaking recently, Adenaike, stated that the killers would remain at large except the perpetrators are arrested by their conscience and confessed openly. Adenaike made the remark as the reviewer of the book, jogging in the jungle, the Newswatch story edited by Ray Ekpu, the Chief Executive Officer and Editor-In-Chief of Newswatch to commemorate the 25th anniversary of its founding.

Dele Giwa - Still No Clue Yet On Killers [analysis]

For the late journalist, who was born on 16 March 1947 to a humble background working in the palace of the late Sir Adesoji Aderemi, the then Ooni of Ife. He attended Local Authority Modern School in Ile-Ife, gaining admission to Oduduwa College, also in Ile-Ife from where he travelled to the United States of America (USA) for his higher education.

Upon his return to the country in 1976 when the then Managing Director of the Daily Times, Chief Patrick Cole invited him home, Giwa became the features editor of the paper, this helped him raise the writing art to a height of cutting edge excellence and dynamism.

At the then Africa's most prestigious newspaper, his fame rose rapidly prompting the late business mogul turned politician, Chief Bashorun M.K.O. Abiola to invite him to join in starting the Concord Group of Newspapers.

He became the Sunday Concord Editor. His image was larger than life as he moved gradually to become a household name in Nigeria. Unfortunately, disagreement crept into the relationship between Dele Giwa and his employer, leading to his resignation from the paper.

Being a dynamic personality, became part of the quartet that founded Newswatch the first news magazine solely owned by journalists in post-independence Nigeria. Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed established Newswatch in 1984 with the first edition hitting the news stand on January 28, 1985. Nigeria couldn't tap from his talents fully because a year later, a deadly package delivered to his home snuffed life out of the ebullient journalist.

Though the Federal Government in 2008 named streets after Giwa, Fela Anikulapo-Kuti and Ken Saro Wiwa in the Federal Capital Territory- Abuja, observers are of the opinion that the only way to get redress is for culprits in the murder to be brought to book!

Load-Date: October 20, 2011

---

End of Document

So Long A Reading Session For Ray Ekpu

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

August 20, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1599 words

Byline: Nsikak Ekanem

Body

---

NSIKAK EKANEM

The "special reading session" put together on August 6 in Uyo "to celebrate Ray Ekpu", who clocked 75 that day, was designed by Uyo Book Club, the organiser of the event to be an occasion of "literary tribute to a quintessential public intellectual" but the characteristics at the modest ceremony transcended pouring of praises to the veteran journalist and co-founder of Newswatch magazine.

Situated at the heart of Akwa Ibom State capital, Watbridge hotel, where the event was held, is dotted with landmark signatures of intellectual inclination. Within the premises, the event was precisely at Shakespeare room, where pictures hanging on the wall - Shakespeare, Chinua Achebe, Nelson Mandela, Wole Soyinka and Chimamanda Adichie- speak volume of intellectual spicing at the hospitality facility.

The session was an opportunity to savour Ekpu's prose style which came through reading of excerpts of some of his published works in several Newswatch editions. The mentioning by almost everyone in the hall of having one form of identification with the International Editor of the year 1987 lit up the reading session with hilarity, snippets of personal odysseys, agenda setting and mentoring.

Senator Ekong Sampson, who was first trained to be a journalist but veered off into politics even with a PhD in Law, used the occasion to unassumingly distance himself from the "let the poor breathe" parlance trending from the corridors of power in Abuja to remotest villages in every part of the country. He dedicated a four-stanza of 28 lines poem titled, "My Pen is Pregnant" to Ekpu.

Setting a tone for the discourse, Udeme Nana, a Mass Communication scholar and founder of Uyo Book Club, who hailed Ekpu for his humility, which he said made him the only person in the hall calling the former editor of Sunday Times with his first name. According to him, "Ray's words dropped honey and are any reader's delight."

So Long A Reading Session For Ray Ekpu

Tracing from Ekpu's parental background, place of birth, primary and secondary schools he attended, Nana exemplified him as a case study that one's nativity, however remote, is not enough to hinder anyone from growing to recognizable height in the globe. He said that Ekpu "competed and stood head to head with his contemporaries." But with nostalgic reminiscences of the past, Anietie Usen, former General Editor of Newswatch and author of Village Boy, alluded to Achebe that "There was a Country".

Seeing journalism as "the most dangerous career in Nigeria", Nana said Ekpu "stands tall in journalism not only in Nigeria but also in the world". Saying that Ekpu has been writing for the past 50 years, the former Director of Press in the governorship administration of Victor Attah in Akwa Ibom, rationalised the essence of the event with admonition that "people must learn to celebrate their icons in their lifetime' and not roll out the drums when they die." He added: "To be alive to celebrate a milestone birthday at 75 years is a blessing not to be trifled with".

POLL

With sobriety voice, Augustine Okon, co-founder of now rested ADC airline gave revelation of the genesis of his lineage with Ekpu thus: "Ray gave me my first shot to limelight. His story about the rot in Nigeria Airline, where I held sway as Fleet Manager, published on the back page of Sunday Times, spurred me into founding ADC Airline. Today I stand fulfilled as Ibom Air is the grand child of ADC courtesy of Captain Mfon Udom".

ADC (Aviation Development Company) was registered in 1984. It acquired its first airplane in 1991 and started flying as ADC Airlines. With reference to Mfon Udom, one of the directors of the ADC airline, who is currently the chief executive officer of Ibom Air, Okon rhetorically remarked: "Without Ray's story of me, would there have been an ADC (and, by extension, Ibom Air)?"

Ezekiel Nya-Etok, an architect and 2023 governorship candidate of African Democratic Congress (ADC) in Akwa Ibom, traced the story of his cutting-edge in the architectural profession to Ekpu's morale-boosting drive even at a time he was struggling to eke out a living in some other ventures.

Martins Akpan, a medical doctor and author of The Crumb Eaters narrated how he trekked a long distance for several hours during his national youth service days in search of News Stand for Newswatch maiden edition in 1985 because of his passionate interest in reading Ekpu and his colleagues' works. He read Ekpu's famous "A Hollow Ritual" at the reading session.

In some sort of making re-telling his journey in journalism already chronicled in his book, Audacious Journalism, Usen recapped how Dele Giwa, the first Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch and Ekpu influenced his decision to leave The Punch newspaper, where his annual salary was N4, 800, for Newswatch's N4, 300 per annum. According to the Senior Special Assistant on Media and Publicity to Governor Umo Eno of Akwa Ibom State, he was instantly employed in Newswatch without going through formal interview or any other procedural formalities for employment. Nyak-Etok mentored the younger generation that it is the pursuit of excellence, and "not sense of entitlement", that does the game in career development.

With direct address to "Leaders", the senator representing Akwa Ibom South offered advice to those in the political class and others who might have been at discomfiture of journalistic works and intellectual pieces alike: "Don't maim the poet./Don't hang men of letters./Pamper them, for/ Writers are prophets./Scribble their sins on scrolls/Of praise instead./Live among sculptors of conscience."

Apparently referring to the timelessness of some intellectual pieces, including that of Ekpu, the PDP senator asserted that "Truth never expires/Even if it lives like/ An orphan in a thatched house."

Avoiding direct usage of metonymic axiom that "the pen is mightier than the sword", but with exclamation of "what a tyrant" the pen profession is made of, he said the pen industry "Locks, unlocks super highways" and that "The pen speaks many languages" just "In one majesty."

Cautioning public office holders on the path to avoid, Sampson, who has been a council chairman, state legislator and commissioner in Akwa Ibom before moving up to Nigeria's upper legislative chamber in the nation's capital,

So Long A Reading Session For Ray Ekpu

said: "Beware of cheer leaders?" He believes that praise-singers are "Always there for hire." Including himself with the pronoun "We", he reasoned that those in public offices are "Safer with attack dogs/ Than makers of false earth."

On the place of the poor in the societal scheme of things, Ekpu's expression in his column in Newswatch edition of November 16, 1987, was made current. With reference to plan by the then administration of Ibrahim Babangida to remove subsidies in petroleum products, he had stated: "As the cost of these services go up, so as the frustration of lower income Nigerians, a. k. a. the poor. The poor, regrettably, have been at the receiving end of ministerial jokes. Poor bashing has, in recent times, become the favourite pastime of some ministers who have, in the public profile and statements, managed to exhibit suffocating arrogance of colonial administrators by putting their ministerial feet in their ministerial mouths."

After rapt attention to speakers at the event, 27-year old Jennifer Pius, a broadcaster, rendered Ekpu's journalism trajectory in a poem. She described the septuagenarian as "a man who wrote his wrath with the hope for better country" and "cared more about straightening curves in politically mismanaged funds or restructuring dilapidated infrastructures."

Regarding his mentorship and benefactor's role to a number of persons, she stated: "This man called Ray Ekpu has only lived seven decades and five years but his tales has outlived centuries already."

The poem added: "The Village Boy has his chapter, well scripted for the rays beamed on him by Ray Ekpu". Referring to the six times the former chairman of Editorial board of National Concord is said to have been detained, Jennifer said Ekpu "feared no prison bars or court sentences/Yet stooped to build others into stardom and beaming his rays in dark bays".

However, it was observed that some speakers at the event were muttering "Happy birthday" with reserved apprehension following fear that the "birthday boy" might have been struck down by advanced age-induced ailment. In fact, when Brendan Inyang, a brand artist, remarked prayerfully with a wish for the former president of the Commonwealth Journalists Association to live up to 120 years, not a few persons at the event, though chorusing "Amen", murmured with seeming derision. But when Ekpu's baritone voice bellowed with a "thank-you, thank-you .." through loudspeaker on a telephone conversation made by Nya-Etok, the audience got enlivened with body language indicating that Inyang's prayer was not unrealistic and unanswerable.

Inspired by tales of humble beginning of Ekpu and other professionals that spoke at the event, Goodness Nnaji, a Real Estate consultant, who is in her 20s, appeared to have got a boost. In a brief interface with this reporter, Nnaji, who is addressed by some as "Madam Real Estate", was beaming with hope that it is a matter of time her career got blossomed.

Participants at the event cut across academics, lawyers, medical doctors, authors, farmers, aeronautics engineers, pilots, fashion designers, among others.

From accounts of some of the participants, there seems to be a consensus of opinion that the reading ceremony for the celebrated journalist was one event that was full of, but not limited to, exertion of intellectualism.

Ekpu

Load-Date: August 20, 2023

25 Years After, Dele Giwa Rests On, As His Killers Remain Restless [analysis]

This Day (Lagos)

October 20, 2011 Thursday

Copyright 2011 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1164 words

Byline: Chiemelie Ezeobi, Ojo Maduekwe and Abiodun Adeleke

Body

---

While Wednesday marked the 25th anniversary of the death of the media maven, Dele Giwa, it also showcased the defect in the nation's justice system as his killers have remained masked and largely unknown.

It is therefore an undeniable fact to state that the murder of the late veteran journalist is one of the longest unresolved murder cases in Nigeria, what with the cooler to which the case has long been thrown into.

Born in March 16, 1947, Giwa was a regenerate journalist who had a burning desire to revolutionise the entire country with his fiery pen. But his guts and zest were a twin offence to the powers that be. It is believed that he incurred the wrath of his killers on account of his brand of journalism.

Giwa got murdered at his No. 25 Talabi Street, Ikeja, Lagos on Sunday, October 19, 1986 through a letter bomb, making him the first victim of letter-bomb death in Nigeria.

In honour of the slain hero, the Lagos State chapter of the Nigerian Union of Journalists (NUJ) Wednesday organised a symposium tagged, "Hazards of Journalism Profession and the Challenge of the Freedom of Information Law".

Also, family and friends of the deceased journalist held a memorial service at the Archbishop Vining Memorial Cathedral, GRA Ikeja, Lagos.

Speaking to THISDAY after the church service, the deceased's wife and foremost politician, Senator Florence Ita-Giwa, when asked if there was any way the government could have handled the matter better, she parried the question, noting that despite everything, she still had much to thank God for.

She said: "Like we all know, it was a parcel bomb that killed my late husband but asides that, I would not want to talk much on the circumstances surrounding his death."

"Despite everything, the kids are abroad and some of them are in school and they are all doing well as I talk with them almost every day." She however said she would not in any way influence any of her children if they choose to veer into the same career that brutally killed their father, adding that it would be their individual decision.

25 Years After, Dele Giwa Rests On, As His Killers Remain Restless [analysis]

Mr. Kayode Soyinka, who narrowly survived the blast as he was with Giwa when the parcel bomb was opened, lamented that although he survived, his late friend, Dele, did not. He narrated that they were at the deceased's house having breakfast when the missive came in.

Soyinka, then the London Bureau Chief of Newswatch magazine, later fled to the United Kingdom on exile for about eight after the blast. He however came back after his self-imposed exile to join the murky waters of politics. He was a former governorship aspirant in Ogun State in the 2011 elections.

He described the late veteran as an inspirational story for all to learn from. According to him, "although I was trained in the newsroom, Dele Giwa was an inspiration to all that knew him and all that were in the field", adding that, "he was a very courageous and brave man and it is very sad that we have to lose some someone of his calibre. In fact, he was a genius."

During his sermon, Venerable Joseph Odedeji eulogised Giwa as one who stood for the truth.

According to him, Giwa had built a legacy of truth for himself which has endured even after 25 years.

He said: "We are here to celebrate a person who stood for the truth and has left us an enduring legacy. While brother Giwa is enjoying his life in peace, those that killed him are certainly not living a peaceful life.

"This memorial service is to remember the good he did while on earth. The book of Proverbs said that sweet is the remembrance of the righteous and same could be said of Dele Giwa even though he was brutally murdered."

Speaking at the symposium, NUJ Chairman, Lagos State chapter, Mr. Deji Elumoye, restated the union's commitment to continue being vocal and condemnatory of the gruesome way and manner Giwa died until justice runs its course.

Elumoye urged the government as a matter of necessity to revisit all unsolved murders of journalists from 1986 till date using Giwa's murder as a backdrop.

Also speaking on the recent arrest of some editors of The Nation Newspaper, the NUJ National President, Mallam Mohammed Garba, lamented how the simple wrongs of journalists are treated as criminal offence, stressing that it is not acceptable.

The President, Nigeria Guild of Editors/Guest Speaker, Mr. Gbenga Adefaye, noted that the spirit of the new law (Fol) ensures openness, transparency and accountability of public funds.

He noted that, "with this law, we are not yet in the Promised Land but we are far from Egypt. My worry is that once the journalist has vowed to use the law, he must follow due process."

Urging the NUJ to earmark October 19 annually to honour all journalists that were killed in the line of duty, co-founder, Newswatch magazine, Mr. Dan Agbese said: "The Nation Newspaper broke news that has garnered controversy on whether it is either true or false.

The business of journalism and news reporting entails that we as a corporate entity representing other newspapers should help The Nation to prove the credibility of the story."

Also speaking, human rights activist and lawyer, Mr. Femi Falana, lamented that in Nigeria, class segregation comes into play in any crime case.

He said unlike in the United States where the law is no respecter of persons, the reverse is the case in Nigeria where the big-man-syndrome operates, warning that any society that operates otherwise is dead.

According to reports, Giwa was said to be at the breakfast table with one of his colleagues when his son Billy Giwa came in with a white sealed envelope addressed to the deceased.

25 Years After, Dele Giwa Rests On, As His Killers Remain Restless [analysis]

Giwa was also said to have divulged whom the letter bomb came from, although no names were mentioned, rather a designation of office.

The explosion which could have claimed his son was averted by fate which sent the 16-year-old Billy out of the room.

The late Fawehinmi had filed about 38 court cases with several court appearances all in his zeal to see that the culprits were brought to justice.

However, hopes were rife in 2001, when the Justice Chukwudifu Oputa panel was set up to review the death of Giwa.

After investigations led by a senior police officer, Abubakar Tsav, no culprit was fingered in Giwa's death which caused so much furore in the populace. However, over the years, the nation seems to have moved on with anything hardly still said about the case.

Giwa attended the Local Authority Modern School in Lagere, Ile-Ife and then Oduduwa College, Ile Ife. After his degree in English and Communication Arts at the University of Brooklyn, he worked with Daily Times before veering to Sunday Times. From there, he moved to the late Moshood Abiola's paper; the National Concord.

Although he practised from 1979 to 1986, he made his mark and in the process, revolutionised journalism.

Burning with zeal for better reportage in 1984, Giwa and fellow journalists Ray Ekpu, Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed founded the Newswatch Magazine, the publication which has recently been sold to Jimoh Ibrahim, a business man.

Load-Date: October 20, 2011

---

End of Document

Agent From Abuja: An Unending Nigerian Story

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 692 words

Byline: Our Correspondents

Body

---

In the race to create excellent movies and lasting entertainment, many filmmakers forget that one of the primary objectives of any film is to educate and contribute to the body of art that is a country's filmography.

For some filmmakers in Nigeria though, even when they remember this key objective, they focus on the safer issues in society: pure drama, the regular vicissitudes of life as a Nigerian, and stories of love. But as a nation, we all know that there are deeper issues to tackle, and by ignoring these issues, careful filmmakers do the Nigerian audience a disservice.

ABUJA DOCTOR REVEALS HOW OVER 2,000 NIGERIAN MEN ARE NOW NATURALLY OVERCOMING TERRIBLE BEDROOM PERFORMANCE DUE TO THIS BRILLIANT DISCOVERY. DON'T BE A VICTIM!

That cannot be said of Ade Adepegba though, the writer, director and editor of the film, Agent From Abuja.

An Afrocentric political thriller, the 2020 film follows the story of four young idealistic Nigerians in London, UK who kidnap a Nigerian politician to recover stolen millions to help people back in their homeland. The politician, who is a former state Governor has fled Nigeria in the aftermath of a failed assassination by an unnamed security agency. He arrives in London only to be kidnapped.

ALSO READ

True to his type, the politician uses mind games to try and turn the four kidnappers against one another. But like every good movie, there is a twist, and the deadlier enemy is among the young kidnappers. One of them is an undercover agent with orders to recover documents, kill the governor and leave no witnesses.

In the course of the film, not only are the harsh realities of politics brought to bear in a fictional manner, the writer draws on existing Nigerian tragedies brought about by political issues. The reference to the brutal assassination of foremost Nigerian journalist, Dele Giwa and erudite lawyer and Minister of Justice, Chief Bola Ige gives the audience hope that political martyrs are not forgotten in Nigeria.

Agent From Abuja : An Unending Nigerian Story

This, coupled with the revelations of the level of power and the corruption that exists in the hearts and hands of many in governance, is the picture the filmmaker paints.

Agent From Abuja is not just another film to be added to the scores of movies produced for Nigeria daily and marketed at 51, Iweka Road, Onitsha. Those are only good for cementing Nigeria's Nollywood as the third biggest film industry in the world. But with the making of Agent From Abuja, a truly relatable movie shot with the artistry of a master motion picture maker, Nigeria's literature of factual films that are a representation of the political truths grow a step higher.

Asides some varying African accents too far from Nigerians' language nuances and a few small continuity errors, the film passes its message clearly. Such includes a message of corruption even within an agency dedicated to security and justice; the blind religiosity that can become a devout human beings pitfall; renewed dependence of today's youth on what is comfortable and the wishy-washy way the nation's leaders run its affairs.

Just like the actual Nigerian story, the movie ends with no defined resolution, happy ending or eventual solution. The survivors of the kidnap situation cannot be trusted to deliver the acquired resources, and just as it constantly happens in the real world, the idealistic youths become a part of the corrupt cycle. In its ending, the movie puts all these corrupt qualities into play to raise many questions that no one can truthfully answer.

The five-man cast film stars Victor Power, Chris Machari, Toheeb Ibrahim, Yvonne Hays and Sokari Erekosima.

Agent From Abuja is now available on Amazon.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/24/159546363549.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/29/159546363593.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/60/159546363638.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/76/159546363639.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/46/159546363683.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/87/159546363728.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/61/159546363729.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/49/159546363773.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/37/159546363776.jpeg>

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

Dele Giwa's Assassination - the Verdict of History

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 19, 2016

Copyright 2016 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2228 words

Byline: Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed

Body

---

October 19 this year marks the 30th anniversary of the gory assassination of Dele Giwa, the first Editor in Chief of Newswatch, Nigeria's path-breaking newsmagazine. Dele's life was cynically shortened by the novel method of a parcel bomb that was delivered to his house at No. 25 Talabi Street, Ikeja, Lagos on Sunday October 19, 1986 at mid-day.

Since then a lot of water has passed under the bridge. The matter has continued to be in the laser glare of the public eye. Those who did the dirty job may have thought that killing the famous journalist will be a quick job, quickly done and quickly forgotten. Yes, it was quickly done but obviously not quickly forgotten: thirty years down the road the matter is not dead. It is alive and well and not ready to die any time soon.

However, over the last 15 years or so a man who played a tangential, supervisory role in the matter, Chris Omeben, has been doing his ineffectual best to mislead the public on the matter by playing footsie with the facts. Mr. Omeben who retired as Deputy Inspector General of Police in 1989 is now the Archbishop of Jesus Families Ministries. He will be 81 years old on October 27 this year.

With a frisson of surprise this man has been effing and jeffing apparently championing the cause of his sponsors but his sloppy analysis is not receiving a storm of applause from the public. It is apparent that the public knows that this man is a truth-shredder. While he has the intuitive freedom to lie we have the obligatory duty to put the facts before the public, since he has been pointing accusing fingers in various directions. These include Florence Ita Giwa, Dele's ex-wife, Kayode Soyinka, Newswatch London Bureau Chief at the time and Dele's colleagues, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed. His flippant gyration on the matter therefore deserves a multilateral response so that his lies will not be inadvertently validated and the hard earned reputations of innocent people are not brought down by his swinging axe.

(1)Kayode Soyinka: Kayode Soyinka was the London Bureau Chief of Newswatch. He was in Lagos for an official business and lodged at Dele's residence. Omeben has sought, vainly, to pin the assassination on him simply because he was in the study together with Dele when the parcel bomb exploded. Omeben says he sent out people to locate him but he could not be found. "We later learnt that he went out of the country through Idi-Iroko." This is a farrago of lies.

Here are the facts: Kayode was sitting opposite Dele when his son Billy delivered the parcel to his father. When the parcel exploded at Dele's attempt to open it, Kayode was thrown on the floor. His ears were damaged and he was hospitalized at First Foundation Hospital in Ikejawhere Dele was rushed to after the incident. For more than a year Kayode's ears were dysfunctional.

Dele Giwa's Assassination - the Verdict of History

Mr. Omeben says that Kayode left the room where he and Dele were as soon as Billy Giwa brought in the parcel. He says Kayode stayed out until the parcel exploded. "It was while he was there in an adjacent room that the parcel detonated; the metal partition separating the dinning room and the kitchen was destroyed. Lies! Omeben thinks that since the two men were said to have just had breakfast, the breakfast session was in the dinning room. And dinning rooms are more often than not near the kitchen. This is pure conjecture. They had their breakfast in the study, not in the dinning room and the study was not near the dinning room or kitchen.

Kayode was never in hiding. After the bomb explosion which rendered Dele's residence uninhabitable. Kayode and members of Dele's family moved into Ray Ekpu's wing of the building. Dele and Ray lived in this twin duplex. Infact, Kayode was interviewed by several newspapers during the period that he was in Nigeria; he was interviewed by the Police at least twice and he submitted written statements to them; he attended Dele's burial at Ugbekpe Ekperi in Edo State along with other Newswatch staff.

Mr. Omeben has said that Newswatch directors shielded Kayode from being arrested by the police. This is a lie. Throughout the period of this incident Kayode was available. He was not a fugitive from justice. He was a victim of the dastardly act. If we prevented Kayode from being arrested by the police (and we deny it vehemently) why did the Police not arrest us for obstruction?

If Kayode was considered a suspect in the matter why have the Police not arrested him since then because criminal cases are not time barred.Kayode has come to Nigeria very many times in the past 30 years without the police accosting him. Twice, he contested elections for the governorship of Ogun State, campaigning there for months on each occasion. Why was he not arrested by the Police?

The allegation that Kayode escaped from the country through the NADECO route at Idi Iroko is nonsense. Kayode left Nigeria through the Murtala Muhammed International Airport on British Caledonian Airways accompanied by his wife and children who had to join him in Nigeria when they heard of the incident. This information can be crosschecked with the various authorities at the Murtala Muhammed Airport.

Before Kayode left Nigeria on Sunday November 16, 1986 the Police had come the day before, that is Saturday November 15, 1986 asking him to make a statement on his movement between the day of the bomb blast and the time of his discharge from the hospital. He did. But curiously and fully aware that Kayode had left Nigeria the day before the police came on Monday November 17, 1986 to say they had some more questions for Kayode. A letter signed by A. Kaltungo, Deputy Commissioner of Police was delivered to Ray Ekpu. The letter asked Kayode to report to the Police on Wednesday November 19, 1986. Ray replied to the letter that same day informing the police (as if they didn't know) that Kayode had returned to London. He gave the police Kayode's London address and phone numbers. It is elementary wisdom that no one could sit in a room where he knew a bomb was going to explode except he is a suicide bomber. And Kayode was not one. He had a wife and children and a flourishing career. His demographics do not fit into a sensible analyst's silhouette of a suicide bomber.

For every crime there must be a motive. Why would Kayode want to kill his Editor in Chief? If he killed Dele he would never have become the next Editor in Chief of the magazine. He would have had to kill Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese, Yakubu Mohammed, Soji Akinrinade, Nosa Igiebor, Dele Omotunde, Onome Osifo Whisky and a few other senior editorial staff to get to the Editor in Chief's chair.

It is curious that a policeman who retired as a Deputy Inspector General of Police does not know that a murder allegation does not expire and that even if Kayode lives in London, Interpol could have got him to come to Nigeria and answer for the alleged crime if the Nigeria Police had concrete information on his involvement.

(2)Newswatch Directors: Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and YakubuMohammed. Mr. Omeben has alleged a couple of times that there was boardroom politics in Newswatch where the board members would want to eliminate themselves. The external board members of Newswatch were all successful businessmen who only invested in

Dele Giwa's Assassination - the Verdict of History

Newswatch because we the executive directors - Ray, Dan, Yakubu - were their friends. There was nothing for them to fight for in Newswatch.

But Mr. Omeben has mentioned the three of us a few times by namemaking allegations or insinuations that tend to give the impression that we were suspects in the case. This is a most uncharitable, wicked and despicable piece of defamation. In the first place, we never had any crisis of notable dimension that could have warranted the existence of a plot to kill our friend and business partner. If we killed Dele what would we get? His Newswatch shares? We have our own. His wife? We have our own. His children? We have our own. The position of Editor in Chief? Most unlikely for four reasons: (a) Each of the four of us had been editor of a newspaper or two before we came together so the editorial chair did not offer such an overwhelming attraction for any of us to harbour the thought of physically eliminating our friend and business partner (b) All the four of us were on the same salary and allowances. No one earned higher and no one earned lower than the other. (c) The positions in Newswatch at its inception were determined by Ray and Yakubu. Both of them decided that since Dele and Dan were unfairly treated in their last offices in Concord and New Nigerian, it was wise to assert our confidence in the two of them by offering them the positions of Editor in Chief and Managing Director respectively. Ray and Yakubu opted to be called Executive Editors. It was not a mark of anybody's superiority or inferiority because we all took active part in the editorial activities of the magazine and had equal shares (15 percent) in the company. It was meant to be a confidence booster for the two men. (d) The three of us believe in the inviolability of friendship. We see it as a bank account to which you must continue to make deposits so that it can grow. It is a sacred relationship, a present of unquantifiable value that you must give to yourself. So our world view does not include killing your friend for whatever reason. No reason is good enough for "friend-ticide." A lot of people ask us what is the magic behind our strong relationship of almost 40 years. The answer: friendship. We retired from Newswatch on May 5, 2011 but we are still together today, why? Friendship.

Since that fateful day of October 19, 1986 our lawyer, Chief GaniFawehinmi, had made every effort, using the mechanism of the courts from High Court to the Supreme Court to bring the suspects to justice. At every turn that resolute and indefatigable fighter was harassed, assaulted, charged to court on trumped up charges so as to kill the matter.

Every effort was made by the Babangida government to kill the magazine and render us jobless by the proscription of the magazine in April 1987 on spurious charges. Our corporate and personal accounts were frozen. We continued to pursue the assassination issue with as much vigour as we could. On September 11, 1987 we wrote a letter to the then Inspector General of Police, Alhaji Muhammu Gambo, reminding him about the Dele Giwa matter. We never got even the courtesy of a response from Alhaji Gambo. We also appeared at the Oputa panel with Chief Fawehinmi in Lagos and Abuja in pursuit of justice.

Murder is a criminal matter. Isn't it curious, therefore, that people who are accused of murder should seek to run away from the opportunity to clear their "good names." We would have thought they would embrace such an opportunity warmly instead of engaging in legal gymnastics

Worthy of note is the fact that Alhaji Abubakar Tsav, the investigating Police Officer, had testified at the Oputa panel on July 3, 2001 in Abuja. He told the panel that in his interim report he had recommended that Col. Halilu Akili and Lt. Col. A.K.Togun should be made available for interrogation and voice identification. He also recommended that their special privileges should be withdrawn so that a search could be conducted in their offices and residences for items of evidential value. The case file was submitted to Mr. Omeben. He never returned the case file to Mr. Tsav, nor did he reassign the case to someone else. He simply sat on the matter until he retired.

Since his retirement Mr. Omeben has been claiming that we had very powerful links in government so we were able to block the investigation. This view is quite flattering but it is patently false. We had no such influence otherwise we would have blocked the proscription of the magazine, our serial detentions for spurious reasons, the freezing of our accounts. Mr. Omeben's words are aflame with dishonesty. He is evidently a truth shredder who works as an echo chamber of his sponsors. But truth is like pregnancy: you can't hide it for too long.

Dele Giwa's Assassination - the Verdict of History

During the Oputa panel deliberations in 2001 Ibrahim Babangida, Akilu and Togun went to court and obtained an order restraining the Commission from summoning them to appear before it. Justice Oputa said that the Commission had the power to issue arrest warrants for the trio but decided against this "in the interest of national reconciliation."

Murder is a criminal matter. Isn't it curious, therefore, that people who are accused of murder should seek to run away from the opportunity to clear their "good names." We would have thought they would embrace such an opportunity warmly instead of engaging in legal gymnastics.

However, the panel in its report stated: "As for the case of Dele Giwa we are of the view that beyond the legal technicalities that some of the key witnesses clung to, the federal government should be encouraged to reopen this case for proper investigation." It stated further: "On General Ibrahim Babangida, we are of the view that there is evidence to suggest that he and the two security chiefs, Brigadier General Halilu Akilu and Col. A.K.Togun are accountable for the death of Dele Giwa by letter bomb. We recommend that this case be reopened for further investigation in the public interest."

We urge the Buhari government to reopen the matter and ensure that the growing scourge of assassinations in the country is guillotined.

Load-Date: October 19, 2016

---

End of Document

Agent From Abuja: An Unending Nigerian Story

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 660 words

Byline: Tomi Falade

Body

---

the race to create excellent movies and lasting entertainment, many filmmakers forget that one of the primary objectives of any film is to educate and contribute to the body of art that is a country's filmography.

For some filmmakers in Nigeria though, even when they remember this key objective, they focus on the safer issues in society: pure drama, the regular vicissitudes of life as a Nigerian, and stories of love. But as a nation, we all know that there are deeper issues to tackle, and by ignoring these issues, careful filmmakers do the Nigerian audience a disservice.

That cannot be said of Ade Adepegba though, the writer, director and editor of the film, Agent From Abuja.

ABUJA DOCTOR REVEALS HOW OVER 2,000 NIGERIAN MEN ARE NOW NATURALLY OVERCOMING TERRIBLE BEDROOM PERFORMANCE DUE TO THIS BRILLIANT DISCOVERY. DON'T BE A VICTIM!

An Afrocentric political thriller, the 2020 film follows the story of four young idealistic Nigerians in London, UK who kidnap a Nigerian politician to recover stolen millions to help people back in their homeland. The politician, who is a former state Governor has fled Nigeria in the aftermath of a failed assassination by an unnamed security agency. He arrives in London only to be kidnapped.

True to his type, the politician uses mind games to try and turn the four kidnappers against one another. But like every good movie, there is a twist, and the deadlier enemy is among the young kidnappers. One of them is an undercover agent with orders to recover documents, kill the governor and leave no witnesses.

ALSO READ

In the course of the film, not only are the harsh realities of politics brought to bear in a fictional manner, the writer draws on existing Nigerian tragedies brought about by political issues. The reference to the brutal assassination of foremost Nigerian journalist, Dele Giwa and erudite lawyer and Minister of Justice, Chief Bola Ige gives the audience hope that political martyrs are not forgotten in Nigeria.

Agent From Abuja : An Unending Nigerian Story

This, coupled with the revelations of the level of power and the corruption that exists in the hearts and hands of many in governance, is the picture the filmmaker paints.

Agent From Abuja is not just another film to be added to the scores of movies produced for Nigeria daily and marketed at 51, Iweka Road, Onitsha. Those are only good for cementing Nigeria's Nollywood as the third biggest film industry in the world. But with the making of Agent From Abuja, a truly relatable movie shot with the artistry of a master motion picture maker, Nigeria's literature of factual films that are a representation of the political truths grow a step higher.

Asides some varying African accents too far from Nigerians' language nuances and a few small continuity errors, the film passes its message clearly. Such includes a message of corruption even within an agency dedicated to security and justice; the blind religiosity that can become a devout human beings pitfall; renewed dependence of today's youth on what is comfortable and the wishy-washy way the nation's leaders run its affairs.

Just like the actual Nigerian story, the movie ends with no defined resolution, happy ending or eventual solution. The survivors of the kidnap situation cannot be trusted to deliver the acquired resources, and just as it constantly happens in the real world, the idealistic youths become a part of the corrupt cycle. In its ending, the movie puts all these corrupt qualities into play to raise many questions that no one can truthfully answer.

The five-man cast film stars Victor Power, Chris Machari, Toheeb Ibrahim, Yvonne Hays and Sokari Erekosima.

The five-man cast film stars Victor Power, Chris Machari, Toheeb Ibrahim, Yvonne Hays and Sokari Erekosima and is produced by Kuramo Bay Filmworks.

Agent From Abuja is now available on Amazon.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/1/159565025494.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/76/159565025496.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/61/159565025496.jpeg>

Load-Date: July 25, 2020

---

End of Document

Media Trust Chairman, Others Get Newswatch Awards

Daily Trust (Abuja)

December 9, 2010 Thursday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 297 words

Byline: Mohammed Shosanya

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

The Chairman of Media Trust Limited Malam Kabiru Yusuf and 17 others were Tuesday given awards by Newswatch Communications Limited for their outstanding contributions to the journalism profession in the country.

They were given the awards at Newswatch's 25th anniversary dinner held at Planet One in Maryland, Lagos.

Other personalities who got awards include the late human rights activist, Chief Gani Fawehinmi, Publisher of Vanguard Newspaper Sam Amuka, Managing Director of Insight Communications Biodun Sobanjo, former president of the Nigerian Union of Journalists Funke Fadugba and Tolu Ogunkoya. Others include Yemi Ogunbiyi and Niyi Alonge.

Earlier in his welcome address, Chairman of Newswatch Communications Limited Mr.Ray Ekpu said the personalities were given the awards as a reward for being friends of Newswatch and journalism in Nigeria.

Ekpu, who recounted the ordeals the magazine has passed through since it began 25years ago, thanked Nigerians for their continued support even when one of its arrowheads, Dele Giwa, was killed through a parcel bomb.

He disclosed that as a way of immortalizing Dele Giwa, the company had concluded plans to erect his marble statue in his village in Edo State.

He said the company had also instituted an award in four universities in the country offering Mass Communication in honour of the late journalist. N50,000 will go to the best students in each of the universities for five years.

Ekpu further said the company would continue to publish the magazine with more incisive, analytical and thought provoking content in order to keep the memory of Dele Giwa alive.

In his remarks, Chairman of Newswatch Board of Directors, Chief Alex Akinyele described the magazine as a piece which has stood the test of time in spite of several ordeals.

Load-Date: December 9, 2010

Media Trust Chairman, Others Get Newswatch Awards

---

End of Document

Tompolo and the Niger Delta oil thieves

The Guardian

October 17, 2022 Monday

Copyright 2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

TheGuardian

Length: 1213 words

Body

---

In his sermon titled, A Tough and Tender Heart, Martin Luther King Jr., wrote, "the strong man holds in a living blend strongly marked opposites. The idealists are not usually realistic, and the realists are not usually idealistic&hellip; but life at its best is a creative synthesis of opposites in a fruitful harmony." Dr. Martin should know, he was a blend of strongly marked opposites.

Tompolo has been reviled for precisely this quality which Rev. Martin Luther King Jr identifies as the mark of strong men. In the last few weeks, it has been open season on Tompolo for accepting to fight the crude oil thieves in the Niger delta who are despoiling our environment and degrading our economic capacity.

Unsurprisingly, the media has been at the very forefront of the fight, from baiting him with threats of a creek war which has not materialised, to disinterring the bodies of mute allegations of crime long since judicially interred. The surprise is the laziness of the allegations, but then it is not surprising. The media in Nigeria is more appropriately known for its feeding frenzy than its investigative tendencies, since the death of the iconic Dele Giwa. And don't get me wrong the likes of Nosa Igiebor, Dimgba Igwe, Dele Olojede, Waziri etc took after his footsteps but those footsteps have now petered out.

The laziness of the allegations against Tompolo border on what the Americans would refer to as asininity. Take the allegations by several editorial boards of newspapers including The Guardian Newspapers repeating the canards that Tompolo earlier stole from the government because he was wrongly charged with crimes he did not commit and was cleared by the courts, and there are no appeals against the judgments. Just because he could not be convicted in a court of law, he must be convicted in the court of rumour mongers. Anyone but a lazy press could have investigated the cases or the back stories to the cases. There is no question that Tompolo was charged with allegations of crime. The ensuing legal battle lasted over five years but he was vindicated.

First the back story, Tompolo had a vision of quickly industrialising the Niger Delta and after careful analysis came to the conclusion that there was a convergence of interests between the region and the Nation and it was not in oil, but maritime development. As is the case with him, he chose a team with pedigree to steer this process. The team identified the weaknesses in the system and tried to overcome them. The Nation had no degree awarding institution for maritime training, the nearest was in faraway Cairo, so Nigeria needed a full-blown maritime university. The Nation had no maritime domain awareness so we needed a strengthened entity to bolster maritime domain awareness, we had no grade level dry docking facility so we needed a World class dry dock, etc. But how are we to pay for these, since the Federal Government had no money to invest in these highly capital-intensive projects? The solution lay in public private sector partnership where Government invests zero kobo and reaps massive dollar rewards.

Tompolo and the Niger Delta oil thieves

As is customary with Tompolo, he moved with zeal. A deal was struck with NIMASA to provide it with 12 military grade vessels for high sea patrol and maritime domain awareness on the basis of no cure no pay. Investments in excess of $60 million was made and the process began to pay off. What did we hear? Why is Government paying Tompolo so much money? Next thing, the contract was technically suspended with the imposition of criminal charges, itself a violation of the terms of the contract. The contract was never formally terminated, till today. By the way, for those who followed the story, Nigeria thereafter had to pay an Israeli company $165 million for something she earlier pay zero kobo for. We are still awaiting the returns on Nigeria's money. Importantly, no one, not even the lazy editorial boards are asking why is maritime domain awareness, a matter of national security, in the hands of foreigners?

But Tompolo is the villain, for trying to solve a peculiar Nigerian problem and double the villain for succeeding, hence the hysteria. Surprisingly, no one is asking why Nigeria had to spend so much for what it needed to spend nothing only a couple years ago. Or why the investment is not yielding even with the multi-million dollar spent? Nigerian journalists don't ask those types of questions, because those types of questions and the answers they may lead to don't sell newspapers. Comparative analysis, investigative journalism and the like, allegedly bore Nigerian readers and no newspaper house wants to go bankrupt. Easier, to allege sleaze, make up a story, look for easy targets and make a villain of them and if they don't comply by being as bad as you wish they were, no harm in trying your hand at graffiti.

That's how you put foot on your family's table, it's all in a day's job. It's not as bad as the politicians who are stealing money in bags. Why should a journalist care about the national interest if the politicians don't. It is important that Nigerians understand the rationale for much journalistic endeavour in Nigeria today is stomach infrastructure. The company associated with Tompolo in the fight against the abuse of our maritime domain was prosecuted along with Tompolo on charges that it has benefited unduly from the public private sector arrangement with the Government. At the time the case commenced, it was in its third year in a ten-year contract. Assuming it had indeed benefitted unduly from the contract, which was eventually proved to be untrue, it had seven years of value to give and the government could have recouped 3 years of losses from seven years of adjustments, no?

A person has to be asinine to stop a contract that was giving him 150% on the mere suspicion that he may have lost 3% Of 150% when he has 7 more years from which to benefit and recover the 3% alleged to have been lost in 3 years. Asininity. But it happened.

It was the allegation of 3% loss that Tompolo's accusers could not prove in court for 5 years and had their case dismissed at the no case submission stage. Lawyers and interested persons know what a no case submission means. For others, it means you had a suspicion which was examined by the court and it turned out that you were wrong. It's a normal human occurrence to assume that someone was trying to slight you if you feel disrespected. What isn't normal is to insist you were disrespected after you were handed proof you were wrong. So, assume someone accused you of disrespecting them, but as it turns out were undergoing some personal tragedy and were absent minded. Now your friend reports you to your circle of friends, who constitute a 'committee' to investigate your disrespect. You tell them about the personal tragedy that left you distraught. They investigate your alibi of personal tragedy. It holds up. They ask you and your friend to shake hands. It was all a misunderstanding. That's normal. You shake hands and make up.

To be continued tomorrow

Dr. Bebenimibo is media consultant to High Chief Government Ekpmupolo (Tompolo)

In this article Niger Delta

Tompson and the Niger Delta oil thieves

oil thieves

Tompson

Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on WhatsApp Share on Telegram

2022 GUARDIAN Newspapers.

Load-Date: August 22, 2023

---

End of Document

Between church and World Cup finals

The Sun (Nigeria)

December 23, 2022 Friday

Copyright 2022 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1088 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

In life, we are sometimes faced with making a difficult choice between two desirable or undesirable alternatives. Among students of literature, it's called Sophie's Choice. I first read about it in the Parallax Snaps column of my editor and mentor, the legendary Dele Giwa.

Sophie's Choice is the title of a novel by the American writer William Styron in which a mother is forced to make the painful decision of which of her children will die. It became a movie which won the actress Meryl Streep her first Academy Award for Best Actress. I pray that you will not be pushed into a dire strait where you will have to choose which of your children to sacrifice.

Last Sunday, the Qatar World Cup climaxed into a suspense-filled finale to produce one of the finest finals ever witnessed in the history of the World Cup. An encounter between two soccer giants: Argentina and France. A duel between two Paris Saint-Germain FC teammates: Lionel Messi and Kylian Mbappe. Two extraordinary strikers and living legends of the beautiful game of football. Two mesmerizing goal poachers who carried the hopes and aspirations of their countries to win the World Cup.

As a journalist, columnist and a lover of football, I knew my readers would feel so disappointed not reading my take on the World Cup finals—with all its twist and turns. Nothing was going to stop me from watching and reporting on the denouement of this soccer fiesta which according to FIFA has been the "best ever" World Cup. Nothing was going to stop me. Nothing! So I thought.

Then came this invitation to read one of the Bible lessons at our church's Christmas Carol service on the very day of the World Cup. What a mighty clash! The World Cup was to start at four o'clock in the evening, whereas the Christmas Carol was to kick off at five o'clock. Just as I was figuring how to kill two birds with one stone, a phone call from Baba Ayodele, our chairman and leader of the Elders' Group came, reminding me of the need to be in church on time. You can imagine how I felt.

Between church and World Cup finals

"The World Cup sir," I blurted out what was uppermost on my mind. "I just have to watch this important game and cover it in my column. This is the World Cup finals."

"Elder Mike, what is more important than the work of God?" Baba fired back like a chiding father to a prodigal son. "Can't they record it for you?"

His headmaster-like style reminded me of my late friend, Pastor Dimgba Igwe who never cared a hoot about football and its associated madness. World Cup or no World Cup, Pastor Dimgba Igwe would have said the same thing: "The things of God must come first. Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things will be added to you. Matthew 6: 33."

I gave Baba my word to be in church by five o'clock. Since the match was starting by 4 o'clock, at least I would watch the first half and zoom straight to church thereafter.

Meanwhile, I had been praying all along for Lionel Messi. For God, the all merciful to show Messi mercy and to finally give Messi this elusive Holy Grail of a World Cup to be the crowning glory of all his terrestrial superlative achievements in the field of football. It wasn't as if I wanted Argentina to win but Messi in particular. I wasn't alone in this.

Before I left home, Argentina was leading 2-0. Thanks to the clocklike precision of a well-taken Messi penalty and a Messi-involved goal scored by Angel Di Maria shortly after. It was Messi all the way!

As I drove to church, it was with the assurance and faith that Argentina had already won based on how it dominated the first half. It was almost like a walkover with France against the ropes being pummelled boxing-like by Argentina. But in football, it's never over until it's over.

Inside the church, I enjoyed the Carol service, the timeless and evocative Christmas songs I had heard all my 70 years on earth, the singing and dancing to commemorate the greatest event in human history: how God's Son came to the world in human form, grew up like any of us, was crucified, died and resurrected for the atonement of our sins. For our sake, God sacrificed His only Son in the divine ultimate Sophie's Choice so that "anyone who believes in Him shall not perish, but have eternal life."

In church, my mortal mind was still out there, wondering who had won the World Cup. I was tempted to surreptitiously steal a glance at my phone and the result shocked me: Argentina 2, France 2.

Eventually, I was called to the pulpit where I read from Matthew 2: 9-11. It was the story of the Three Wise men: "When they had heard the king, they departed; and lo, the star, which they saw in the East, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down, and worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold and frankincense and myrrh."

Before I read the above passage I first had to capture the hearts of my listeners by confessing my Sophie's Choice experience. I then asked the congregation: "How many of you know that today is World Cup finals?" And behold, majority of hands were raised amidst a roar of applause. From the interaction, I even got to know that many of them inside church already knew the final scores, that Argentina had won 4-2 through penalty shootouts.

"Oh, I didn't know you all are accomplices," I said, pointing my finger at them humorously to evoke more laughter and applause. Then I prayed.

As you read this column, I pray the same prayer that I prayed for my listeners in the congregation. Like the Three Wise Men, God will give you wisdom to be able to face the challenges and opportunities of life. I pray that your star will shine like the star which the Wise Men saw. Whatever you are searching for, you will find it in Jesus name.

Between church and World Cup finals

Finally, like the Three Wise Men, may you find Jesus. And if you find Jesus, may there be a great turnaround in your life. May you never be the same again.

I wish you Merry Christmas and a glorious New Year of astounding achievements in 2023. May you and your children score great goals like Lionel Messi and Kylie Mbappe in all aspects of your life to win your own World Cup to the glory of God Almighty. In our forthcoming elections, may God who gave Messi victory give Nigeria and Nigerians their victory in the mighty name of Jesus, the name above all names.

Thank you, Lord!

Load-Date: December 23, 2022

---

End of Document

Imo guber: I didn't expect my application for review would be rejected - Ihedioha

Imo guber: I didn't expect my application for review would be rejected - Ihedioha

Sunday Trust

March 8, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 Media Trust Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 669 words

Body

---

A former Governor of Imo State, Emeka Ihedioha, has expressed regrets over the judgement of the Supreme Court, which rejected his appeal for the review of the apex court's January 14 ruling that sacked him as the governor of the state.

Speaking for the first time on the March 3 court's ruling, Ihedioha said the judgement will have a long term implication on the country's jurisprudence.

He lauded his team of lawyers for raising the bar in legal arguments, stressing that he was amazed at 'how number four could become number one.'

'On Tuesday, 3rd March 2020, the Supreme Court of Nigeria gave a ruling rejecting our application to set aside its earlier judgement of 14th January 2020 on the Imo State governorship election.

'This is certainly not the outcome we wanted or we worked so hard for and I know how disappointed you must feel.

'While it is disheartening to note that your desire to introduce good governance has been halted, at least for now, it is also gratifying that our modest efforts have not gone unnoticed.

'I therefore feel a sense of pride and gratitude for the wonderful energy and commitment that we deployed together to secure the mandate that has now been brazenly stolen from us,' he said.

Ihedioha, who thanked all those who played one role or another in his quest for justice, especially members of the diplomatic community for voicing their concerns for the stability of the country, commended the Chairman and members of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) for their vanguard role and leadership during this period.

He added: 'In particular, my special thanks go to all Imo citizens for their uncommon support, solidarity, and collective outrage. Never have a people been so united and committed to a cause.'

'You prayed, fasted, marched, protested and even cried. You sacrificed your time, resources, and endeavour for this just cause. On this matter, the people of Imo State collectively rose to demand for justice and fairness.'

Imo gubernatorial election: I didn't expect my application for review would be rejected - Ihedioha

'Imo people rose up in defence of their right to elect leaders of their choice. Our people resoundingly rejected oppression and power grab, defied imposition, injustice and tyranny. I salute Imo people for this display of courage in the face of oppressive state power.'

'I will forever be in the debt of Nigerians of all walks of life, across ethnic, religious and political divides, senior citizens, journalists, civil societies, ordinary men and women of good conscience, who added their voice to condemn the injustice done in our case.'

'These are people unknown to me personally but who could not bear the illogic of turning number four to number one on the basis of a fraudulently procured result, and appealed to the Supreme Court to save itself and our judiciary.'

'Whatever may be the personal injury I suffer as a result of the miscarriage of justice, my main concern in this whole tragic episode is not about me. It has always been about the implications this judgement could have for the future of our democracy and the right of the electorate to have their votes count.'

'If institutions that are critical to the entrenchment of rule of law could thwart the wishes of the people in a cynical manner, where lies the future of our democracy? That was why I sought a review of the Supreme Court judgement.'

'Even though justice was not served at the end, the well articulated dissenting judgement delivered by His Lordship, Justice Centus Nweze, has vindicated our stand. I am sure that history and posterity will be kind to him.'

'To those who are rejoicing about their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people, as well as their collaborators, let me leave them with the immortal words of the late journalist, Dele Giwa: 'No evil deed will go unpunished; any evil done by man to man will be redressed; if not now then certainly later; if not by man, then by God for the victory of evil over good is temporary'.

'We believe that God will render the ultimate judgement. He has been with us through this peaceful struggle. And our future is in His hands.'

Load-Date: March 13, 2020

---

End of Document

Journalist With A Heart: Nkanga Gets Reward For Courage

Nigerian Tribune

March 16, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 659 words

Body

---

Multilingual investigative journalist, Peter Nkanga, has won the first ever Jamal Khashoggi Award for Courageous Journalism for 2019.

The award is an initiative of the US-based global human rights foundation, Inti Raymi Fund.

In a letter signed by Anas Talalqa, Human Rights Advisor at Inti Raymi Fund, the organisation congratulated Mr Nkanga for his selection for the award, noting that 'the award honours the brave journalists who expose abuse of power and corruption, share difficult truths, discuss taboo topics, and work in hostile environments.

'For true democracy to work, there must be a free press.'

Stephen Nkanga, also a former West Africa representative of the Committee to Protect Journalists, and winner of the online category of the Wole Soyinka Award for Investigative Reporting 2010, tweeted in excitement over the award:

'Today I was announced a winner of the 'Jamal Khashoggi Award for Courageous Journalism' by @IntiRaymiFund.

'I dedicate this award to all journalists and human rights defenders in #Africa. The struggle is real, but it is not over until We Win. #JusticeForJamal.'

A fierce advocate for press freedom, Peter has been at the forefront of the campaign for the rights of journalists in Nigeria and across sub-Saharan Africa.

In 2018, he spearheaded the advocacy for the release of Jones Abiri, the publisher of Bayelsa State-based weekly paper, Weekly Source, who was arrested by operatives of the Directorate of State Security in July 2016.

He also coordinated the advocacy and protests in Nigeria on Jamal Khashoggi, the Saudi journalist who was murdered at the Saudi Arabian Consulate in Istanbul, Turkey, on October 2, 2018.

According to Inti Raymi Fund, 'The Jamal Khashoggi Award (JKA) for Courageous Journalism was created in December 2018 to show people that journalists are not going to step aside, cannot be silenced, and deserve to be recognised for their strength in the face of adversity.'

Journalist With A Heart: Nkanga Gets Reward For Courage

'(I have) mixed feelings: joy, happiness and a lot of sorrow. I was with the Committee to Protect Journalists based in New York for five years, and I left 2017. I'm no longer with them, but they will still work together to defend the rights of journalists worldwide,' he said in an interview with Channels Television.

How did he feel when he received the news? He said: 'I was pleased. I felt a sense of fulfillment that when you really give your best, you get rewarded. I felt that peace; that joy; but upon closer introspective reflection, I would say I felt sad; sad because though we might be saying it's a good thing, you have to remember the substance: a human being who could have been someone's father, anyone's brother, nephew or son walked into the one place where he would feel the safest in other country - your embassy, and instead of getting service which you have a right to by virtue of your nationality, you end up being hacked into pieces, like it's meat. And now we are hearing that his body was incinerated.'

'It's appalling; and that's why for me when I think about this award now, I think about: what are we Nigerians doing for our own who have suffered similar things. 32 years ago, Dele Giwa was killed via a parcel bomb - the same October, 1996. Thirty-three years we are entering, still nothing. It makes me worry we watch on Network Africa, we see wars everywhere; we see authoritarianism, we see totalitarianism, we see governments trying to perpetuate themselves as if it's monarchy. We see evil all around us.'

'And evil thrives when good people do nothing; but when good people do something, it's important also that they are encouraged so that they can do more, and other people (could) see them as a measuring yardstick, and say if they can do it, then I can do it.'

Interestingly, another Nigerian, United Kingdom-based Ayo Awokoya, was among the five journalists on the final shortlist for the award.

Others are Ben Mauk (United States of America), Paul Shalala from Zambia and Rabia Noor for Pakistan.

Load-Date: March 18, 2019

---

End of Document

Nollywood As Compass to National Questions

Vanguard (Lagos)

March 02, 2022

Copyright 2022 Vanguard Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 953 words

Byline: Ngozi Emedolibe

Body

---

The modern film industry in Nigeria came to real reckoning when it became the purveyor of heavily-guarded information about the society, more like the investigative reporter. One can illustrate this with the film that (arguably) gave birth to the phenomenon called Nollywood: Living in Bondage.

Prior to the advent of the movie produced by Okey Ogunjiofor and Ken Nnebue, words were rife that emerging millionaires in the South East of Nigeria were probably living off the benefits of membership of certain secret cults. It was a perception, no one truly knew to what extent it held true.

Okey and Ken stepped in with the brilliant idea to address that information gap. The result was Living in Bondage, which not only established that there were secret cults but also highlighted the consequences of such fraternities as exemplified by the character, Andy, played by actor Kenneth Okonkwo.

Save from the storyline, which satisfied that information gap, there really was nothing to write home about the technical richness of the film, which is understandable, considering that the crew worked with the equipment their resources could afford at the time. Living in Bondage's storyline captivated a lot of people. It became a hit, availed fame for the actors, spawned sales and ignited a renewed interest in the movie industry as other producers simply jumped on the wagon to spin similar tales.

Overtime, the need to fill an information gap has produced other blockbusters, and Nollywood has done well in being the investigative reporter, in a playful and dramatic manner. Productions like Thunderbolt by Tunde Kelani, Issakaba directed by Lancelot Oduwa Imaseun in one way or the other played this cardinal role.

With the reinvention of the cinema culture in recent times, some films have continued on this path. There has been Last Flight to Abuja by Obi Emelonye, 93 Days by Steve Gukas, October 1 by Kunle Afolayan, and 76 by Izu Ojukwu; the other breakaway successes the industry has witnessed have come from the romantic-comedy genre.

On account of this, the film industry still yearns for authentic stories that can fill the information gap of the nation. This is why the announcement that BADAMASI: Portrait of a General, the biopic on Nigeria's former President, General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida would premiere on June 12, 2021 at Cinewold, O2 Arena, London is evoking a lot of interests.

It ought to be so.

Nollywood As Compass to National Questions

General Babangida occupies a unique rung in Nigeria's socio-political ladder. While being on everyone's face, he is also distant, mysterious, much like what Michael Jackson held for millions of his fans worldwide. The more you try to know him, the little you understand. So many issues about him have been contrived, distorted, perhaps hyped, leaving Nigerians with an obfuscate personality, yet many are still very eager to probe and understand him. Reputed to be a major participant in most (if not all) of the coups that have taken place in Nigeria, he is believed to be endowed with a unique vista of Nigeria's political space and his unpredictable nature when it comes to discussing same, roundly compounds issues for the people.

As a head of state, who chose to be addressed as military president, his reign oversaw some of the elemental points in Nigeria's history, most of which have remained fuzzy. From issues about the Nigeria-Biafra War, foiling of Dimka's coup, sacking of Shehu Shagari and Buhari, to the infamous Structural Adjustment Programme , assassination of famous journalist, Dele Giwa and the chaotic annulment of June 12, 1993 presidential election, which left Nigerians with new lexicons, like 'impasse' and others, the story of Ibrahim Babangida cannot but leave so much to be desired. His background, outstandingly lowly, and how he rose to the zenith of political influence in Nigeria, makes him a subject for students of motivational speaking.

In reality, Nigerians have always been looking out for an autobiography from him, which would offer the needed explanations for some of these knotty issues in our socio-political history. This is largely why the film, BADAMASI: Portrait of a General, an authorised biopic by international filmmaker Obi Emelonye is today one of the most anticipated films ever in the history of Nollywood, which has given Nigeria the reputation of being the third largest film producing nation in the world. The thematic collage of drama, education and history therein, captures a larger segment of the society in contrast with the average Nollywood film.

For the regular fans of Nollywood films, the stellar cast, comprising Enyinna Nwigwe, Sani Danja, Ali Nuhu, Yakubu Mohammed, Kalu Ikeagwu, Okey Bakassi, Julius Agwu, Charles Inojie and Anthony Monjaro in this intense military drama, will be enthralling. Outside the regular Nollywood fans, it will avail the history-conscious individuals the opportunity to understand some of the most remarkable events that have shaped Nigeria's political and historical landscape, as seen through the eyes of some principal characters who participated in these epochal events.

With this in mind, it is understandable why Nigerians in London are eagerly looking forward to this première on a remarkable date (June 12, 2021) at the prestigious O2 Arena, which was to host Michael Jackson's ill-fated 'This is It' concert. Many influential Nigerians had reportedly tried to stop the premiere in the past by orchestrating death threats on the producer, but the time seems right now for the mother of all revelations because, in all fairness, Nigerians deserve to know who has done what in their turbulent history. Questions have been asked; answers are needed and may it serve as a compass to a better future for Nigeria.

Load-Date: March 2, 2022

Controversial and multiple award-winning journalist, Sam Omatseye, tells his story\xa0

Controversial and multiple award-winning journalist, Sam Omatseye, tells his story\xA0

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

July 16, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1981 words

Body

---

He bared his mind to Tony Ademiluyi on a plethora of issues ranging from his journey to journalism, the stories he did that won awards, his coverage of the June 12 crisis, years in exile, the controversy he courted in writing about the Chief Obafemi Awolowo legacy, the role of Dim Chukwuemeka Odumegwu-Ojukwu, literary accomplishments of Prof. Chinua Achebe, the technological disruption of the print media, and the misinterpretation of his Obi-tuary coinage in the last elections which nearly cost him his life.\xa0

Buzz Times: You studied history at the then University of Ife now Obafemi Awolowo University between 1980 and 1985 at a time when it was popular for art students to study law or the then newly created American-inspired mass communication. Why did you make the unpopular choice?

Sam Omatseye: I didn't know that it was unpopular. For me, it was fascinating. I envied eminent intellectuals who invoked history to illumine analysis and contemporary interventions. I witnessed Awolowo do it. I read pieces about it in newspapers. I also loved the power of avatars who loomed over the past and influence us today. I also was under the spell of my high school history teachers like Edeyan and Eshareture at Government College, Ughelli.i felt like history was a forest. I wanted to know where the leopards were hiding and where the squirrels squeaked.

Buzz Times: You started your journalism career as a reporter-researcher at the now-defunct Newswatch Magazine in 1987. What informed your choice of journalism as a career?

Sam Omatseye: It was a decision I made in my second year. Two people influenced my choice. Dele Giwa and Roger Rosenblatt. The latter more. The die was cast for me when I read Rosenblatt's prologue to Time magazine cover story on the death of Leonid Brezhnev. My first love was to be a university professor. Rosenblatt changed all that.

Buzz Times: You won the Nigerian Media Merit Award in 1991 for your coverage of Nigerian Military Air Crash in Ejigbo, Lagos. Can you tell us more about the award-winning story?

Controversial and multiple award-winning journalist, Sam Omatseye, tells his story\xA0

Sam Omatseye: It happened on a Sunday. I went to the office at Concord Press when someone passed the news to the office of a military air crash at Ejigbo. I tricked my way through military blockade into the forest swamp to see the plane. I carried some of the corpses before I was caught. I saw a classmate of mine at Federal School of Arts and Science who denied me. I was with a fellow, not a journalist, and we were beaten and subjected to barbaric drills. I felt worse than a Roman slave, more like a game animal. The soldiers had a field day. They were savages. A crowd watched impotent. They might have killed us if Abacha's convoy had not arrived. If it were today, it would have gone viral around the world. It was worse than Amakri, the journalist beaten in the old Rivers State.

Buzz Times: Are awards in journalism subjective? Can you be described as a great journalist if you never won an award?

Sam Omatseye: We should be wary of awards of any kind. They are great because they help create standards of excellence. We can't underestimate their value. We must realize that they boil down to the verdicts of a few human beings with prejudices and predilections. I have won my fair share of awards. I am, however, more interested in what I will write next. Let posterity decide who is a great journalist or writer.

Buzz Times: You covered the June 12 crisis while at the now-rested Concord, tell us the experience of covering the crisis.

Sam Omatseye: As Abiola's member of staff, I was an interested party as I was when Tinubu ran. My experience was when I was running the paper's Abuja bureau. They annulled the polls and the nation fell into turmoil. My life was in danger when the SSS detailed two cars to follow me around before I fled. Our paper was banned and I was living in hunger for a while. It was a terrible time.

Buzz Times: While in exile in the United States, you taught media and journalism at the Metropolitan State College of Denver between 1998 and 2006, tell us your experience while there. Also, were you a tenure-track academic?

Sam Omatseye: I taught part-time and also practised journalism full-time. I was a technology reporter with a top, now defunct, wireless magazine. It was fun writing for RCR Wireless News. All the tech apps we take for granted today I wrote about 20 years ago. It was fun teaching too, because I learned as I taught. Some Nigerian students came my way. I also turned my classes to cultural moments. I remember in one contemporary issues class in which I told how we slaughtered fowls and cows for parties and festivals in my country and how the Igbo has the most fun at Christmas. It was the eve of American thanksgiving. It was hilarious.

Buzz Times: While still in the US, you covered the wireless world with RCR Wireless News. Tell us about your experience with the newswire. Why aren't we seeing media moguls in Nigeria owing newswires to compete with the likes of Bloomberg, Thomson Reuters, Dow Jones etc?

Sam Omatseye: RCR Wireless News turned me into a technology nerd. I remember a dinner with some American journalists who worked with the Rocky Mountain News, and I started telling them about tech trends. One of them observed I was speaking another language because my narratives were steeped in tech terms and I forgot I was speaking to innocents. I remember what Thoreau said, that the vocations are conspiracy against the laity.

Indeed, tech reporting is a lacuna in journalism here. Investors are too locked into politics to see other virgin lands.

Buzz Times: You became the Pioneer Chairman Editorial Board of the Nation in 2006. Why did you pitch your tent with a progressive-leaning media house which was against the then-establishment at a time when politically motivated assassinations and murders were rife?

Sam Omatseye: All my life, I have been a progressive-leaning fellow. I could not change my hide, or hide it. Again, I covered Tinubu as senator and was fascinated by the flourish of his courage then and his subsequent role as a fulcrum of the fight against the military.

Buzz Times: Your article in your In Touch Column 'Awo Family without an Awo' generated a lot of brouhaha. Looking back in retrospect, can you say you were more sinned against than sinning?

Controversial and multiple award-winning journalist, Sam Omatseye, tells his story\xA0

Sam Omatseye: Indeed! The whole outcry was partisan. It was led by Ebenezer Babatope and Co and took advantage of the moment to slay me. Many invoked tribe over facts and used it as a platform to go after Tinubu. The sin was the medium, not the content of the article. My gratitude was that Mama Awolowo outlived the incident. If not, some would have called my pen a slayer. I thank Tinubu for sticking with me. He told me "Some people you know very well wanted me to fire you." It was a time of professional turncoats.

Buzz Times: You wrote 'The Biafran Ghost' which generated an avalanche of negative reactions from the Igbos as you were alleged to have attacked their hero, Dim Chukwuemeka Odumegwu-Ojukwu. Can you throw more light on this?

Sam Omatseye: That surprised me a great deal. It was in the early days of social media, and they tagged me anti-Igbo because I thought the Civil War might have been avoided. It became a hero-worshipping rabble making a hell out of Lazarus' drop of water. My phone was ringing every second for three weeks. Some asked me to leave the country for my safety. My driver was afraid to work.

Buzz Times: There is a joke in literary circles - Who is Africa's greatest writer? Wole Soyinka. What is his greatest work? Things Fall Apart. One of your articles seemed to suggest that Soyinka is greater than Achebe and it drew a lot of flak. Please clarify your stance.

Sam Omatseye: I also did not expect to draw a flak for that piece. Writing is a tricky affair. What you think may generate uproar and you wake up Monday a little out of ease it turns out a non-event. Some turned my piece on both writers into tribal warfare. I am neither Yoruba nor Igbo, although I have strong Yoruba ancestral links. I am Itsekiri. My mother was Urhobo. I wrote the piece as a consumer, not tribesman. I still stick to what I said in that piece. That does not diminish Achebe.

Buzz Times: You wrote an article Obi-tuary which was a pun on Peter Obi. The harmless coinage led to death threats and your going into hiding for about four months. Please throw more light on this.

Sam Omatseye: I can only say that I have been vindicated. Once the election expired, all the IPOB fellows have returned to their war shelters. They have returned to Kanu. When Obi was chief priest, the IPOB deity was in abeyance. They could coin names for Tinubu but how dare you touch their holy temple. What amazed me was how tribe turned egg heads into broken eggs, spilling odours of cant and hate. I was on my own then. The CP IGNORED my plea for protection. I had to pay for it when it was absolutely necessary.

Buzz Times: The internet and social media greatly disrupted the print media, which is now nearly obsolete globally. Will Artificial Intelligence finish off the media entirely and render mass unemployment among journalists?

Sam Omatseye: Print media will soon turn into an artefact. But we have to wait for this generation to pass. Advert revenues from people of my generation still keep us alive. Even that has dwindled. What traditional media will survive depends on how imagination can work with evolving technology. We cannot predict the future because we cannot predict technology. There is trepidation in the industry. It is a helpless era. Artificial Intelligence is going to ravage the future. It is scary for all trades. We can't see the crystal ball.

Buzz Times: You are a published author having written novels, poems, and plays. Can there be a reenactment of the literary renaissance that occurred in your youth in this present time, especially with social media distractions?

Sam Omatseye: Literature too is undergoing its own change. Time will tell if another burst of talent will create a great age. But we are always at the mercy of western endorsement. They tell us what is good. We need the sort of self-assertion that our music has brought. No one can tell us Burna Boy is bad music. It's the sort of independence we need in letters.

Buzz Times: What is your view on the students' loan act signed into law by President Bola Tinubu?

Sam Omatseye: it's a great idea. It is not just a loan but an economic policy. Let's wait for its implementation. It will allow those who cannot go to school have a shot. It is one of my favorite policies yet. It is a window of light for a generation if we take advantage

Controversial and multiple award-winning journalist, Sam Omatseye, tells his story\xA0

Buzz Times: What is your opinion on the 500-billion-naira palliative scheme put in place by President Bola Tinubu-led administration?

Sam Omatseye: It is taking from the rich and giving to the poor. It should not be seen in isolation. It is part of the war on poverty that includes infrastructure forays, farms and so on. The palliative money can be seen as a way to stimulate demand in the economy. I fear it might trigger inflation but this is a largely virgin economy, so the marketing boards could be useful here for inflation control and creating centres of demand.

Buzz Times: Most Nigerian Journalists tragically retire into poverty. How can this be averted?

Sam Omatseye: It is getting better. But as an industry we need leadership to hold owners to account.

Buzz Times: You anchor 'Platform' a political TV show. Tell us how you entered the world of broadcasting.

Sam Omatseye: Kudos goes to Dele Alake who brought the idea and TVC became my place of birth.

Buzz Times: At 62 you are now a senior citizen and have spent 36 years in the journalism profession. Will you write your memoirs anytime soon?

Sam Omatseye: Maybe on my days in Ughelli. Lots of great stories in boarding school. My formative years.

Buzz Times: Thank you very much for your time.

Sam Omatseye: You are welcome.

Load-Date: July 25, 2023

---

End of Document

Human Rights Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

February 2, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1461 words

Byline: Hameed Ajibola Jimoh Esq. -

Body

---

In Nigerian history, there have been some reported cases of human rights violation which had occurred in the past. Today, some of these similar breaches have come to be experienced. Only God Almighty could tell what happens tomorrow and how human rights will be respected by all and sundry. This paper aims at recalling some of these cases of human rights violation that had occurred in the past and those happening today as a parameter for determining and or curbing any of those violations from transplanting into the future.

Human rights have been said to be inviolable and inalienable rights of man, even God Almighty has by nature conferred some basic human rights on man, such as right to life, right to freedom of expression, right to freedom of liberty, right to the dignity of human person, right to freedom of association, right to conscience and religion, among others. Under the Nigerian Constitution, 1999 (as amended)-herein after referred to as the Constitution-, some of these rights have been codified in Chapter IV of the Constitution and are referred to as the 'Fundamental Rights'. Some human rights have been termed 'socio-economic rights' and have been codified in Chapter II of the Constitution which are generally (except in some certain exceptions) unenforceable or non-justiciable in our courts. The international laws on human rights have gone to recognize the importance of human rights by, first of all, having agreed as a treaty of member States or as a contract under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights and the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948. Also, there are International Socio-Economic Rights which in my humble view, become binding on Nigeria (notwithstanding the Chapter II of the Constitution) by virtue of Nigeria signing same into law, which then makes same to become part of Nigerian laws.

Those rights provided under Chapter IV of the Constitution are as follows: right to life, right to dignity of human person, right to personal liberty, right to fair hearing, right to private and family life, right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion, right to freedom of expression and the press, right to peaceful assembly and association, right to freedom of movement, right to freedom from discrimination, right to acquire and own immovable property anywhere in Nigeria, compulsory acquisition of property (i.e. its limits) and the restriction on and derogation from those fundamental rights as well as Special jurisdiction of High Court and legal aid. While those rights are specifically guaranteed under Chapter IV of the Constitution, other international human rights laws have them provided in Articles, for instance, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights and the United Nations

Human Rights Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow

Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948. Provision of those human rights guaranteed under these laws is not just for fancy or camouflage rather, occasions in the past had justified their guarantee in our organic or Supreme laws for the purpose of safeguard. Victims and of course, past heroes of local and international communities had actually fought and paid with their lives and body through injuries sustained when those human rights were not guaranteed, the situation which gave rise to those rights to be guaranteed in every Constitution of every country and in international laws as a matter of importance.

The checks that this paper is making and of course, the questions that this paper is asking are: how were human rights yesterday?! While I was growing up, I heard about the assassination of the former Attorney-General of the Federation, Dele Giwa? What has happened in his case and how far about the investigation on those who denied him his right to life? How are our law enforcement agencies handling the criminal case file? I understand that up till this day, no justice has been obtained for him and his family.

There were reports online that between 1999 and 2012, there were about 100 high profile political killings in Nigeria. They are still all under investigation and not one has been resolved. Just as I had inquired above that 'Who killed Dele Giwa?'. Like other killings in Nigeria, we may never know! Also, in another report, in 2018, Nigeria was said to have been ranked 13 out of 14 countries in the 2018 Global Impunity Index released by the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), making it the sixth time that Nigeria is featured on the index since 2008 that CPJ began to compile the list. There were cases of some journalists too who were killed and were denied their right to life without them or their family members securing justice among them were: 1. Bayo Ohu. He was said to be 45 years of age and an Assistant News Editor to The Guardian News Paper. He was reported to have been shot dead by unidentified assailants as he answered a knock at the front door of his house in Lagos on September 2009. The six assailants were reported to have taken his laptop and cell phone away, according to the journalist's relatives and local news reports. 2. Enenche Akogwu. 3. Fidelis Ikwuebe. 4. Nathan S. Dabak. 5. Sunday Gyang Bwede. 6. Okezie Amaruben. 7. Sam Nimfa-Jan. 8. Samson Boyi. 9. Tunde Oladepo. 10. Zakariya Isa, among others. There were other Nigerians that have been assaulted and unlawfully tortured, including journalists and activists, thereby denying them their right to personal dignity. I should, however, be quick to say that though the Nigeria Police Force and other Security Agencies of Government have been trying their efforts in resolving criminalities in the Nigerian societies, however, some of these miscreants have devised some techniques to get away with their heinous crimes without being noticed. People's support with the law enforcement agencies will also go a long way in the investigation and discovery of these hiding suspected criminals.

Today, killings have outgrown into insurgencies and killing by unsuspected gunmen or suspected herdsmen as reports have said, thereby killing thousands of innocent citizens and residents as well as travellers. Kidnapping for ransom and final killing of their hostage has become a profitable occupation to some miscreants. Political killings with brutality have desisted and or resisted pressures as a political woman, for instance, was burnt alive in the 2019 Kogi State Governorship Election. Also, just of recent in January 2020, one Abdul Fatahi Yusuf popularly as 'Oko-Oloyun', a trado-medical practitioner was assassinated somewhere on his way. Some lawyers have been detained and even tortured by some law enforcement agencies for representing their clients in their course of professional duties. Furthermore, today has experienced: disobedience to court orders by government, use of ex parte powers to remove a public officer from office, arbitrary arrest and detention in custody by some law enforcement agencies of government, discrimination on politics; religion; race; origin; ethnic or tribe, terrorism, denial of right to freedom of expression, media practitioners in partisan politics, jungle justice, etc. These are few among those violations of human rights that have been experienced today. All these happened in our lawful civil society!

Having said all the above, the questions that this paper is inquiring about are: how will tomorrow be if these and much more unmentioned are those cases of human rights situation yesterday and today?! What type of human rights are we expecting tomorrow? Will there be any human rights tomorrow? Will tomorrow not become like yesterday?! It is my belief and recommendation nevertheless, that the laws that we have of today can serve us well if we implement them. Respect for rule of law and orders made by courts will help. Corruption should be eradicated (because if there is corruption among us, we will not trust ourselves and if there is corruption in the judicial system, the executive will not obey its orders as well as others).

Human Rights Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow

Finally, I humbly appeal to the government not to relent in checkmating and curtailing all criminalities that aim at denying innocent Nigerians their human rights. Nigerians too should continue to work together with the law enforcement agencies in order to assist in curbing crimes and criminalities. There should be continuous training on human rights for all government's security agencies so that they can understand the need for respect for human rights of any suspect. Also, all the above recommendations should be considered for necessary practice.

God bless the Federal Republic of Nigeria! God bless Nigerian citizens! God bless Nigerian leadership!

Email: hameed\_ajibola@yahoo.com

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/632/1802/14/158064910057.jpeg>

Technologies and Government's Roles in Tech Policies

Load-Date: February 2, 2020

---

End of Document

Tackling impunity for crimes against journalists

The Nation (Nigeria)

November 8, 2022 Tuesday

Copyright 2022 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 2167 words

Body

---

A reporter with Vanguard newspaper, Tordue Henry Salem, was reported missing on October 13, 2021.

About a month later, Salem, who was then the newspaper's House of Representatives correspondent, was reported by the police to have been found dead in Abuja.

The announcement was trailed by conflicting tales from both the police and family members about how he died.

Till date, no security agency has been able to unravel the circumstances surrounding Salem's death. There is also no information that anyone is being prosecuted for the death.

While Salem's case represents one of such recent incidents of unresolved crimes against journalists, the first major reported killing of a journalist in the country was that of the founding Editor of Newswatch magazine, Dele Giwa.

Giwa was killed on October 19, 1986, in his house in Ikeja, Lagos, via a parcel bomb, with all accusing fingers pointing to the then-military government headed by General Ibrahim Babangida.

Like the Salem case, security agencies, rather than resolve the riddles thrown up by Giwa's murder, succeeded in muddling the waters. The Giwa case was also unresolved and no one was brought to book.

From the Giwa case to that of Salem, attacks on media practitioners have been sustained and perhaps, encouraged by the inability of state agents/agencies to bring perpetrators to book.

A recent report by a group, Media Rights Agenda (MRA), revealed that no less than 19 Nigerian journalists were brutally killed between May 29, 1999, and now, without conclusive investigation on their deaths and prosecution of the perpetrators.

The report equally showed that no less than 47 incidents of attacks against journalists, media workers and media houses occurred in the last year.

Tackling impunity for crimes against journalists

In addition to the various international instruments guaranteeing media freedom, the Nigerian Constitution, particularly in Section 22 equally saddled the media with among others, the responsibility of ensuring accountability in public governance.

It provides that: 'The press, radio, television and other agencies of the mass media shall, at all times, be free to uphold the fundamental objectives contained in this Chapter (Chapter two of the Constitution) and uphold the responsibility and accountability of the government to the people.'

The operations of the media also find favour within the purview of the globally recognised freedom of expression, which is a fundamental human right enjoyed by every person.

The freedom of information affords everyone the right to own opinions and the right to seek, receive and share information and ideas.

Besides the protection this right enjoys under the Nigerian Constitution, it is also protected under Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), the African Charter on Human and Peoples Rights (ACHPR), among others.

The Director of Public Prosecution of the Federation (DPPF), Mohammed Abubakar stressed the importance of the freedom of information to the effectiveness of the media in every society.

Abubakar said: 'For the journalists, this right (freedom of information) is very vital to their essential professional duties to seek out and share the truth.'

'Without this freedom, it is near impossible to interview citizens or request information from public officials.'

'Without this right, one cannot impart reliable and accurate information to people for them to make informed decisions about their lives.'

'At the end of the day, injustice and human rights abuses cannot be exposed,' Abubakar said.

Nigerian journalists as angered species

Not only are cases of attack against journalists left unaddressed, the Nigerian state, as observed by the Programme Director, MRA, Ayode Longe, 10 years after the United Nations came out with the Plan of Action on the Safety of Journalists and the Issue of Impunity, has not taken any concrete action to stem the tide of wanton attacks against journalists and the media in the country.

The plan is a set of objectives, principles and actions developed by the member states of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO) and endorsed by the UN Chief Executives Board on 12 April 2012, intended to directly address the problem of journalists' safety and the problem of impunity.

The plan, which requires member states to among others, put in place measures to ensure the prevention of attacks on journalists, protection of media workers and prosecution of culprits, was aimed at creating a free and safe environment for journalists and media workers, thus strengthening peace, democracy and sustainable development worldwide.

Longe said: 'We all know that the Federal Government has never made any serious effort to investigate attacks against journalists or to prosecute the perpetrators of such attacks.'

'Despite the dozens, even hundreds, of attacks against journalists that have been reported and documented by organisations like Media Rights Agenda and others over the years, we are yet to hear of any instance where a journalist has been killed in Nigeria and a serious investigation was conducted and the perpetrators arrested and prosecuted.'

Tackling impunity for crimes against journalists

'This is a serious cause for concern for us because either wittingly or unwittingly, the impression is being given that it is okay to harm journalists in Nigeria and that whoever does so will get away with it because there will be no serious investigation into their actions and nothing will be done to them.'

He added that the MRA documented over 15 incidents in which officers of the Nigeria Police Force (NPF) were the perpetrators, with thugs and unknown gunmen following closely the police in the number of attacks against journalists and media houses.

Fear of escalation during 2023 elections

With the frightening state of affairs, there is heightening tension that attacks on journalists would escalate during next year's election season.

According to the International Press Centre (IPC), 74 attacks on journalists were recorded in the course of the 2019 elections.

The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) reported that journalists covering gubernatorial and state assembly elections were detained, harassed, and assaulted by security agents across many states.

CPJ added that 'in January 2019, shortly before the polls, three journalists suffered life-threatening injuries from gunfire while covering a political rally in one of the states.'

Ray of hope

The need to contextualise the fear of escalation in attacks on journalists during next year's election season and suggest ways to address it engaged experts during a two-day dialogue session in Abuja.

The event, put together by the office of the Attorney General of the Federation (AGF) and Minister of Justice, Abubakar Malami, with support from the British Council, in commemoration of this year's edition of the International Day to End Impunity for Crimes Against Journalists.

Speakers at the event, with the theme: 'Media, civil society and violence-free election in Nigeria,' which was held on November 1 and 2, noted, among others, the hostile environment in which journalists operate in the country and suggested possible ways media practitioners could safely navigate the dangerous terrain during the election season.

The speakers include Malami; the Chairman of the Independent National Electoral Commission (INEC), Mahmood Yakubu; the Special Adviser, Media and Publicity to President Muhammadu Buhari, Femi Adesina; the Executive Secretary, National Human Rights Commission, Anthony Ojukwu; former Director General of the Nigerian Television Authority (NTA), Tonnie Iredia; the President, Centre for Socio-Legal Studies (CSLS), Prof. Yemi Akinseye-George; the Vice Chancellor, Federal University, Kashere, Gombe State, Prof. Umaru Pate and Sam Kargbo.

Malami stressed the important role of the media in promoting democracy and their contribution to ensuring transparency in the electoral process.

He assured of the government's commitment to ending impunity for crimes against journalists and warned political players to tune down on political rhetorics capable of fuelling violence.

The AGF said: 'It is imperative to renew our call on those involved in the electioneering process to appreciate the fact that political activities are to be observed in accordance with the provisions of the Electoral Law.'

'Let us join hands in making sure that all campaign utterances are humane and in conformity with global best practices, thereby contributing to a violence-free electoral process.'

Tackling impunity for crimes against journalists

'We note with dismay, reports of some forms of attacks on journalists and voters by suspected hoodlums during elections in some parts of the country.

'The President Muhammadu Buhari-led Federal Government is committed to bringing to an end these undemocratic and uncultured activities through the administration of legally justifiable approaches on the perpetrators in order to serve as deterrence to others.

'I am pleased to say that the Federal and some State Governments have taken precautionary and proactive steps in taming the tide. Malami said.

Adesina urged the media to guide against falsehood in this election season, adding that President Buhari has promised to ensure free, fair and credible elections next year.

INEC Chairman, who was represented by Mohammed Haruna (a National Commissioner in INEC), noted that everything possible needed to be done to protect journalists during elections.

Yakubu, who noted that 45 journalists were killed last year globally, urged the Nigerian government to ensure that some ugly trends, which were emerging in the country, such as the closure of some media houses in Zamfara State, are addressed.

He identified some possible challenges to media freedom in 2023, noting that Nigerian journalists operate amid ethnic, religious and political intrigues compounded by poor funding, low remuneration, professional ethical breaches and corruption.

'Others are lack of resources and government pressure and potential surveillance (e.g Zamfara clampdown).

'Possible threats from state and non-state actors and ownership interference may force self-censorship for personal safety which will weaken investigative and data-driven journalism,' he said.

Pate noted that 'without well-informed, professional journalism that is well-protected, independent reporting and corruption or malpractices in elections cannot be exposed.'

As a way out, he demanded that governments at all levels 'should fulfil their responsibility to ensure that crimes against media professionals are investigated and prosecuted.'

He recommended the promotion and propagation of 'values that respect the media's vital role in promoting sustainable peace, democracy and credible elections in the country; emphasise the relationship between securing the safety of journalists and our freedoms.

'The media community should have the courage to overcome the strangulation of independent sources of information and financial pressures on editorial quality and critical news content,' Pate said.

Iredia urged the media to be resourceful, avoid partisanship and reject intemperate language.

He noted that the electorate is ignorant because social institutions are not allowed to function.

Iredia argued that the responsibility for voters' education should be taken from INEC and handed to appropriate government agencies like the media and the National Orientation Agency (NOA).

Prof. Akinseye-George (SAN), who was represented by Ester Ugo; Ojukwu (SAN) and Kargbo stressed the need for journalists to take the issue of safety seriously and urged security agencies to ensure the protection of media practitioners.

They highlighted the important roles the media and civil society groups play in promoting election transparency and accountability and urged them not to relent in their efforts.

Tackling impunity for crimes against journalists

Kargbo added: 'The media and civil society must also extend their scrutiny to the electoral litigants and expose their underhand and overreaching activities that tend to undermine election tribunals.

'They must give a fair and accurate report of tribunal proceedings and must not constitute themselves into alternate tribunals by engaging in media trials.'

The DPPF, who was represented by an Assistant Director, Tamarantare Ali-Bozi, stressed the important roles prosecutors could play to curb impunity for crimes against journalists.

He said; 'Along with the Judiciary and security agencies, the prosecutor's role is essential in the prevention, protection and prosecution of culprits, to ensure journalists' safety.'

'By so doing, the prosecutor contributes to the building of a just and peaceful society and reinforce the rule of law and fundamental freedoms.'

Abubakar however noted that 'we all have a duty and obligation in conjunction with the prosecutor and other stakeholders in the justice sector, to ensure that perpetrators of electoral related crimes and crimes against journalists are fought to a standstill, not just for the sake of the journalists, but for a better society.'

Load-Date: November 9, 2022

---

End of Document

Zik's death story which turned out to be false, taught me a profound lesson -Azubuike Ishiekwene, ex-Punch
Editor

Zik's death story which turned out to be false, taught me a profound lesson - Azubuike Ishiekwene, ex-Punch Editor

Nigerian Tribune

July 22, 2023 Saturday

Copyright 2023 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1538 words

Body

---

I studied Mass Communication at the University of Lagos, even though I had been toying with the idea (of journalism) even before I entered the University of Lagos. I was the president of Gaskiya College press club. I also hosted the pirate press club, so to speak, in my higher school certificate (HSC) studies where the Principal at the time Mrs. Jelili, prohibited such things.

Finally, I enrolled to study Mass Communication after my HSC. My first real and direct contact with practice was in Part 2. During one of the long holidays, Professor Olatunji Dare, then Dr Olatunji Dare, gave me a note on the back of his card to Alhaji Najeem Jimoh who was then Editor of The Punch. I had said that I wanted to intern in a newspaper house for practical, hands-on experience. That was sometime in 1986. That was how it started. After my first degree, I went for the national youth service and returned to start formal practice in 1988/1989. I started in The Punch.

What was the real newsroom experience like when compared to the time of internship?

In the newsroom back then, the typist would type copies in triplicates or quadruples. You were more or less like the 'copy boy' - you would shift copies around in the newsroom and run errands. Occasionally, when you get good stories, you could publish in Evening Punch or so. However, as a full staff, my roles and responsibilities changed. I got the opportunity to do features, news reports and cover stories. It was quite gratifying for me back in the day, maybe because journalism was what I always wanted. I actually threw myself into it completely and I wanted to know everything as quickly as I could. I wasn't only interested in the news and features, I also took interest in the production of the newspaper itself. I also found this fascinating. Those were the days of 'cow-gum', galleyes, compugraphic machines, lithography and stories were filed in many instances by radio or telexes. Writing was basically in long hand. Yet, it was the only thing I wanted to do so I gave myself totally to it.

What was the newsroom atmosphere like? Did you wake up wanting to rush to work?

Zik's death story which turned out to be false, taught me a profound lesson -Azubuike Ishiekwene, ex-Punch Editor

We used to have gatekeepers. I don't know whether gatekeepers still exist. Maybe the word 'gatekeeper' has become obsolete because of the way content is obtained, processed and shared today. But back in the day, your first contacts were the desk heads or line editors. We had very powerful and influential line editors - either features or news editors. Early on in my career, most of us didn't have much direct contact with the editor. It was your news editor or the features editor or your line editor that you reported to directly. They were the ones who gave you assignments. You just needed to see the sort of thing that happened in the newsroom when reporters begin to return from their beats towards evening time. People like Mr. Dipo Onabanjo who was, at some point, deputy, and later a news editor in The Punch or Mr. Peter Ezeh or Mr. Demola Osinubi, who was deputy editor at the time, and later Editor. If these people gave you assignment, you had to get it done: no excuses. One of the frequent moments of trepidation was waiting for feedback from your line editor after submitting your copy. Sometimes, your copy would come back to you bleeding with red ink. Then you could get a tongue-lashing. If something happened on the main news at 4pm or late evening news and you had missed something which ought to have been in your report, God help you; or you wake up the next morning and found that you had missed a story on your beat or that you didn't particularly cover a story the way you should have, God help you.

Which of your early stories give you joy?

I can go way back to one I wrote for Evening Punch. I remember it particularly because it was one story that made me run quite some distance to the bus stop. It was first used in the Evening Punch and was promoted on Page One on the main paper the next day. I did not believe that here was my name in actual print in a national newspaper like Punch. After buying it at the news stand, I ran quite some distance way past the bus stop where I was supposed to catch my bus. I was so really excited. It was a story a visiting expatriate staff of Volkswagen who drowned in Tarkwa Bay, Lagos. I was beside myself with joy. That was one story I can't possibly forget.

The demolition of Maroko was another one. I covered the demolition and did not just news stories but also feature stories. It was a very difficult time for people there, waking up and finding you and your family were homeless! I was a ghetto boy. I grew up in Ajegunle so I really could connect with what was happening at that time. I did a number of features and in series.

Then, I guess to my discredit and shame, I was one of those who did the story of the so-called death of Nnamdi Azikiwe - the 'Zik was dead' story that turned out to be that Zik was not dead. You can imagine how embarrassed I was. It's also one that I cannot forget easily and it taught me a profound lesson. I was not the lead anchor of the story but I provided additional support and my name was listed as one of the writers. I remember that and also remember the lessons I learnt therefrom. Those were moments I can't forget easily.

How would you describe your rise from a reporter/writer to Editor and media manager?

It is a humbling experience. But keep in mind that no man can rise to the top of their profession all by themselves. Of course, I do agree that hardwork and diligence are very important but you must not also forget that you work with a team. You provide leadership at different levels. You also rise because of the collaboration work of others in the newsroom, those you work with. No one person gets all the credit for all of that. I think my case is not different. Over the years, I found that whatever you choose to do, God helping you and you apply yourself diligently, with the support of your team, family and friends and all of that, you can go as far as you want to go. From the get go, I never had any doubt in my mind what I wanted to do or what I wanted to make of my profession. You just needed to be persistent, and keep working to improve yourself.

When you compare journalism when you started and what it has become now, what would have been your wish for the profession?

I think it was Bob Marley who sang that 'every man thinks his burden is the heaviest'. If I adapt that, one can say that every generation tends to think that its own burden as a generation is the heaviest. I do not make light of what journalism practice has become or presume that journalism, 20 or 30 years ago was better. Every generation faces its own peculiar challenges. One should be humble enough to admit that. But, of course, the job is done differently today from how it was done then. It is also important to keep in mind that 20/30 years ago, especially before the advent of the internet and modern technology and research that has taken us to where we are, you also had far smaller audiences to engage than we have today. Also, we had a defined news cycle; it's nothing to be compared with today's 24/7 cycle.

Zik's death story which turned out to be false, taught me a profound lesson -Azubuike Ishiekwene, ex-Punch
Editor

I also think that, in a certain sense, I've heard people say and I think it was also true of me, that young people in school sort of depended on the press as a means of learning English language. I followed Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed, for many years as a student; I worshipped at their altar, by which I mean that when they wrote their columns in Daily Times, Concord, or later, Newswatch, I adored every bit of their writing. I think that quality in Nigeria today is rarer. Of course, today there are more opportunities for exposure and the demonstration of your skills are far greater. Competition has also significantly increased the pressure on practitioners for quality. There are citizens who are journalists who never trained as journalists and who are doing a great job. It's a totally different space and the experiences are different. But there is no doubt in my mind at all that comparatively, the resources at the disposal of the modern journalist to get their job done is far greater and the knowledge is broader but then, all of these things ultimately depend on how you use them. That ultimately is the challenge. How are we able to learn with the resources and expand the knowledge we have at our disposal to improve the quality of our work.

Who are some of your colleagues with whom you toiled on the streets back then?

There are many of them. Peter Adebola is one of them. He lives in Canada now. Adebola and I were colleagues at the University of Lagos; Tunde Odediran, also. He has branched out from journalism to IT and is a certified IT specialist. Bukola Bandele and Tuope Oluwatukesi, too, then known as Tuope Omare, who is now a proprietress in Ibadan. I also had the fortune of being classmates with Mr. John Momoh during our first degree. He had done a diploma before he returned to study for a first degree. He was already a household name by the time and when I say that we were classmates, it does not mean that we are mates in terms of accomplishments. I recognise that. But we were classmates for the degree programme.

Load-Date: July 23, 2023

---

End of Document

Obi And His Obedient Tyrants

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

July 20, 2022 Wednesday

Copyright 2022 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1128 words

Byline: CYRUS ADEMOLA

Body

---

CYRUS ADEMOLA

I've always believed that democracy is about robust and in-depth discussion; a discussion that fosters dissent and gives opposition the ample space to thrive; a discussion that promotes opposing views, even controversial ones. I've always believed that such freedom -freedom of speech, freedom to express oneself without fear or favour - is the beauty of democracy.

This belief is so general, so presumptive, so speculative that it needs no analysis. It needs no lithium test. It needs no scientific inquiry. It's the great speculation of the ages. It's the reason why men waged war against tyranny. It's the reason for every revolution against dictatorship. It's an inalienable right that brave men have died for and some have experienced the most vile, brutal and painful treatment of injustice from the evil powers of the world.

In this part of the world, this belief, this axiom, underscored the resilient spirits of men like Chief Obafemi Awolowo, Dr Nnamdi Azikwe, Chief Tony Enahoro, Sir. Ahmadu Bello and other great men of yore, who fought tooth and nail to put an end to colonial rule and its suppressive imperial structure. After the fall of the first and second republics, it's this undying speculation of faith in democracy that led men like Pa. Okutokun, Sani Shehu, Prof. Wole Soyinka and many others into exile during the dark age of Abacha. Many whose names have been written in the sand of history and many who have been forgotten because no one is there to write their story and tell of their trial and triumph in the war against tyranny and dictatorship are part of those who have been lured by this great speculation - the belief that every man has the right to pursue life, liberty and his own happiness. Every man has the right to speak his mind.

My own uncle, Mr. Dare Babarinsa, veteran journalist and now columnist, embodied the living truth of this great speculation. He was one of those who fought tooth and nail against the preponderance of the Abacha's administration. He was one of the founders of Tell magazine. The magazine which quickly became the darling of many Nigerians after the heyday of Dele Giwa's Newswatch. His writings and publications became foreboding menace towards those who were enemies of truth. If the immortal words of George Orwell are true that "in the time of universal deceit, truth telling becomes a revolutionary act", then my uncle and his coterie were revolutionists in their days.

Obi And His Obedient Tyrants

Because this great speculation, this belief in the ability to hold a dissenting view is so ingrained in the soul and breast of every human, it becomes superfluous to try to prove it to anyone. It seems that anyone who disagrees with this line of thinking is a tyrant or tyrant in making. That's why it comes as a surprise to me when I saw the online trend of Peter Obi's supporters, particularly on Facebook and Twitter. Their intolerant, vicious, vitriolic and vile approach to any dissenting view is at best alarming and at worst repulsive. It's even more shocking that their candidate, a southeast politician, who was once the governor of Anambra State, appears to be a democrat and a peaceful man.

Even glancing at a distance, no one will mistake Peter Obi as someone who is vile or a stereotypical troublemaking politician. His charisma, calm smile and robust brilliant mind reveal him to be a gentleman who espouses the principles of civility and democracy. But such can't be said about his followers. His online supporters are condescending, vitriolic and sharp-tongued. They see any criticism against the man's policy as a personal vendetta. They view every dissent as an attack on their candidate. They want to ride the horse of tyranny to make their candidate the president.

In a world where you can't have a contrarian view, where every dissent is clampdown on with tyrannical disdain, little wonder it's being said that democracy indeed dies in darkness. This is the world of Obi mob supporters. It's heart-wrenching to watch.

A good example is their recent rampage against social media influencer and ex Jonathan aide, Reno Omokri. Needless to say, Omokri has been a vehement, open and unashamed supporter of the People Democratic Party's candidate, Alhaji Atiku Abubakar. According to Omokri, the APC has failed the country in leadership, governance and security. Also, he doesn't see Peter Obi winning the popular vote based on his political calculation and permutations. Hence, he's pitching his tent with PDP.

Now, for Peter Obi's supporters, Omokri has committed the unpardonable sin. Obi's supporters have tagged themselves #Obedient. And anyone who has decided not to be obedient to the cause of their political mascot is therefore an infidel. He doesn't deserve any human dignity. He doesn't deserve to be seen as a Nigerian. He's "an enemy of Nigerians." He's a pariah.

What's more, Omokri has sinned against heaven and earth. He should be removed from any social media space. That's the reason these little tyrants, these Orwellian thought-police have begun to campaign on Twitter for the removal of Omokri. Their groupthink philosophy is that if he doesn't agree with them, he doesn't deserve to have any social media platform to express his views. In the alternate reality of social media, he should be burnt in an outer court.

Omokri is not the only one that bears the brunt of holding an opposing view. Almost every influential Nigeria right now on Twitter is afraid to express their belief and campaign for their chosen candidate because of the fear that Obedient tyrants will come for them. They'll also lose their cyber space and end up an online nonentity. This is alarming.

For people who claim that they want to save Nigeria from the verge of tyranny, it's ironic and pathetic that they have become tyrants themselves. They've built around them an impenetrable bubble that doesn't permit anyone else in. This bubble is veiled and opaque that they themselves can't look outside and see their opposition as fellow humans, fellow Nigerians. After all, political theatre is a marketplace of ideas. If your idea is strong and convincing enough to resonate with the populace, why try to bully others into silence? Why try to stifle dissent?

Perhaps the reason could be that the ideas and ideals Peter Obi espouses are not strong enough in their own merit that there's a need to silence the opposition. Political candidate can't be superimposed on anyone. What we need aren't some online tyrants that call others names and threaten to deprive them of their social media space. What we need is a robust discussion about where our nation is going and who is more qualified to take us there. Enough of this mob rule.

Obi And His Obedient Tyrants

*Ademola, a freelance journalist, writes from Lagos via Contact: cyrusademola@gmail.com

Load-Date: July 20, 2022

---

End of Document

Press Freedom - Report Indicts Govt, Govs, Senators As Greatest Violators

Vanguard (Lagos)

July 01, 2021

Copyright 2021 Vanguard Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 968 words

Byline: Omeiza Ajayi and Fortune Eromosele

Dateline: Abuja

Body

---

The Nigeria Union of Journalists NUJ and Media Foundation for West Africa have released a report detailing atrocities, murder, torture and rights abuses of journalists practising in Nigeria, naming the administration of President Muhammadu Buhari, state governors, NASS members, politicians, security agencies, among others, as the biggest violators of press freedom.

The report, entitled "The State of Media Freedom in Nigeria", released at a briefing in Abuja yesterday, focused primarily on the last six years of President Buhari in power.

It listed journalists killed and those whose deaths were yet to be resolved as well as those harassed by State actors and beaten up in their line of duty. Media houses harassed by security operatives, were also included in the report.

National President of NUJ , Chris Isiguzo, while speaking during the presentation, said practising in Nigeria is becoming a dangerous venture and bemoaned the repeated harassment of journalists called on State actors to desist from such.

The report read: "Politicians have realized that to acquire power, either through legitimate means or through outright manipulations, they need to obtain the connivance of the media.

"And politicians and political office holders also know that to retain power, they require the support of the media, ditto those who wish to ascend to power.

"Even those whose positions are threatened suddenly realize the need to pocket the media. These elements have compounded the problems of the media.

"The media in Nigeria have suffered a number of setbacks over the years, with the obvious but unsuccessful attempts by government to control them. There are equally increased harassment and killings of journalists in the country.

"These acts are daily causing frustrations among media professionals in the country. Politicians, both in and out of government are increasingly filing legal cases against journalists who especially report on allegations of corruption, while security operatives have been used to block access for reporters in several areas.

Press Freedom - Report Indicts Govt, Govs, Senators As Greatest Violators

"Acts of impunity against journalists, particularly murder, is the ultimate form of censorship. These unfortunately, are likely to continue unabated. From the murder of Dele Giwa in 1986 through a parcel bomb, the killers are yet to be fished out and brought to book.

"Since then several attacks have been recorded against journalists, in spite of the fact that attacks against journalists and media equipment are illegal under international humanitarian law and the Nigerian legal system.

"Clear signals indicate that such killings are sponsored by desperate politicians and high office holders who had things they wished kept secret.

"For the period being reviewed, 2016- 2020, we have recorded some of the highest levels of violence targeting journalists in the country. These statistics constitute an indictment of the poor record on democracy and rule of law in Nigeria.

"The lack of transparency, corruption and politics of exclusion often result in frustrations and violent rivalries, creating dangerous environments in which journalists become easy targets for powerful forces intent on suppressing dissent and evading public accountability.

"The increasing rate of violations of media professionals and members of their families, is a clear signal that journalists are now being deliberately targeted as a result of the work they do.

"At least 300 violations affecting about 500 journalists, media workers and media houses have been recorded in Nigeria under the regime of President Buhari.

"On April 11, 2016 around 3am, an unknown gunman kidnaped Tope Kuteyi, the Channels TV correspondent in Owerri from his home. The kidnapper later made a ransom demand of N15million.

"On December 2016, the Department of State Services in Lokoja, Kogi State, arrested Friday Ogungbemi, publisher of Policy and Lawmaker Magazine and detained him without trial.

"This action which was at the instance of Governor Yahaya Bello of Kogi State was another example of how prominent Nigerians react to Media scrutiny.

"Friday Ogungbemi's alleged crime was authoring an Editorial on the Chief of Staff to the Governor of Kogi State, Mr Edward Onoja.

"On January 17, 2017, the Borno State Police Command arrested and detained Inuwa Bwala, Publisher of National Trail newspaper in Abuja, at the instance of a top politician in 2016.

"This Journalist had to send an SOS to the Nigeria Union of Journalists and friends that there was a threat to his life in detention. It took the intervention of the Union to secure his release.

"On January 13, 2017, the Police CID in Area 10 Garki, Abuja, arrested and detained Desmond Utomwen, publisher of Freshnews, an online newspaper, at the instance of a serving Customs officer, Inspector Umaru Faru.

"Desmond was working on a story which allegedly was critical of the said officer. Desmond was released following the intervention of Police AIG Usman Shehu who received a complaint from the NUJ.

"The union demanded for a thorough investigation by the customs of the alleged corruption by Umaru Faru, but to no effect.

"On January 19, 2017, the police arrested Premium Times Publisher, Dapo Olorunyomi alongside the Judiciary Reporter, Evelyn Okakwu, and held them for several hours at Police Headquarters in Abuja.

"This was at the instance of the Chief of Army Staff then, Lt Gen Tukur Yusuf Buratai who complained about defamation of character.

Press Freedom - Report Indicts Govt, Govs, Senators As Greatest Violators

"On April 19, 2017, some men of the Criminal Investigation Department (CID) of the Nigeria Police Force, arrested and detained Midat Joseph, correspondent of the Leadership newspaper for being critical of Kaduna State Government and the Governor Nasir el-Rufai's administration.

"The journalist later released on bail granted by a court after spending two nights at the Police cell."

Vanguard News Nigeria

Load-Date: July 1, 2021

---

End of Document

Shekarau Urges Journalists to Expose Bad Leaders

Leadership (Abuja)

October 19, 2010 Tuesday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 335 words

Byline: Kazeem Akintunde

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

The governor of Kano State, Alhaji Ibrahim Shekarau, has urged journalists in the country to expose leaders that have contributed or are contributing to the problems the nation is facing today.

He also implored media practitioners to project those leaders that are doing their best in the upliftment of the society.

He disclosed this in Lagos at the public presentation of a book titled, "Murder of Dele Giwa, The Answered Question" written by Mr. Richard Akinnola, as part of activities lined up by the Nigeria Union of Journalists, (NUJ) to mark the 24th anniversary of the gruesome murder of Mr. Dele Giwa, the founding editor-in-chief of Newswatch Magazine.

Alhaji Shekarau who was represented on the occasion by Barrister Haruna Dederi, the commissioner for Information, said it was by so doing that the ideals which Giwa believed in and died for would not be in vain.

He said if media practitioners continue to expose bad eggs in the society, the positive turn around of the country would be easier to achieve.

He described the late Dele Giwa as a fine and courageous journalist who was not afraid to pay the supreme sacrifice for what he believed in and urged his colleagues not to allow his memory to die.

"I plead with you to continue to expose bad eggs and at the same time, project those leaders that are doing good for the benefit of the nation," he said.

He also praised the contributions of the late Chief Gani Fawehinmi in exposing and attempting to bring to justice those that were behind the death of Giwa, adding that Nigeria would never forget him.

Shekarau later bought five copies of the book for N1 million.

The Chairman of the occasion, Professor Itsay Sagay, said 24 years after the death of Giwa, those that were behind his murder have not been brought to justice, warning that the culture of impunity should not be allowed to fester in the country again.

Shekarau Urges Journalists to Expose Bad Leaders

Sagay said the only way to do that now was to ensure that free and fair elections are organised next year where the votes of the people would count.

Load-Date: October 20, 2010

---

End of Document

A peep into history (III)

Nigerian Tribune

May 21, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1840 words

Body

---

A young man was led into my office as the editor of The PUNCH one day decades ago; his name is Ibe Eresia-Eke (where is he now?), Executive Chairman (as title-crazy Nigerians often over-burden the title 'Chairman' as if, standing alone, it is not 'executive' enough!) of Ogbia/Egbema/Ndoni Local Government Area of Rivers State. He should be happy but he was not because fire was on his rooftop. His advert, which moved me to cause him to be interviewed, is as captured below titled 'Don't break IBB's heart' Please read:

'The temptation has been strong to write to the President, General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida, about the blatant and disgraceful use of State power to crush and annihilate opposition party governments in Rivers State. But knowing how much effort he has personally and gracefully invested in the democratic process, it may just be too heart-breaking if he knows that some powerful people in my state are now practically spreading petrol over his carefully-constructed edifice of democracy, ready to strike the match. The cases are legion now. Some of them have already been profusely reported especially in the Sunday magazine (TSM). And certainly, many more, even much more shocking, will be published by the fearless media outfits around, given the manner the power drunkards are carrying on.'

In the interest of our nation, however, it has become almost imperative to corroborate much of what the press is doing to fight the wild anti-democratic trends in our dear state. I will attempt to do this by recounting some experience that one has had lately as Chairman of Ogbia/Egbema/Ndoni Local Government Area, one of the LGA's controlled by the opposition party in Rivers State, but where can I start from; what do I state; what do I leave out, in this short piece? Anyway, let's just take a case and be brief.

During the councillors bye-elections of Saturday, 19th July, 1992, state force literally over-ran the LGA beating, intimidating indigenes of the area, and destroying properties. Naturally, people reached for the recesses of their houses to hide. Voters had to face the concern of escaping with life, a fortiori standing on the queue to vote. Of course, this sounds so much like fiction. It is almost incredible. But we can list even the numbers of vehicles employed in the operation, namely: RV 8119 DA, RV 8075 DA (both belonging to the Rivers State Transport Corporation). And to clear any stubborn doubts about the source of the vehicles, there was also a Toyota Jeep with registration number 25 RSVG 9. The vehicles, loaded with uniformed policemen and thugs, fired with the zeal of men on a State mission and armed to the teeth to do havoc to persons and property.

A peep into history (III)

As you may have guessed, many indigenes, including those standing in the election on the platform of the opposition party, were bundled to far-away Port Harcourt, the seat of power, to be locked away and (to be)thoroughly tortured. The private house of Dr. Kingdom Ogbangba, Deputy Minority Leader in the State House of Assembly, was verily vandalised and damaged. Let us leave out things too obscene to be published in a respectable medium like this! Of course, you may already have guessed this: At the end of the day, 'election results' were announced and landslide victories were recorded. It may be reasonable to ask: What did the police in the area do when all this was being perpetrated? But what does a conscientious and upright police DPO and his men do in the face of 'superior onslaught', knowing the command structure of our police system? Indeed, as if to add salt to injury, shortly after an earlier DPO was transferred out of the area, probably for being uncooperative, his successor faces the same fate already. A local paper has, in fact, reported that the DPO has been threatened by kulaks with the right party connections with 'immediate transfer' from the LGA. Of course, much of all this only goes to corroborate and confirm reports of intention to destabilise; annihilate the local government controlled by the 'opposition party' and impeach its Chairman by 'all means possible'. Part of the strategy has been to spread all manner of calumny against the local government and its Chairman to cause disaffection in the local community, hoping to garner a major unrest within the area and then nullify the government and appoint a sole administrator. Given the grassroots support of the government, however, and the grace of Almighty God, none of their wishes have materialised.

But the fight is being intensified through all means as promised. Already police have reported that at least three of their most influential agents... have made very desperate efforts to use our councillors by offering them huge sums of money to sign a document containing cooked-up allegations against my person (the LG chairman). The reports have, in fact, pleaded with the police to 'commence thorough investigations to find out their financiers. I will not relent until their allegations against the Deputy Governor are proved' The outcome of the investigation has not reached my office but what is evident is that four formally loyal councillors have resigned. Many believe they fell for the huge financial inducements offered them. The whole game-plan is to weaken the numerical strength of the loyal councillors, inject their own men and, finally, impeach or turn me into a stooge taking instructions from Government House. Whether this works or not remains to be seen.

For good measure, let me add that given the devilish desperation with which they are purchasing their fancy 'by all means', whatever happens to me should be traced to them. To be sure, this tendency to deal with the LGA governments of the opposite parties all over the State is the same. But the import of all this comes once one extrapolates what is happening in Rivers State to all the states in the federation. Viewed from that perspective, it comes out clearly that the gravitation is towards annihilating the opposite parties even at the Local government level. Gradually, this tendency may infect the entire nation and two consequences are possible: That all should acquiesce and join one party or resist and fight back. Whichever way the reaction comes, it spells the end of democracy once again.

This is why I had thought that, maybe, IBB should not see this because given the investment in time, men and resources that have gone into erecting the democratic edifice this time; these trends may break his heart. But one thing is very certain, the security forces must do something fast to arrest the 'hoodlums against democracy' in whatever guise they may appear, be they deputy (or despotic) governors!

How did events eventually play out? That was during the unending transition to civil rule rigmarole of IBB beginning in the 1980s, which eventually climaxed in the June 12, 1993 elections which MKO Abiola won fair and square but which was annulled by the IBB junta, throwing the country into a political logjam or impasse that was not resolved until after five despotic years of the vilest dictator of them all, Gen. Sani Abacha, and the benevolent dictatorship of Gen. Abdulsalami Abubakar, stained, however, with the death in detention of Abiola. With the benefit of hindsight today, can we not say that the confidence reposed by Eresia-Ike in IBB as the defender of democracy was misplaced, given that the self-same IBB annulled the freest and fairest election in the land, thereby wasting the huge resources expended on the process and truncating democracy? The shenanigans that caused Eresia-Ike to run from pillar to post took place some four decades ago: Can we say we have made appreciable progress or are we still trapped in the woods? Do opposition parties fare better today? I leave everyone to judge!

A peep into history (III)

If he looks back today at his illustrious but chequered career, I think I can guess a few things that must have broken IBB's heart. One is the parcel bomb that killed the celebrated journalist, Dele Giwa, on 19 October, 1986 during IBB's watch. The unresolved nature of the dastardly murder must be giving the former military president sleepless nights. More so if the reported last words of Giwa: 'This must be from Mr. President' continues to ring in IBB's ears. The Major Gideon Gwaza Orkar coup of 22 April, 1990 is another incident that may give IBB heartbreak. IBB escaped by the whiskers but not before the coupists had taken him and his government to the cleaners. The terrible things said about IBB, if they continue to ring in his ears, may trouble his heart. The outgoing government of Gov. Samuel Ortom of Benue State must have opened old wounds and pointedly directed an arrow at IBB's heart when, last week, he announced a decision to honour Orkar by not only naming a street after him but by also justifying some of his allegations against IBB and his administration.

The 'SAP with a human face' letter written by former President Olusegun Obasanjo to IBB was said to have unsettled and rattled the gap-toothed self-styled military president. Not given to pulling punches, Obasanjo pummeled IBB and his government hard, accusing both of putting Nigerians through unthinkable suffering and unmitigated misery. Whenever IBB thinks of a man who hits you hard but you dare not hit him back, his heart may break. Next is the IMF debate during which Nigerians rejected the IMF loan and its conditions but IBB and Chief Olu Falae, at first IBB's Secretary to the Federal Government and later Minister of Finance; went ahead against popular opinion to accept the loan. That decision laid the foundation for the decimation of the Naira. If the national currency has lost a huge percentage of its old value today, the blame rests with IBB and Falae, aka Mr. SAP. Which conscientious leader will remember that and not suffer heartbreak?

I can go on and on! The execution, on 5 March, 1986, of Gen. Mamman Jiya Vasta, said to be a childhood and bosom friend of IBB, by the same IBB, cannot but give anyone a heartbreak, especially when, years later, Gen. Domkat Bali, who had announced to a bewildered nation the execution of the alleged coupists 'about an hour ago' was quoted as saying he was not sure they were right in the decision they took! Who will hear that and his heart will not break, especially each time the media decides to conduct interviews with Vatsa's widow and children that opened old wounds? IBB's decision to step aside on 27 August, 1993 was not an easy one. Reports had it that his wife and glamorous First Lady, Maryam, never brooked that. As editor of The PUNCH, we published a daily 'Countdown to Democracy... so and so days to go' which impeccable sources said enraged Maryam. 'Who told them we are going!' she was quoted as saying! But go, they did and could that not have broken IBB's heart? IBB stepped aside and has not been able to step back in ever since. Seeing Obasanjo and, next, Muhammadu Buhari achieve the feat of military Head of State and, later, civilian President, is that not enough to break IBB's heart?

Load-Date: May 22, 2023

End of Document

Supreme Court Judgment Portends Grave Implications For Judiciary, Democracy, Electoral Process — Ihedioha

Nigerian Tribune

March 8, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 743 words

Body

---

Sacked governor of Imo State, Emeka Ihedioha, on Sunday, broke his silence over last Tuesday's Supreme Court judgment, noting that the judgment portended great implications for the nation's electoral process, the judicial system and the future of democracy.

According to Ihedioha, in a statement he personally signed, the future of democracy was particularly threatened if 'institutions that are critical to the entrenchment of the rule of law' thwarted the wishes of the people in a cynical manner.

Though Ihedioha decried that justice was still not served in the end, he pointed to the dissenting judgment delivered by Justice Centus Nweze as one that vindicated his stand that the Supreme Court judgement of 14th January 2020 should have been in his favour.

While noting that he was proud of having served out the genuine mandate given to him by Imo people, for a short while, Ihedioha said he hoped for the ultimate judgment by God and opportunities to serve people of Imo State.

He lampooned those 'rejoicing about their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people and brazenly stealing the people's mandate', noting that he took solace in God rendering the ultimate judgment.

It will be recalled that the Supreme Court had last week dismissed an application filed by Ihedioha asking it to set aside a judgement of 14th January 2020 that declared Hope Uzodinma of the All Progressives Congress (APC) the Imo State governor.

Though one out of seven justices dissented, the court, led by the Chief Justice of Nigeria (CJN) Tanko Mohammed, had held that it lacked powers to sit on an appeal in its own judgment delivered on merit and in accordance with dictates of the law and justice.

The statement read, in parts, 'Whatever may be the personal injury I suffer as a result of the miscarriage of justice, my main concern in this whole tragic episode is not about me.'

'It has always been about the implications this judgement could have for the future of our democracy and the right of the electorate to have their votes count.'

Supreme Court Judgment Portends Grave Implications For Judiciary, Democracy, Electoral Process —
Ihedioha

'If institutions that are critical to the entrenchment of the rule of law could thwart the wishes of the people in a cynical manner, where lies the future of our democracy? That was why I sought a review of the Supreme Court judgement.

'Even though justice was not served at the end, the well-articulated dissenting judgement delivered by His Lordship, Justice Centus Nweze, has vindicated our stand. I am sure that history and posterity will be kind to him.

'To those who are rejoicing about their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people, as well as their collaborators, let me leave them with the immortal words of the late journalist, Dele Giwa: 'No evil deed will go unpunished; any evil done by man to man will be redressed; if not now then certainly later; if not by man, then by God for the victory of evil over good is temporary'.

'We believe that God will render the ultimate judgment. He has been with us through this peaceful struggle. And our future is in His hands.

'While it is disheartening to note that your desire to introduce good governance has been halted, at least for now, it is also gratifying that our modest efforts have not gone unnoticed.

'I, therefore, feel a sense of pride and gratitude for the wonderful energy and commitment that we deployed together to secure the mandate that has now been brazenly stolen from us.

'On this matter, the people of Imo State collectively rose to demand justice and fairness. Imo people rose up in defence of their right to elect leaders of their choice.

'Our people resoundingly rejected oppression and power grab, defied imposition, injustice and tyranny. I salute Imo people for this display of courage in the face of oppressive state power.

'I will forever be in the debt of Nigerians of all walks of life, across ethnic, religious and political divides, senior citizens, journalists, civil societies, ordinary men and women of a good conscience, who added their voice to condemn the injustice done in our case.

'It has been a great privilege to serve the people of Imo State as Governor. I am proud to have been the recipient of their genuine mandate. I will forever cherish the support, solidarity and cooperation given to me during my tenure.

'My belief in the ultimate triumph and supremacy of the will of the people remains intact. But I am firmly resolved NEVER to give up on the struggle for a better Imo State. And for a better governed Nigeria.'

Load-Date: March 13, 2020

Press Freedom: Report indicts FG, govs, NASS, others

The Sun (Nigeria)

June 30, 2021 Wednesday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 975 words

Byline: Cyril

Body

---

From Fred Itua, Abuja

A report detailed atrocities, murder, torture and rights abuse of journalists practicing in Nigeria, has indicted the administration of President Muhammadu Buhari, State Governors, National Assembly, politicians, security agencies, among others.

The report tagged: "The State of Media Freedom in Nigeria", and released by the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) and Media Foundation for West Africa, at a press conference in Abuja, focused primarily on the last six years of President Buhari.

The report listed journalists killed and whose deaths were yet to be resolved. It also listed journalists harassed by State actors and beaten up in their line of duty. Media houses harassed by security operatives, were not spared from the indictment.

National President of NUJ , Chris Isiguzo, while speaking on the contents of the report, said practicing in Nigeria is Beckingham dangerous venture. He bemoaned the repeated harassment of journalists.

Part of the report read: "Politicians have realised that to acquire power, either through legitimate means or through outright manipulations, they need to obtain the connivance of the media. And politicians and political office holders also know that to retain power, they require the support of the media, ditto those who wish to ascend to power.

"Even those whose positions are threatened suddenly realise the need to pocket the media. These elements have compounded the problems of the media. The media in Nigeria have suffered a number of setbacks over the years,

Press Freedom: Report indicts FG, govs, NASS, others

with the obvious but unsuccessful attempts by government to control them. There are equally increased harassment and killings of journalists in the country.

"These acts are daily causing frustrations among media professionals in the country.

Politicians, both in and out of government are increasingly filing legal cases against journalists who especially report on allegations of corruption, while security operatives have been used to block access for reporters in several areas.

"Acts of impunity against journalists, particularly murder, is the ultimate form of censorship. These unfortunately, are likely to continue unabated. From the murder of Dele Giwa in 1986 through a parcel bomb, the killers are yet to be fished out and brought to book. Since then several attacks have been recorded against journalists, in spite of the fact that attacks against journalists and media equipment are illegal under international humanitarian law and the Nigerian legal system.

"Clear signals indicate that such killings are sponsored by desperate politicians and high office holders who had things they wished kept secret. For the period being reviewed, 2016- 2020, we have recorded some of the highest levels of violence targeting journalists in the country. These statistics constitute an indictment of the poor record on democracy and rule of law in Nigeria.

"The lack of transparency, corruption and politics of exclusion often result in frustrations and violent rivalries, creating dangerous environments in which journalists become easy targets for powerful forces intent on suppressing dissent and evading public accountability.

"The increasing rate of violations of media professionals and members of their families, is a clear signal that journalists are now being deliberately targeted as a result of the work they do. At least 300 violations affecting about 500 journalists, media workers and media houses have been recorded in Nigeria under the regime of President Buhari.

"On April 11, 2016 around 3. Am, an unknown gunman kidnaped Tope Kuteye, the Channels TV correspondent in Owerri from his home. The kidnapper later made a ransom demand of N15million.

"On December 2016, the Department of State Service in Lokoja, Kogi State, arrested Friday Ogungemi, publisher of Policy and Lawmaker Magazine and detained him without trial. This action which was at the instance of Governor Yahaya Bello of Kogi State was another example of how prominent Nigerians react to Media scrutiny. Friday Ogungemi's alleged crime was authoring an Editorial on the Chief of Staff to the Governor of Kogi State, Mr Edward Onoja.

"On January 17, 2017, the Borno State Police Command arrested and detained Inuwa Bwala, Publisher of National Trial newspaper in Abuja, at the instance of a top politician in 2016. This Journalist had to send an SOS (Save Our Soul) to the Nigeria Union of Journalists and friends that there was threat to his life in detention. It took the intervention of the Union to secure his release.

"On January 13, 2017, the Police CID in Area 10 Garki, Abuja, arrested and detained Desmond Utomwen, publisher of Freshnews, an online newspaper, at the instance of a serving Customs officer, Inspector Umaru Faru. Desmond was working on a story which allegedly was critical of the said officer. Desmond was released following the intervention of Police AIG Usman Shehu who received a complaint from the NUJ. The Union demanded for a thorough investigation by the customs of the alleged corruption by Umaru Faru, but to no effect.

"On January 19, 2017, the police arrested Premium Times Publisher, Dapo Olorunyomi alongside the Judiciary Reporter, Evelyn Okakwu, and held them for several hours at Police Headquarters in

Press Freedom: Report indicts FG, govs, NASS, others

Abuja. This was at the instance of the Chief of Army Staff then, Lt Gen Tukur Yusuf Buratai who complained about defamation of character.

"On April 19, 2017, some men of the Criminal Investigation Department (CID) of the Nigeria Police Force, arrested and detained Midat Joseph, correspondent of the Leadership newspaper for being critical of Kaduna State Government and the Governor Nasir el-Rufai's administration. The journalist later released on bail granted by a court after spending two nights at the Police cell."

The post Press Freedom: Report indicts FG, govs, NASS, others appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: June 30, 2021

---

End of Document

Imo: God'll Judge Supreme Court Justices –Ihedioha

The Sun (Nigeria)

March 9, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 747 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Godwin Tsa,

Emeka Ihedioha has handed over the Justices of the Supreme Court that truncated his seven months reign as governor of Imo State to God.

The court had on January 14, 2020 replaced him with Senator Hope Uzodinma of the All Progressive Congress (APC) after holding that his (Ihedioha) emergence was based on wrong computation by the Independent National Electoral Commission (INEC).

The apex court had equally dismissed his application for the setting aside of the judgment in it's March 3 for lacking in merit.

But in a statement in Abuja, yesterday, the former deputy speaker of the House of Representatives said he has resigned his faith in God.

Ihedioha who described the judgment of the Supreme Court as a fraud said God will be the ultimate judge.

He, however, singled out Justice Centus Nweze who entered a dissenting judgment in his favour for praise.

The statement read: "On Tuesday 3rd March 2020, the Supreme Court of Nigeria gave a ruling rejecting our application to set aside its earlier judgement of 14th January 2020 on the Imo State governorship election. This is certainly not the outcome we wanted or we worked so hard for and I know how disappointed you must feel. While it is disheartening to note that your desire to introduce good governance has been halted, at least for now, it is also gratifying that our modest efforts have not gone unnoticed. I therefore feel a sense of pride and gratitude for the wonderful energy and commitment that we deployed together to secure the mandate that has now been brazenly stolen from us.

Imo : God'll Judge Supreme Court Justices –Ihedioha

"Permit me to use this opportunity to thank all those who played one role or another in this historic quest for justice and truth. I must thank members of the diplomatic community for voicing their concerns for the stability of our country. I commend the Chairman and Members of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) for their vanguard role and leadership during this period.

"In particular, my special thanks go to all Imo citizens for their uncommon support, solidarity, and collective outrage. Never have a people been so united and committed to a cause. You prayed, fasted, marched, protested and even cried. You sacrificed your time, resources, and endeavour for this just cause. On this matter, the people of Imo State collectively rose to demand for justice and fairness. Imo people rose up in defence of their right to elect leaders of their choice. Our people resoundingly rejected oppression and power grab, defied imposition, injustice and tyranny. I salute Imo people for this display of courage in the face of oppressive state power.

"I will forever be in the debt of Nigerians of all walks of life, across ethnic, religious and political divides, senior citizens, journalists, civil societies, ordinary men and women of good conscience, who added their voice to condemn the injustice done in our case. These are people unknown to me personally but who could not bear the illogic of turning number four to number one on the basis of a fraudulently procured result, and appealed to the Supreme Court to save itself and our judiciary.

"Whatever may be the personal injury I suffer as a result of the miscarriage of justice, my main concern in this whole tragic episode is not about me. It has always been about the implications this judgement could have for the future of our democracy and the right of the electorate to have their votes count. If institutions that are critical to the entrenchment of rule of law could thwart the wishes of the people in a cynical manner, where lies the future of our democracy? That was why I sought a review of the Supreme Court judgement. Even though justice was not served at the end, the well articulated dissenting judgement delivered by His Lordship, Justice Centus Nweze, has vindicated our stand. I am sure that history and posterity will be kind to him.

"To those who are rejoicing about their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people, as well as their collaborators, let me leave them with the immortal words of the late journalist, Dele Giwa: "No evil deed will go unpunished; any evil done by man to man will be redressed; if not now then certainly later; if not by man, then by God for the victory of evil over good is temporary'. We believe that God will render the ultimate judgment. He has been with us through this peaceful struggle. And our future is in His hands."

The post Imo: God'll Judge Supreme Court Justices –Ihedioha appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: March 9, 2020

The road to the Sabres

The Punch

April 9, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1758 words

Body

When I look back to 1996, the year I started my first job as a journalist, it feels like we were living in a prehistoric era. It is hard to believe that back then, our only work tools were a large dose of optimism with a pen and some paper, or what we called 'off-cuts' (roughly cut A4-size papers from huge reams of newsprint). Some of us had 'midgets' (micro tape recorders) or the Sony Walkman-type tape recorders, for interviews, but I did not know of any reporter who had a PC or a laptop. After we finished writing our stories in long hand, we gave the sheaf of papers to typesetters, who would type and print out for the sub-editors to knock into readable copies. The Internet was just an abstract concept you read about in foreign newspapers or magazines. We didn't even have emails.

However, all this would change over a few short years as the digitisation of media began and many newsrooms in Nigeria became computerised, making it mandatory for journalists to upskill to operate in the new environment. Soon, a laptop was an essential working tool, but it was the introduction of GSM telephony in 2001 that was truly revolutionary. The ability to communicate remotely with sources to access information on the move, and to do so in real time was a game changer. But it was only the beginning. In subsequent years, content convergence onto mobile and other devices meant that broadcasting, telecommunications and computing integrated into one device - enabled by rapidly improving Internet connectivity.

The pace of change is only accelerating. It seems like yesterday that we were marvelling at the innovations that mobile connectivity enabled, but today, the cutting-edge is so much more advanced. We live in a world where Artificial Intelligence and Augmented and Virtual Reality are moving into the mainstream and showing us things that many of us had never dreamed of. If ChatGPT can use natural language processing to interact with humans in a way that is indistinguishable from human-to-human interaction; if it can not only respond to questions, but produce creative content, write essays and codes, then what utility would there have been for me as an aspiring journalist in 1996? The value and skills I learnt and built a career on are being automated, but with progress comes risk. Not just to hundreds of millions of jobs, but to the integrity and reliability of information and to the role of the media.

According to Rijul Gupta, the tech entrepreneur founder of 'Deep Media,' a company striving to create ethical AI tools, the current capabilities of ChatGPT are just the early signs of what lies ahead. "We are currently only seeing text and images, very soon, not only will the pope be seen wearing a puffy jacket, there will be a video of him break-dancing in it - fully realistic," he said. In short, the fabric of truth and reality is being threatened, making it more and more difficult to distinguish between actuality and falsehood.

The road to the Sabres

But moving on, while we leave Rijul Gupta and other capable minds in Silicon Valley and other tech hubs, to create ethical AI that would save our world from itself, I have been pondering where the Nigerian media sit in this digital bubble and what does it all mean for us?

State of play in Nigeria...

But sadly, as modernity and digitisation have rapidly altered the shape and structure of the industry, so we have seen an erosion of the ethos of the profession. Media without journalism is on the rise. There is a high birthrate but short life expectancy for publications and platforms in the industry. The Nigerian media space is in a state of flux, where it is difficult to grow and retain talent; invest in the future and institute good corporate governance culture to drive performance with integrity. Those in doubt should do a comparative analysis of newspapers across all tiers today. This will show that most publish the same government and corporate press releases and event photos - no more frequent scoops; no more exclusives for which leading lights like Gbolabo Ogunsanwo, Dele Giwa, et al were renowned.

Journalists cannot take the blame for this in isolation. Their ability to innovate, or simply operate according to best practice is a function of the environment within which they are employed. It is no surprise that they are demotivated when media owners owe people for months in salaries and other entitlements; when there are no opportunities or clear paths for career advancement, training, capacity building and self-improvement. All these are clear and present danger, even while the foundations of the profession itself are being threatened by the rise of Artificial Intelligence which I described in the opening paragraphs.

But with these challenges, comes an incredible opportunity. I don't think there has ever been a more important time to be a journalist. To uphold the centuries-old principles that should guide our profession and to ensure that the mass explosion of content and the automation coming behind it is balanced by the independent and investigative journalists that have made the fourth estate such an important pillar of our society.

The only way to approach this is to invest in technology and talent at the same time, ensuring that we produce quality content (original pieces and investigative stories) that people want to read. If we cannot maintain our audiences' attention through the platforms that they want to use, then what hope do we have of making this commercial? The polar opposites of this, or a dystopia of sorts, is what we presently have in the country.

The good news is that at this time of flux, and of opportunity, we have a growing population of young and enterprising media practitioners who are very comfortable with technology; they recognise the fact that 'content is king;' they understand the vast possibilities of digital communications and are determined to leverage it to scale the limitations of their society and peculiar circumstances.

In steps MTN Media Innovation Programme

At MTN, we recognise the incredible potential of this generation; of the confluence with emerging technology and the way that they crave applied technology to attain journalistic excellence, catch up with global trends and generally improve their storytelling techniques. How better to drive the emergence of leading digital solutions for Nigeria's progress and achieve shared prosperity than to invest in protecting the heritage and driving the future potential of the Nigerian media. We are committed to using our technology and assets to help build a better tomorrow and in furtherance of these efforts, in 2022, we started what we call the MTN Media Innovation Programme (MIP) in partnership with the Pan-Atlantic University (PAU), Lagos.

The MIP is a fellowship for journalists (media practitioners across the entire spectrum, including social media), and it is designed to help them build capacity at both professional and business levels. It is delivered over a six-month period as a certificate course. It combines theoretical rigour with practical workshops to enhance the knowledge and skills of participants in the areas of communications, technology, media effects, writing/reporting and general business management.

By empowering media practitioners to do their job better and drive innovation, we are seeking to build the much-needed sustainability in the industry. As we all know, innovation drives change and builds new approaches to problem-solving and solution-oriented media practice for the benefit of humanity. Apart from equipping media stakeholders with the skills to adapt to the changing realities that guarantee career and financial success, we also thought to add international exposure to the training, which will broaden the scope of the participants. To this end, MIP includes a study visit to the University of Witwatersrand in South Africa.

The road to the Sabres

We also recognise that to move the needle on this challenge, we need to take a long-term approach. The pilot phase of the MIP will run from 2022 to 2024, but our ambitions are much greater. We seek to establish a programme that can be seen in the same light as a Yale Fellowship, or a Desmond Tutu Fellowship, whose recipients play such an important role in shaping our world.

To do that, we needed to design a programme and curriculum that was inclusive, innovative and immersive. We selected 20 journalists representing each of Nigeria's geo-political zones as our first cohort, and we set ourselves the challenge of 'enabling accelerated transformation' through the programme. We built a teaching team featuring the best and brightest in Nigeria's academic, professional and media ecosystem - from the PAU to BusinessDay, Bloomberg, BBC, PUNCH, Premium Times; technology entrepreneurs and innovators building in the media space, as well as our own leadership team.

We took our fellows on immersive facility visits in Nigeria and South Africa, from experience centres to sub-sea cable landing stations, 5G demonstrations and to academic and corporate campuses; they saw the breadth of the ecosystem as it is currently structured.

After six intense months, our first group of fellows graduated. Both documentary and anecdotal evidence suggest the impact that we have been able to achieve, from improvements in writing and reporting skills to the way they leverage technology to improve output and product quality. These are still early days, but 2022 taught us that we have a structure that can work, build upon and if we are patient, achieve the ambitious transformational objectives we have set for ourselves.

The MTN MIP is the first of its kind in Nigeria - no other corporate organisation has ever invested so much in a sustainable and far-reaching capacity-building programme for journalists, where intended outcomes can be successfully tracked. We are incredibly excited about building on the platform we have created to make the 2023 cohort even more successful.

In recognition of the innovative approach to capacity development in the media, I was honoured to be awarded 'Innovator of the Year' at the 2023 IN2 SABRE awards, which was held at the PRovoke EMEA Summit in Gesellschaftshaus Palmengarten Frankfurt, Germany on Thursday, March 23, 2023. As MTN's project director for the MIP and lead liaison with the Nigerian media, the award is a personal recognition that I am incredibly proud to receive but represents the work and talent of a wider team that has worked tirelessly to make this happen.

...Aina is the Senior Manager, External Relations, MTN Nigeria.

Load-Date: April 9, 2023

The Nation flies highest with 10 prizes at NMMA

The Nation (Nigeria)

December 15, 2017 Friday

Copyright 2017 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 261 words

Body

---

The best reporters and writers are in The Nation and this is official.

With 10 coveted prizes at the prestigious Nigerian Media Merit Awards (NMMA), this newspaper's leadership in quality reportage has been reaffirmed. The Nation won the highest number of awards at the 27th NMMA on Wednesday night at the Muson Centre in Onikan, Lagos.

The prizes were from the 29 in the print media category. The Nation had 28 nominations, winning in 10 categories - the highest by any newspaper. The rest were shared among The Punch, New Telegraph, Nigerian Tribune, Business Day, The Sun, The Source and Vanguard.

Editor Gbenga Omotoso won the Dele Giwa Prize for Editor of the Year.

Vintage Press Chairman Wale Edun, in a message to Managing Director Victor Ifijeh, who broke the news to him, said:'Fantastic news. Congratulations all round. I salute the superb quality of our entire team'.

Winners all

Gbenga Omotoso- Dele Giwa Prize for Editor of the Year

Adekunle Yusuf- Alex Ibru Prize for Investigative Reporter of the Year

Taiwo Alimi - Bashorun M.K.O. Abiola Prize for Sports Reporter of the Year

Emeka Ugwuanyi - Peter Odili Power Reporter of the Year

Seun Akioye - Olusegun Mimiko Prize for Foreign News Reporter of the Year

Uguru Okorie - Adamu Mu'azu Tourism Reporter of the Year

Collins Nweze - Union Bank Prize for Banking and Finance Reporter of the Year

Collins Nweze - Access Bank Prize for Capital Market Reporter of the Year

Innocent Duru - Abubakar Imam Prize for Newspaper Feature Writer of the Year

Betty Abbah- Cecil King Memorial Prize for Print Journalist of the Year

The Nation flies highest with 10 prizes at NMMA

Load-Date: December 15, 2017

---

End of Document

Ethical Dilemma, Journalism Practice and Remedies -By Taiwo Hassan

Opinion Nigeria

January 1, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 Opinion Nigeria Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

...Addressing today's topical issues

Length: 1560 words

Byline: Opinion Nigeria

Body

---

The ethical dilemma comes in different shades. It ranges from editors and journalists slanting a story to cover real issues by giving prominence to a good side of a story without balance, helping the government and other officials in disinformation propaganda to launder the image of the government, and receiving gratification to downplay news stories. The list is endless. Ethics is primarily being bound by a moral principle. The journalism profession has come a long way with its embedded moral codes. Many Journalists have lost their lives and other things they hold dear trying to uphold the ethics of the profession. Journalists as a social-actor in society interacting with other actors; must face conflict within these social relations. An ethical dilemma is a problem where a person has to choose between a moral and an immoral act either as a survival strategy or pressure to perform in order to achieve organisational objectives. Hence, there must be a clash between professional loyalties and certain interests that may undermine the credibility of journalists. It is a delicate balance that can seriously question objectivity.

As the issue of ethics is very important in the journalism profession in Nigeria, it is also relevant globally. Ethical dilemmas faced by journalists in different parts of the world are increasing and not abating accentuated by online and citizen journalism that leverage internet-influenced-ICT. The character of media organisations and journalists is defined clearly during a crisis that pitted one nation against another, or one section of society against the other. When media take sides in whatever way either in war or crisis situation knowing full well that every word written or spoken by them is a freely-given machete, bullet, bomb and ready-made tool in the hands of war actors to perpetrate further atrocities; the ethical and professional obligation of the media is to provide objective, accurate and balanced reporting during war, conflict or peace-time for people to make informed analysis, influence debate and volunteer their opinion and not for journalists and editors to distort or suppress information for certain motives. Just like what happened in 2nd World War where journalists and editors in Germany, Czech and Poland as well as the United States, United Kingdom and France during the 1930s and 1940s not only used the situation to feather their nest but also broke morals codes governing journalism profession to serve as propaganda tools that distorted facts to fan the ember of the war with devastating consequences. Media taking sides in the reportage of Yemen, Syrian and Russian-Ukrainian conflict abound. Online journalists are also not left out of this charade. Media houses and their journalists from the US, Europe, Africa and Asia demonstrate this. Using Europe and US as a typical example, the news angle about the war on VOA, CBS,

Ethical Dilemma, Journalism Practice and Remedies -By Taiwo Hassan

BBC, DW, and France 24 toe the line of the government. FOX and SKY New in the UK and SKY News-Australia toe another line by apportioning blames, politicizing and criticism of President Vladimir Zelensky for profiting from the war instead of offering solution journalism, giving audience balanced, human-angle and result-oriented reporting that will facilitate relief for children, women and families facing hunger and humanitarian crisis and not reportage skewed to the owner's interest and political leaning.

Contemporary ethical issues facing reporters and editors today are more complex, profound and devastating due to the power of the internet, smartphones and other digital platforms which have placed journalism in the hands of ordinary citizens to provide "exclusive news" "exclusive footage" or "breaking news" that is not easily confirmed or fact-checked. Ethical issues facing reporters and editors today globally are aggravated in the developing world especially, Nigeria where the ethical dilemma facing journalism professionals is so damning. When journalists are owed salary for months without knowing when it is going to be paid or how they are going to settle their bills, families need to be fed, rent to be paid and other needs to be taken care of ethical discipline will definitely take a back-sit. In fact, Nigerian journalists are poorly paid in terms of their total welfare package. Some earn as little as less than $150 a month.

Journalists have found themselves in a difficult situation of balancing the demands of their survival and that of protecting the interest of the society in which they live vis-a-vis adhering to professional ethics. The question is: how does one expect journalists in this situation not to compromise, not to have a conflict of interests, not to behave unethically or expect him to remember any journalistic ethics or codes for that matter? Media houses that cannot pay salary resorts to arm-twisting their staff to look for sponsor either individual or organization; who can bankroll a programme in order to get paid from the sponsor's fees they attract to the station. It is a shame to see the wide income gap between reporters and their editorial bosses. Some reporters earn as little as 50,000 Naira ($112) a month, and many of them are Master's degree holders. Apart from getting money from politicians who want favourable reports, the editors have perks they enjoyed.

The killing of late veteran Journalist, Dele Giwa, publisher of Tell Magazine through a letter bomb for upholding journalism ethics by refusing to compromise on what he uncovered through his investigation on the Military regime of General Ibrahim Babangida reportedly caused his assassination. The journalism profession is guided by truth and accuracy, independence, fairness and impartiality, humanity and accountability, objectivity, credibility and facts. But, who wants to die upholding any journalism ethics when his life, economic survival and that of his family is at stake considering the fact that no welfare package is on the ground to take care of one loved-ones when a Journalist passes away particularly, in a country like Nigeria. As it is better imagined than experienced, families left behind by dead or slain journalists are in the best position to tell of the abject poverty they found themselves following the passing of their breadwinners. The Nigerian Union of Journalists (NUJ) can hardly do much to help. Many of them have vowed not to ever allow their children to go into the journalism profession again.

Not toeing the line of reticence, I believe ethical dilemmas in journalism can be remedied. Though, as I said earlier, an ethical dilemma can be a survival strategy or pressure to perform in order to achieve organisational objectives. Ethical issues persist globally just like in Nigeria as a result of individual, organizational, environmental and societal challenges. It is imperative to empower and equip journalists to prepare for contemporary challenges and ethical dilemmas in the profession in terms of side vocation to break dependency syndrome for bribes to make them less amenable to unethical socio-economic inducements. Journalists must be adequately remunerated. For Journalists to perform their "constitutional roles and obligations, journalists must 'appear-well' and 'feed-well' to 'work-well'. Wages commensurate with other professions must be paid to journalists to boost their egos as professionals. Opportunities for career advancement and satisfaction should be created for average Journalists and not for editors alone.

Ethical Dilemma, Journalism Practice and Remedies -By Taiwo Hassan

Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) Code of Journalism Practice needs to be reviewed to recognise socio-economic circumstances journalists found themselves in the line of duty so as to have a living-code that is able to take cognizance of journalists' survival strategy or work performance pressures as well as serves as checks on the excesses of journalists. The remedy is also to have NUJ which presently doubles as a trade union and professional body be solely professional body while a new body under NUJ would be a trade union arm fighting for the rights of journalists as regards the condition of service, salary payment etc. to take care of socio-economic induced-ethical dilemma faced by Journalists in tandem with "International Federation of Journalists" (IFJ) collective actions to support journalists to fight for fair pay, decent working conditions and in defence of their labour rights and also, in alignment with what the "Committee to Protect Journalists" does. ( an independent, nonprofit organization that promotes press freedom, and defends journalists' rights to report news safely without fear of reprisal.

In order not to call the objectivity of journalists to question, media men must stay within the professional ethics of the profession and also know how conflict and crisis stories should be written for online, print and electronic media without running into ethical potholes. Recognizing national security interest in the prohibition of information regarded as sensitive, offensive or subjudice and not personal interests; Journalists can balance their reportage independently not relying on press releases, press statements and other information issued by the government but by being professional in their journalistic endeavours.

Taiwo Hassan is from the Federal Ministry of Information, Radio House, Abuja (taiwohassan76@ yahoo.com)

Load-Date: March 30, 2023

---

End of Document

Favoured by Benevolent Gods...

This Day

December 11, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 THISDAY NEWSPAPERS LTD. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1439 words

Body

---

Wole Olaoye

For some inexplicable reason, the first thought that came to my mind when I saw the title of Dr. Yemi Ogunbiyi's memoirs, "The Road Never Forgets", was a quick throwback to Wole Soyinka's world-acclaimed play, "The Road". The word, road, has had a loaded meaning for me on various metaphorical levels since I acted in a production of the play in the early '70s at the SS Peter and Paul Major Seminary, Bodija, Ibadan, under the directorship of the inimitable amazon of theatre scholarship, Zulu Sofola.

But Ogunbiyi's road is a much happier one than that portrayed in Soyinka's The Road. From his birth in Kano through his thrilling sojourns in life to his 75th birthday, Ogunbiyi takes us on an exciting journey through the road of life populated by family, friends, foes and sundry stragglers. Underlying his rendition is a firm belief in his immutable destiny in which others have been assigned by Providence to play specific roles, for good or for ill, to steer him towards fulfilling the purpose for which he had been sent hither.

Ogunbiyi is a good storyteller. In lucid prose, he connects the dots of what, by any standard, has been a remarkable life in which various actors make their appearance on his stage, play their part and move on while he continues his journey on the road of life, a journey made tolerable by the understanding, forbearance and love of his wife, Sade. With admirable candour, he presents himself, not as a superman, but as a simple mortal with failings and missteps like everyone else.

He had started out in life with a hazy realisation of who he really was. Born in Kano to a Yoruba father and an Igbo mother, his first language was Hausa. Then, of course, he also spoke Igbo but very little Yoruba. Who really was the young Yemi - Hausa, Igbo, Yoruba, or Wazobia.

Experts say that an identity crisis is a period of uncertainty or confusion in a person's life which occurs when a person's sense of identity becomes insecure and unstable. The affected person is questioning who he/she is and his/her role in society. As noted by the famous developmental psychologist, Erik Erikson, the formation of identity is one of the most important conflicts that people face.

Favoured by Benevolent Gods...

Ogunbiyi paints fascinating scenes of a happy childhood of masquerades, boyhood pranks and high academic expectations with the understanding that while his parents provided all his material needs, he was obliged to return good grades at school.

The decision to send him to secondary school in Western Region was to make a lasting impact on his life in such a way that it helped him resolve the question of who he really was. He had a kind of Obama moment when he met his grandmother in Ipara and was introduced to his rich Yoruba heritage and endless streams of relatives.

That section of the narrative reminded me of Barack Obama's own account of bonding with his Kenyan roots when he visited his grandmother in the village and realised that he was bearing a name with a rich heritage. In America, Obama was just another name; in Kenya, it was a name with recognition and illustrious ancestry. It was the same for Ogunbiyi when he made his first trip to Ipara. It was an umbilical reunion that bridged the identity gorge deep within his psyche.

The author admits that much in his Epilogue:

"So, on one level, this book is about self-identity.... Self-identity is a complex phenomenon that is sometimes based on the mundane quotidian forms of belonging that allow for a reflexive positioning of the self in a given cultural setting. These intuitive manifestations of self-identity may not be readily apparent. But they underpin the very essence of a totality of who we think we are since, ultimately, self-identity is also about self-perception".

The story of Ogunbiyi's life is one of a restless youth ever seeking new challenges, unfazed by the daunting obstacles before him. He started out as an academic and quickly rose through the dint of hard work to become a senior lecturer and Acting Head of Department. Fate intervened when he accepted Stanley Macebuh's offer to spend his sabbatical year at the newly established Guardian newspaper in Lagos. At the end of the period, he requested an extension of the sabbatical by one year. His request was rejected. He eventually chose to resign.

That was how the academic became, first at the Guardian, an editorial writer, then a journalist, an advertising executive, a director and then the managing director of Nigeria's oldest newspaper institution, the Daily Times. He was fired twice - at the Guardian and Daily Times. From then onwards, he resolved never again to accept any position from which he might be fired someday. That was how he set up his own company, TANUS. From every lemon thrown at him, Ogunbiyi has managed to make lemonade!

The author has had the privilege of forging close relationships with very senior academics, traditional rulers, military top brass and captains of industry. In several instances, it has also brought him fame and fortune. Ogunbiyi's life has been enriched by his association with Nobel Laureate Wole Soyinka, Prof Ojetunji Aboyade, Chief Obafemi Awolowo, Prof Biodun Jeyifo, Dele Giwa, General Babangida, Admiral Aikhomu, General Abacha and several others. Providence has positioned benevolent gods at every turn to help him crack the palm kernel of success.

Ogunbiyi uses the game of golf to take a philosophical look at life. According to him, "Unlike most sports, in golf you play against yourself to try and beat your previous record, which in turn forces you to train more and improve... Golf teaches us that sometimes, life doesn't go as planned."

Ogunbiyi's life story is also the life story of his wife, Sade, and other people who have impacted his journey on the road of life: Family, mentors, friends, colleagues, benefactors, detractors and others whose paths crossed his.

With this style, the author is able to present some famous personages in a new light. Through his lenses, we are able to appreciate the other unknown or uncelebrated qualities of people who have played critical roles in Nigeria. Take his portrait of the late statesman, Chief Obafemi Awolowo, for example. Ogunbiyi tested the widely held notion that the chief was an unbending puritanical dictator who sought to impose his spartan ways on other people, by lighting a cigar in the home of the political titan. While associates of the chief were aghast and judgmental, Chief

Favoured by Benevolent Gods...

Awolowo only seized the moment to offer counsel: "That's okay! Yemi, you can have your cigar, even though I don't think it's good for your health."

Ogunbiyi's account of his relationship with General Ibrahim Babangida, the man whose government annulled the freest presidential ballot, the acclaimed June 12 elections, opens new vistas to understanding the enigmatic military politician. At once calculating, brilliant, charming and generous, Babangida's Achilles' heel was his penchant for trying to be everything to everybody. As Ogunbiyi notes:

"He was determined to shape his world and surroundings, make an impact, and leave a mark. He badly wanted to make a difference and be seen to walk on the right side of history.... Under pressure, presumably from his immediate constituency, he made grievous mistakes that cast an indelible shadow over his legacy. Simple as it may seem, he displayed the pitfalls of one of the basic tenets of leadership, which he certainly would have learnt in his earliest days as a soldier, namely that a leader does not tell different people what they want to hear...a leader cannot be everything to everyone...These errors underlie what might have been a laudable legacy of reforms and a lot more. And for that reason, it's just possible that with the benefit of hindsight and the passage of time, the fuller history of Nigeria might just be kinder to him".

My favourite story in the book is Ogunbiyi's account of the visit of Duro Ladipo, the legendary dramatist, to Ogunbiyi's flat in New York in the '70s. After dinner, Duro Ladipo didn't ask anyone's permission to take away the newly opened bottle of cognac. He simply said, "A i r'ajeku oro" (there can't be leftovers when the gods feast). Considering that Duro Ladipo has somehow come to be regarded as a personification of Shango, the god of Thunder, the Ogunbiyis painfully watched as the remainder of their cognac disappeared into the night with Shango.

The Road Never Forgets, Ogunbiyi's 516-page offering published by BOOKCRAFT, comes in 12 chapters and is deservedly dedicated to his wife, Iyalode Sade, and the rest of his family.

- Olaoye is a Public Relations consultant and veteran journalist.

Load-Date: August 22, 2023

---

End of Document

Dele Giwa's Murder - Omeben Lied, I Gave Statements to Police Twice - Soyinka

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 29, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1151 words

Body

---

Former London Bureau Chief of Newswatch Magazine, Kayode Soyinka, who was present when Dele Giwa, the co-founder of the magazine was murdered in 1986 through a letter bomb, has dismissed as lies comments by a retired Deputy Inspector General of Police, Chris Omeben, that he fled after the attack and was never questioned.

Omeben said on Monday that Soyinka was a prime suspect in the murder but the Newswatch management shielded him from being quizzed by the police.

Mr. Soyinka, who is now the publisher of Africa Today magazine, told Premium Times from his London base that he was questioned twice by the police after the incident and accused Omeben of deceit.

Labeling the retired police officer as a "disgrace" to the Nigerian Police, who worked with the former military regime to cover up the crime, Soyinka said: "I gave statements not once but twice to the same Nigerian Police he represents before I eventually left Nigeria. The first one was at the hospital where I was admitted - Dele's body was next door to me. That interrogation by a senior police officer whose name I cannot recall took place on the spot when the incident was still fresh. It was inside the hospital. Dele Olojede (publisher of defunct 234next newspaper) was beside me - he is alive, go and ask him," he said.

"The second statement I made when the police requested to see me again. It was made at the premises of Newswatch in Oregun Road in Lagos in the presence of the eminent lawyer Chief Gani Fawehinmi. I don't know why Omeben did not know about this and he is accusing me wrongly. The statement I made, and the ones made by Funmilayo (Dele's wife) and Billy, I believe, is now in public domain. Chief Gani Fawehinmi must have published them in the series of books he published on this subject before he died.

"So I don't understand why Omeben should tell Nigerians such a blatant lies. That is wickedness. He does not fear God at all. Thank God I am alive and I can respond to him. Can you imagine if I had died with Dele, Omeben and cohorts would have succeeded in putting cotton wool on the faces of Nigerians and sold a different story completely to them to exonerate those who did it," he added.

Mr. Soyinka recalled that Halilu Akilu called Mr. Giwa's house about three times within 24hours and spoke to Funmilayo, Dele's wife, to know how to get to the journalist's Ikeja home.

"On the Sunday of the bomb blast Dele had spoken to Akilu from his upstairs bedroom before coming down to have breakfast with me, to tell him that he heard he had called him on Saturday and asked why. The letter bomb was delivered to the house within 45 minutes after that early morning telephone discussion between Dele and Akilu. So who should be Omeben's 'principal suspect' then? Should it be me who was bombed with Dele? Or Akilu?

Dele Giwa's Murder - Omeben Lied, I Gave Statements to Police Twice - Soyinka

"Chris Omeben, who was a Deputy Inspector-General of Police, when the letter bomb blast occurred on October 19, 1986, is a complete disgrace to the Nigeria Police Force. He claimed to be an investigator of the bomb blast. Instead of protecting me, the survivor, who escaped death by a whisker, and by the very special grace of God, he is sadly and disgracefully trying to rewrite the script to make me, as he said, his 'principal suspect'.

"His 'principal suspect' should be Halilu Akilu, who called Dele's house about three times consecutively Saturday before the Sunday bombing and spoke to Funmilayo, Dele's wife, to ask for description of and direction to Dele's house in Ikeja.

"Omeben, said, and I quote: 'Soyinka knew what was coming and he left the room to hide behind the wall.' What a blatant lie? This man, who I understand is now a pastor, has no fear of God in him at all, making such bold erroneous statement like that on an issue of such sensitivity and accusing me, an innocent man - a victim and survivor of the bomb blast. He should ask God for forgiveness!

How Dele Giwa died

"Dele and I were the only two people in the study when Dele's son Billy delivered the letter bomb to his father. It is very important here to remember that some unidentified people, who gave it to the security man at the gate, delivered the parcel bomb to Dele's house.

"The security man, while coming inside the compound with the parcel saw Billy (Dele's son) on the way and gave it to him. When Billy came to the study and delivered the parcel to his father, Dele looked at it and handed it over to me. I looked at it and was able to vividly see the inscription on the padded envelope and handed it back to him. He received it back from me, moved his recycling chair back slightly to face the window on his left, he held the envelope with both hands, and tried to tear it through the top left-hand corner. He had not really opened it up, if he did it was only very slightly. And boom!! The bomb exploded!"

"A big ball of fire occurred. It was a very powerful bomb explosion! The side of the envelope facing the iron-barred window blew up that window. The side facing Dele exploded on his chest and stomach. And the force that came out from the bottom of the envelope blew up his upper legs and badly affected lower part of his body. He did not die immediately. He died in the hospital.

"Now, you see the vivid description I have just given you - 29 years after the gory incident. If I ran into the toilet or hid myself behind the wall before the bomb exploded like our Mr Omeben will like the world, and particularly Nigerians, to believe, and as he is trying hard, very hard, to label me as the suspect, how would I have been able to know all this, and give this graphic description?

"That partly was what the Oputa Panel missed when it investigated this matter because they did not see it necessary at that time to invite me to give evidence and I was not invited.

So, Mr Omeben should get it now that I did not - and I repeat I did not - run away to toilet or hid behind a wall. I sat on my own chair right in front of Dele. Only the strong mahogany L-shaped desk on which we were eating our breakfast divided us. So I was literary inches away from him. The huge desk must have mobbed the force of the blast that would have done the damage on me up.

"But the force was so powerful and so powerful enough to still lift me off my chair. The chair itself collapsed. I was thrown on the floor by the exit door. I was momentarily unconscious. But regained consciousness, flung my spectacles off my face, and staggered out of the room. Yes, I received no cut on my body, but my nightgown was spattered with blood - Dele's blood - and I had burns on my forehead. And I smelt of burns.

Dele Giwa's Murder - Omeben Lied, I Gave Statements to Police Twice - Soyinka

"I thank God for sparing my life. I could have been killed on that day. My survival was a Biblical miracle. I told you that I held the letter bomb myself! What if I was the one that opened it? And I could easily have opened it myself. But I gave it back to Dele. That's why I believe my survival was the work of God. My own time was not up yet."

Load-Date: October 30, 2015

---

End of Document

A peep into history - 3

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

May 21, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1951 words

Body

---

A young man was led into my office as the editor of The PUNCH one day decades ago; his name: Ibe Eresia-Eke (where is he now?), Executive Chairman (as title-crazy Nigerians often over-burden the title “Chairman” as if, standing alone, it is not “executive” enough!) of Ogbia/Egbema/Ndoni Local Government Area of Rivers state. He should be happy being an “Executive Chairman” but he was not because fire was on his rooftop. The advertisement notice he brought for publication, and which moved me to cause him to be interviewed, is as captured below. Titled “Don’t break IBB’s heart”, it speaks for itself, as they say. Please read:

“The temptation has been strong to write to the President, General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida, about the blatant and disgraceful use of State power to crush and annihilate opposition party governments in Rivers State. But knowing how much effort he has personally and gracefully invested in the democratic process, it may just be too heart-breaking if he knows that some powerful people in my state are now practically spreading petrol over his carefully-constructed edifice of democracy, ready to strike the match. The cases are legion now. Some of them have already been profusely reported, especially in the Sunday magazine (TSM). And, certainly, many more, even much more shocking, will be published by the fearless media outfits around, given the manner the power drunkards are carrying on.

In the interest of our nation, however, it has become almost imperative to corroborate much of what the press is doing to fight the wild anti-democratic trends in our dear state. I will attempt to do this by recounting some experience that one has had lately as Chairman of Ogbia/Egbema/Ndoni Local Government Area, one of the LGAs controlled by the opposition party in Rivers State, but where can I start; what do I state; what do I leave out in this short piece? Anyway, let’s just take a case and be brief.

During the councillors bye-elections of Saturday, 19th July, 1992, state force literally over-ran the LGA beating, intimidating indigenes of the area, and destroying properties. Naturally, people reached for the recesses of their homes to hide. Voters had to face the concern of escaping with life, a fortiori standing on the queue to vote. Of course, this sounds so much like fiction. It is almost incredible. But we can list even the numbers of vehicles employed in the operation, namely: RV 8119 DA, RV 8075 DA (both belonging to the Rivers State Transport Corporation). And to clear any stubborn doubts about the source of the vehicles, there was also a Toyota Jeep with registration number 25 RSVG 9. The vehicles, loaded with uniformed policemen and thugs, fired with the zeal of men on a State mission and armed to the teeth to do havoc to persons and property.

A peep into history - 3

As you may have guessed, many indigenes, including those standing in the election on the platform of the opposition party, were bundled to far-away Port Harcourt, the seat of power, to be locked away and (to be) thoroughly tortured. The private home of Dr. Kingdom Ogbangba, Deputy Minority Leader in the State House of Assembly, was verily vandalised. Let us leave out things too obscene to be published in a respectable medium like this! Of course, you may already have guessed this: At the end of the day, "election results" were announced and landslide victories were recorded!

It may be reasonable to ask: What did the police in the area do when all this was being perpetrated? But what does a conscientious and upright police DPO and his men do in the face of "superior onslaught", knowing the command structure of our police system? Indeed, as if to add salt to injury, shortly after an earlier DPO was transferred out of the area, probably for being uncooperative, his successor faces the same fate already. A local paper has, in fact, reported that the DPO has been threatened by kulaks with the right party connections with "immediate transfer" from the LGA.

Of course, much of all this only goes to corroborate and confirm reports of intention to destabilise; annihilate the local government controlled by the "opposition party" and impeach its Chairman by "all means possible". Part of the strategy has been to spread all manner of calumny against the local government and its Chairman to cause disaffection in the local community, hoping to garner a major unrest within the area and then nullify the government and appoint a sole administrator. Given the grassroots support of the government, however, and the grace of Almighty God, none of their wishes have materialised.

But the fight is being intensified through all means as promised. Already, police have reported that at least three of their most influential agents... have made very desperate efforts to use our councillors by offering them huge sums of money to sign a document containing cooked-up allegations against my person (the LG chairman). The reports have, in fact, pleaded with the police to "commence thorough investigations to find out their financiers. I will not relent until their allegations against the Deputy Governor are proved"

The outcome of the investigation has not reached my office but what is evident is that four formally loyal councillors have resigned. Many believe they fell for the huge financial inducements offered them. The whole game-plan is to weaken the numerical strength of the loyal councillors, inject their own men and, finally, impeach or turn me into a stooge taking instructions from Government House. Whether this works or not remains to be seen. For good measure, let me add that given the devilish desperation with which they are purchasing their fancy "by all means", whatever happens to me should be traced to them.

To be sure, this tendency to deal with the LGA governments of the opposite parties all over the State is the same. But the import of all this comes once one extrapolates what is happening in Rivers State to all the states in the federation. Viewed from that perspective, it comes out clearly that the gravitation is towards annihilating the opposition parties even at the Local government level. Gradually, this tendency may infect the entire nation and two consequences are possible: That all should acquiesce and join one party or resist and fight back. Whichever way the reaction comes, it spells the end of democracy once again.

This is why I had thought that, maybe, IBB should not see this because given the investment in time, men and resources that have gone into erecting the democratic edifice this time; these trends may break his heart. But one thing is very certain, the security forces must do something fast to arrest the "hoodlums against democracy" in whatever guise they may appear, be they deputy (or despotic) governors!"

How events eventually played out in that LG, I cannot now remember. Maybe, someone familiar with the story should fill us in. That was during the unending transition to civil rule rigmarole of IBB beginning in the 1980s, which eventually climaxed in the June 12, 1993 elections which MKO Abiola won fair and square but which was annulled by the IBB junta, throwing the country into a political logjam or impasse that was not resolved until after five despotic years of the vilest dictator of them all, Gen. Sani Abacha, and the benevolent dictatorship of Gen. Abdulsalami Abubakar, stained, however, with the death in detention of Abiola.

A peep into history - 3

With the benefit of hindsight today, can we not say that the confidence reposed by Eresia-Ike in IBB as the defender of democracy was misplaced, given that the self-same IBB annulled the freest and fairest election in the land, thereby wasting the huge resources expended on the process and truncating democracy? The shenanigans that caused Eresia-Ike to run from pillar to post took place some four decades ago: Can we say we have made appreciable progress or are we still trapped in the woods? Do opposition parties fare better today? I leave everyone to judge!

If he looks back today at his illustrious but chequered career, I think I can guess a few things that must have broken IBB's heart. One is the parcel bomb that killed the celebrated journalist, Dele Giwa, on 19 October, 1986 during IBB's watch. The unresolved nature of the dastardly murder must be giving the former military president sleepless nights. More so if the reported last words of Giwa: "This must be from Mr. President" continues to ring in IBB's ears.

The Major Gideon Gwaza Orkar coup of 22 April, 1990 is another incident that may give IBB heartbreak. IBB escaped by the whiskers but not before the coupists had taken him and his government to the cleaners. The terrible things said about IBB, if they continue to ring in his ears, may trouble his heart. The outgoing government of Gov. Samuel Ortom of Benue State must have opened old wounds and pointedly directed an arrow at IBB's heart when, last week, he announced a decision to honour Orkar by not only naming a street after him but by also justifying some of his allegations against IBB and his administration.

The "SAP with a human face" letter written by former President Olusegun Obasanjo to IBB was said to have unsettled and rattled the gap-toothed self-styled military president. Not given to pulling punches, Obasanjo pummeled IBB and his government hard, accusing both of putting Nigerians through unthinkable suffering and unmitigated misery. Whenever IBB thinks of a man who hits you hard but you dare not hit him back, his heart may break.

Next is the IMF debate during which Nigerians rejected the IMF loan and its conditions but IBB and Chief Olu Falae, at first IBB's Secretary to the Federal Government and later Minister of Finance; went ahead against popular opinion to accept the loan. That decision laid the foundation for the decimation of the Naira. If the national currency has lost a huge chunk of its old value today, the blame rests with IBB and Falae, aka Mr. SAP. Which conscientious leader will remember that and not suffer heartbreak?

I can go on and on! The execution, on 5 March, 1986, of Gen. Mamman Jiya Vasta, said to be a childhood and bosom friend of IBB, by the same IBB regime, cannot but give anyone a heartbreak, especially when, years later, Gen. Domkat Bali, the man who announced to a bewildered nation the execution of the alleged coupists "about an hour ago" was quoted as saying he was not sure they were right in the decision they took in executing the alleged coup plotters! Who will hear that and his heart will not break, especially each time the media decides to conduct interviews with Vatsa's widow and children that opened old wounds?

IBB's decision to step aside on 27 August, 1993 was not an easy one. Reports had it that his wife and glamorous First Lady, Maryam, never brooked the idea of their vacating power. As editor of The PUNCH, we published on the front page a daily "Countdown to Democracy... so and so days to go" which impeccable sources said enraged Maryam. "Who told them we are going?" she was quoted as saying! But go, they did! Could that not have broken IBB's heart?

IBB stepped aside and has not been able to step back in ever since. Seeing Obasanjo and, next, Muhammadu Buhari (IBB's arch enemies?) achieve the feat of military Head of State and, later, civilian President, is that not enough to break IBB's heart? TO BE CONTINUED.

*Former Editor of PUNCH newspapers, Chairman of its Editorial Board and Deputy Editor-in-chief, BOLAWOLE was also the Managing Director/ Editor-in-chief of THE WESTERNER newsmagazine. He writes the ON THE LORD'S DAY column in the Sunday Tribune and TREASURES column in New Telegraph newspaper on Wednesdays. He is also a public affairs analyst on radio and television.

---

End of Document

My Mother Was In Labour For Eight Days, I Came Out Presumed Dead - Onayiga

Nigerian Tribune

January 29, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1671 words

Body

---

<Text>

Chief Moses Olugbenga Oludare Onayiga, journalist, media consultant and former board member of Nigeria Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (NEITI) and Nigeria Press Council, is the Director of Vision Centre for Communication and Development Advocacy. He shared his life story with TUNDE ADELEKE.

How was life as a media professional in a government-owned electronic medium?

Quite challenging, but interesting. For 34 out of the 37 years that I served in the Federal Radio Corporation of Nigeria (FRCN, otherwise known as Radio Nigeria, covering mostly political activities, I endeavoured to apply the basic principles of objectivity, fairness and accuracy as taught in the training school. The media organisation's management did not stop me from ensuring strict adherence to ethical standards. The Code of Ethics approved by the Nigerian Press Organisation (NPO) is very clear and any newsman worthy of being called a journalist must adhere to the provisions of the document which I would like to refer to as our 'professional bible.' One, therefore, strived to observe the highest standards of professionalism, maximum compliance with regulatory frameworks and deference to the public good and interest.

You covered politics, which can be very sensitive. How were you able to manage that?

Of course, the political desk remains a sensitive beat both in public and private media organisations because of the interests it generates. This is understandable because human beings are referred to as political animals and politics is the most-discussed topic by members of the public anytime, any day. By God's special grace, I successfully navigated the volatile terrain of political reporting in a public media organisation by being conscious of the reality of the ownership; weighing every word used in my reports, protecting the public interest and making objectivity my watchword. I make bold to say that in spite of the mindset of some members of the public (including some professional colleagues), no minister of information, permanent secretary, director-general or director of news ever dictated to me what and how to write or to tilt a particular political report written or edited by me. What obtains in many government-owned media houses is sheer overzealousness and self-censorship by supposed professionals in order to please the powers that be. I regard such as unnecessary, unethical and debasing.

My Mother Was In Labour For Eight Days, I Came Out Presumed Dead -Onayiga

Can you provide an insight into what sustained your interest as a journalist in a public corporation?

It is basically my passion for the noble profession of journalism. I recall that on my first day in the lecture hall of the Nigerian Institute of Journalism at Ogbia in Lagos in 1986, the then director, Mr Dotun Boluwade, made it clear to us that there was no money in the profession. He, however, assured us that we would make a mark in the society, dine and wine with kings and queens if we excelled. I also adopted Dele Giwa and Ray Ekuas my role models when they visited NIJ as guest lecturers in clean ash-coloured Mercedes Benz cars, dressed in glittering well-tailored suits of the same colour and shoes to match. That day, I said to myself, 'if these guys could look so good as journalists, then that is the way to go!' The late Mrs Remi Oyo, as an editor in the FRCN Network newsroom, also did a lot to inspire me.

Most importantly, I am a child of glory and destiny; I found favour in God and men. My bosses and colleagues took interest in me and they encouraged me, notwithstanding the challenges I encountered along the way. Indeed, I have told some friends that I will like to remain a journalist if I happen to come to the world again.

How was growing up?

I am from a polygamous home but had to be raised out of matrimony from age nine. My mother did everything humanly possible to raise my siblings and me to be responsible citizens. My dad is from Makun-Omi in the Ogun Waterside Local Government Area of Ogun State and my mum is from Igbotu in Ese-Odo Local Government Area of Ondo State. They were both Christians. Growing up was a bit rough. The setting was not ideal. You know the challenges associated with coming from a broken home. I had to live with my mum from age nine. Yes, she loved and catered for all her six children. But her relationship with me was extraordinary for obvious reasons.

Was there any special circumstance surrounding your birth?

I was a miracle child! My birth was astonishing. People who witnessed my birth still call me a miracle child. Having gone through an excruciating labour for eight days, everyone around gave up on my mum and me. The sleepy town of Igbotu, now in Ese-Odo Local Government Area of Ondo State, and its environs had no maternity home or any medical facility to attend to such a critical situation. Traditional birth attendants, Christian and Muslim clerics were brought from far and near to, at least, save the life of my mother. Eventually, in the early hours of Monday, 23rd November, 1959, those present were able to pull the baby out. Looking very weak and breathless, the baby was instantly put in a basket and thrown into a waste bin. I was presumed dead! The concern of those present was to save the life of my mother who was equally weak and gasping for breath.

How were you able to survive?

About 20 minutes after I was born, an elderly woman, known in the village as 'Iya Pupa' breezed in and was told that the baby came out dead. Surprisingly, she insisted on seeing the bin where the purported dead baby was thrown into. By the time the woman got there, an army of ants and other insects were already helping themselves to the baby's tender body. Iya Pupa noticed, however, that the newly born was warm and breathing faintly. She instantly sent for sand and a particular leaf from a nearby stream; scrubbed them on the body of the baby and alas, he responded. That was how God used the elderly woman to bring joy and celebration to the riverine community. So, you can now appreciate the basis for the special bond between my late mum and me.

I thank God that I did not allow my circumstance of being a product of a broken home to sway me into waywardness. Instead, it reinvigorated me to be determined to succeed in life and to ensure that I have an ideal family life.

How did that affect your education?

It was also a bit tough too. I was not privileged to enjoy the ideal straight primary-secondary-university education system. I had to take breaks intermittently. I attended UNA Primary School, Ebute-Metta, Lagos and later Trinity

My Mother Was In Labour For Eight Days, I Came Out Presumed Dead -Onayiga

Secondary Technical School, Olodi-Apapa, also in Lagos. Thereafter, I got stuck and had to get a job; first, as a labourer at Berger Paints, Igamu and later as a telegrapher at the Posts and Telecommunications Department (P&T), Marina, Lagos. The interesting thing about my tertiary education is that I had to combine it with regular work. I did a two-year professional diploma course at the Nigerian Institute of Journalism, Ogbia, Lagos in 1986 and a Bachelor's degree in Journalism through distance learning.

Did you go beyond that?

To satisfy my desire to be lettered in the science of politics, having consistently covered the practice of politics for about three decades, I went back to school to obtain a degree in Political Science from the University of Abuja. I didn't stop there, I capped it with a master's degree in Media Arts from the same university. I equally attended courses in Journalism and Public Relations at reputable institutions in Great Britain, the United States and some other countries of the world. For instance, while serving as Chief Press Secretary to a Minister of Petroleum Resources in 1996, I attended an International Public Relations course in London which earned me a Diploma in Public Relations. It was coordinated by the world-renowned Public Relations expert and author, the late Professor Sam Black. I was also privileged to attend a certificate course in International Oil Supply, Transportation, Refining and Trading from the high-profile College of Petroleum and Energy Studies, Oxford, United Kingdom in 1997.

Can you throw more light on your career journey?

My career journey was exciting; fulfilling. The journey was worthwhile. I found favour in God and man. I tried to carve a niche for myself in the specialised field of political reporting. A few of the political events, issues and structures I covered included the late Ibrahim Waziri's Great Nigeria Peoples Party (GNPP) of the Second Republic, the 1983 general elections, the Second Republic House of Representatives, the National Electoral Commission (NEC) of the defunct Third Republic, the proceedings and other activities of the Senate of the Third Republic and the National Republican Convention (NRC) throughout its existence. The coverage of the National Constitutional Conference of 1994 and the National Political Reform Conference of 2005 were assignments I found sensitive and challenging while pursuing, reporting and analysing politics.

In the light of your tough background and busy schedule as a reporter, how did you find time to love?

Well, as it is natural, I still found time for that. Indeed, mine was love at first sight. The moment I met my wife, I knew she would be my life partner because we blended so quickly - no pretences, no deceit. Indeed, our courtship lasted three months only. We met at the yearly Okosi Boat Regatta at Makun-Omi, Ogun Waterside Local Government Area. I thank Almighty God that I have no regrets about marrying my wife 37 years ago.

What turns you off in people and what are the pull factors?

I like people who are God-fearing, intelligent and hardworking. I get attracted by men and women who are focused and are positive minded. Moderation must also be your watchword if you are to be my friend. However, I avoid people who are not honest and are lazy. I abhor sadism. The 'can-do spirit' must be there if you are to be my friend.

How do you relax?

I do listen and dance to Nigerian and African music. I also enjoy swimming.

<P></Text>

Load-Date: January 30, 2023

Why I sought review of Supreme Court judgement, by Ihedioha

The Nation (Nigeria)

March 9, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 790 words

Body

---

Ousted Imo Governor Emeka Ihedioha has explained why he sought review of the Supreme Court judgement that declared Senator Hope Uzodinma of the All Progressives Congress as Governor

He said that apart from wanting to defend the mandate freely given to him by the people of the state, the major reason he sought the review of the Supreme Court judgement was to ensure the future implications were not too dire.

He however declared he had accepted the outcome of the judgement as part of life experiences for which he has become wiser.

The Apex Court on March 3rd, 2020 upheld its earlier decision, which sacked Ihedioha and declared Uzodinma as winner of the March 9, 2019 governorship election in the state.

But, in his first official reaction to that judgement, Ihedioha described the judgement as a 'tragic episode that thwarted the wishes of the people in a cynical manner'.

In a statement he personally issued on Sunday, Ihedioha said: 'Whatever may be the personal injury I suffer as a result of the miscarriage of justice, my main concern in this whole tragic episode is not about me. It has always been about the implications this judgement could have for the future of our democracy and the right of the electorate to have their votes count.'

'If institutions that are critical to the entrenchment of rule of law could thwart the wishes of the people in a cynical manner, where lies the future of our democracy? That was why I sought a review of the Supreme Court judgement.'

'Even though justice was not served at the end, the well articulated dissenting judgement delivered by His Lordship, Justice Centus Nweze, has vindicated our stand. I am sure that history and posterity will be kind to him'.

He said he had accepted the trials and difficulties as part of life as they had enabled him to become wiser and more sympathetic to the plights of others in similar circumstances.

'But I am firmly resolved never to give up on the struggle for a better Imo State. And for a better governed Nigeria', he said.

He said the outcome of the judgement review was certainly not what the people of the state wanted or worked so hard for.

Why I sought review of Supreme Court judgement, by Ihedioha

Ihedioha noted that while it was disheartening that their desire to introduce good governance had been halted, in the interim, he expressed happiness that the people's modest efforts had not gone unnoticed.

'I therefore feel a sense of pride and gratitude for the wonderful energy and commitment that we deployed together to secure the mandate that has now been brazenly stolen from us.

'Permit me to use this opportunity to thank all those who played one role or another in this historic quest for justice and truth. I must thank members of the diplomatic community for voicing their concerns for the stability of our country. I commend the Chairman and Members of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) for their vanguard role and leadership during this period.

'In particular, my special thanks go to all Imo citizens for their uncommon support, solidarity, and collective outrage. Never have a people been so united and committed to a cause. You prayed, fasted, marched, protested and even cried. You sacrificed your time, resources, and endeavour for this just cause.

'On this matter, the people of Imo State collectively rose to demand for justice and fairness. Imo people rose up in defence of their right to elect leaders of their choice. Our people resoundingly rejected oppression and power grab, defied imposition, injustice and tyranny. I salute Imo people for this display of courage in the face of oppressive state power.

'I will forever be in the debt of Nigerians of all walks of life, across ethnic, religious and political divides, senior citizens, journalists, civil societies, ordinary men and women of good conscience, who added their voice to condemn the injustice done in our case.

'These are people unknown to me personally but who could not bear the illogic of turning number four to number one on the basis of a fraudulently procured result, and appealed to the Supreme Court to save itself and our judiciary.

'To those who are rejoicing about their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people, as well as their collaborators, let me leave them with the immortal words of the late journalist, Dele Giwa: 'No evil deed will go unpunished; any evil done by man to man will be redressed; if not now then certainly later; if not by man, then by God for the victory of evil over good is temporary'. We believe that God will render the ultimate judgment. He has been with us through this peaceful struggle. And our future is in His hands'.

He expressed appreciation to members of his legal team who pushed the frontiers of electoral jurisprudence to advance the nation's constitutional democracy.

Load-Date: March 19, 2020

Quadruple Heritage: The Drama of Post-Colonial Nigeria!

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1895 words

Byline: Justine John Dyikuk -

Body

---

In one of my columns "Labels as Instruments of War": A Post-COVID-19 Consideration," I made reference to Prof. Ali Mazrui's seminal thesis, The Triple Heritage – a film series premiered on BBC in 1986. Mazrui's work set out to challenge the negative effects of Europeanization on African values and thought patterns: "In that documentary project, the Kenyan-born academic who had a stint in the University of Jos, Nigeria fingered three major influences namely an indigenous heritage borne out of time and climate change, the heritage of Eurocentric capitalism forced on Africans by European colonialism and the spread of Islam by both jihad and evangelism as responsible for the menace. Mazrui who berated the West for regarding Africa as 'Recipient' rather than a 'Transmitter' lamented why leaders of Independent-Africa were unable to address the negative effects of this history."

While Mazrui was an unlucky beneficiary of Colonial Africa, most of us are children of Post Colonial Africa. This means that perspectives would defer. If the Kenyan-born The Triple Heritage theory is anything to go by, it is crucial to ask whether Nigeria has graduated from the college of being a 'Recipient' rather than a "Transmitter" nation or not. Well, it is up to the reader to decipher after these facts are laid bare. In this column, I want to argue that as a country, we are contending with what I call, "A Quadruple Heritage" which consists of militocracy or despotic governance, brain drain, Afghanistanism and collapse of the rule of law.

To start with, hopes were high when the founding fathers of Africa otherwise referred to as African nationalist leaders like Kenneth Kaunda (Zambia), Albert Luthuli (South Africa), Julius Nyerere (Tanzania), Jomo Kenyatta (Kenya), Kwame Nkrumah (Ghana), Nnamdi Azikiwe (Nigeria) et al dared the colonialists to demand for the liberation of their people. With Ghana being the first country in Sub-Saharan Africa to gain independence on 6th March 1957, followed by Guinea on 2nd October 1958 and Cameroon and Nigeria on 1st January 1960 and 1st October 1960 respectively, it was clear for the imperialists that they have overstayed their welcome. No thanks to colonial rule, Africa was raped of its natural resources. From Mozambique, Guinea and Ghana to Anglo, Botswana and the Democratic Republic of Congo, the story is the same. While lands were annexed and resources like gold, diamonds, tin, zirconium, coal, platinum, crude oil, columbite, cobalt, bauxite and others were shipped to Europe and the New World, countries like South Africa and Zimbabwe (the then Southern Rhodesia) suffered the apartheid regime.

Quadruple Heritage: The Drama of Post-Colonial Nigeria !

First, the lowering of the Union Jack and hoisting of the Nigerian flag gave rise to the declaration of Nigeria as a sovereign independent state on 1st October 1960. To all intent and purposes, this signalled freedom, socio-economic and infrastructural gains. Sadly, no sooner had the Boeing 01:10:60 took off than the first military intervention occurred. Apparently, the coup d'état of 1963 put honey in the mouths of the Khaki boys who would exchange the barracks for city life (statecraft). To be sure, from the first republic to date, Nigeria has witnessed 8 military interventions: Johnson Aguiyi-Ironsi (16 January 1966 – 29 July 1966), Yakubu Gowon (1 August 1966 – 29 July 1975), Murtala Mohammed (29 July 1975 – 13 February 1976), Olusegun Obasanjo (13 February 1976 – 1 October 1979), Muhammadu Buhari (31 December 1983 – 27 August 1985), Ibrahim Babangida (27 August 1985 – 26 August 1993), Sani Abacha (17 November 1993 – 8 June 1998) and Abdulsalami Abubakar (8 June 1998 – 29 May 1999).

This is aside from the failed coups of Chukwuma Kaduna Nzeogwu (January 15, 1966), Buka Sukar Dimka (13 February, 1976), Mamman Vatsa (December 17, 1985), Gideon Orkar (April 22, 1990) and Oladipo Diya (21 December, 1997). These military interventions in our fledgeling democracy militarized the populace. It created undemocratic hysteria and left the people traumatised and agitated. While Nigerians were trying to recover from this epilepsy, the same military that created the problems in the first place changed to Agbada/Babagira and returned as "repentant democrats." It is left to students of history, political science and mass communication to scan the "civilian" administrations of Olusegun Obasanjo and the incumbent Muhammadu Buhari on the ideals of democratic governance.

Second, while the democratic experiment lasted, Africa's finest brains kept populating the diaspora community. Here, the brain drain held sway. For example, some members of The National Democratic Coalition (NADECO) which kept increasing the volume to send the Khaki men back to the barracks were speaking and writing while abroad. Since maximum dictators like Ibrahim Babangida and Sani Abacha had zero tolerance for criticism or dissenting voices, many critics stayed away in order to canvas for a return democratic rule. To this end, academics who were supposed to stay back at home to fix the situation were recruited to work in greener pastures like Europe and America while the populace kept surviving the suffocation. This led to a collapse of the education sector and the rest is what we are witnessing today with the current ASUU strike.

Third, the media which is the fourth estate of the realm after the executive, judiciary and legislature started flying on a high altitude when veteran journalists like Dele Giwa debuted investigative journalism in 1984 to ensure the naming and shaming of corrupt public office holders in Nigeria. From Newswatch's Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed in 1984, the pioneers of Tell Magazine (15 April 1991), Nosa Igbor, Dare Babarinsa, Onome Osifo-Whiskey and Ayodele Akinkuoto trailblazed what they called guerilla journalism which constantly harassed the military rule of the "C-in-C" Ibrahim Babangida and Sani Abacha. Interestingly, Tell was awarded the Special Award for Human Rights Journalism Under Threat at the Amnesty International UK Media Awards in 1998. Notice of the award read: "Tell has continued to publish throughout the period of Nigerian dictatorship despite intimidation, harassment and the detention without charge or trial – the Tell staff." Just when the jetliner delivered democracy, the press in Nigeria began to face new challenges such as intimation of journalists, poor remuneration, lack of insurance cover and brown envelope syndrome.

As a consequence, it gave in to Afghanistanism – Reporting about George Floyd in far away from the United States of America while neglecting more important issues like who are the sponsors of insurgency in the country and Parachute journalism which connotes reporting on a story in which the reporter has little knowledge or experience about. For instance, except for mediums like Premium Times and Channels TV, investigative reporting across the country is a far cry. At best, while the media in Nigeria is more interested in what happens in other climes, "politicians" are busy smiling to the bank in the World's Poverty Capital.

Fourth, it would appear that it was the late President Umaru Musa Yar'Adua that introduced "rule of law" as a new lexicon in Nigeria's democratic process. Before and after his short presidency (2007 to 2010), "rule of law" has remained a mirage in Nigeria. Although activists like Ken Saro-Wiwa and the Ogoni 9 were executed by hanging in 1995 by the Abacha junta, lack of robust judicial and legislative systems have been fingered as reasons for legal summersaults in the country. While some legal luminaries blame the ugly trend on an imported imperial constitution which was handed over to us, others are of the opinion that is sheer lack of political will to do the needful. In terms of obeying the laws of the land, what we have is the theatre of the absurd.

Quadruple Heritage: The Drama of Post-Colonial Nigeria !

For example, in an article "Measuring the Buhari Administration on Human Rights Abuses: A Journalist's Perspective" (In Ndubisi E.J & Kanu I.A (Eds.) Human Rights in Africa: Perspectives within Ecology of Religion, History and Governance, 41-47), Dyikuk (2018) cited a chapter in the book "Witness to Justice: An Insider's Account of Nigeria's Truth Commission" entitled Immunity or Impunity? The Politics of Non-appearance of the Generals wherein the author, Matthew Kukah (2011) revealed how the non-appearance of three former heads of state, General Muhammadu Buhari (1984-1995), General Ibrahim Babangida (1998-1993) and General Abdulsalami Abubakar (1998-1999) who were summoned to appear before the Oputa Panel generated much curiosity, anger and frustration nationally and internally (p.239).

Recently, in an article titled "Buhari's militocracy" published on 07 March 2019, a columnist with The Guardian, Paul Onomuakpokpo wrote: "Ever since Buhari succeeded in conning the citizens with his pretensions to being a born-again democrat, he has never hidden his contempt for the obligations of his newly-found calling. Yet, the citizens make allowance for the blossoming of the democrat in him. But the more they expect him to demonstrate the readiness to abide by the tenets of democracy, the more they are disappointed." He surmised that: "Instead of the democrat in Buhari unfolding, the passage of each day witnesses the manifestation of his autocratic excesses. Buhari obviously draws inspiration from the success of one dictatorial action to perpetrate a worse one. Now, he feels secure in the notion that no matter the abyss of autocracy he plunges the citizens, he would not suffer any inconvenient consequence."

It is now clear to the reader that drawing from Mazrui's Triple Heritage, Nigeria is currently contending with "A Quadruple Heritage" – militocracy/despotic governance, brain drain, Afghanistanism and collapse of the rule of law. To reverse the trend, like the Asian Tigers, we need massive investments in modern education with special emphasis on science and innovation. Only a knowledge-based economy can counter militocracy or despotic governance on the one hand and deliver the dividends of democracy on the other towards leading the masses to the expected paradise.

The Press in Nigeria must grow beyond its current limits to incubating the new Dele Giwas who would match words with action in terms of dogged investigate reportage which not only names and shames corrupt public office holders but capitalizes on homegrown problems for overall development. Perhaps we need bold Nigerians in the mould of the biblical Gideon who would sound the horn to raise alarm across the country and shout "For God and country." It is high time the media in the country outgrew Afghanistanism – let the world hear about our own George Floyds who cannot breathe as a result of many years of misrule. Because rule of law is the driver of every democratic experiment, history will not forgive the executive, legislature, judiciary, Civil Society Organisation's (CSOs) and indeed other well-meaning Nigerians if we continue to chew the gum of this inopportune fourfold heritage. Enough of the drama. Let's get to work. Let's build statecraft. God bless the Federal Republic of Nigeria!

Fr. Dyikuk is a Lecturer of Mass Communication, University of Jos, Editor – Caritas Newspaper and Convener, Media Team Network Initiative (MTNI), Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/632/1802/52/159248977723.jpeg>

Justin John

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

Duro Onabule: A library burns down, by Femi Adesina

The Nation (Nigeria)

August 26, 2022 Friday

Copyright 2022 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1330 words

Body

---

When an old man dies, a library burns to the ground, says Amadou Hampate Ba, Malian writer, historian, and ethnologist (1901-1991). And so it was with frontline journalist, essayist and image maker of the Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida (IBB) military administration, Chief Duro Onabule, who passed away August 16, 2022. It was about five weeks shy of his 83rd birthday.

Yes, Onabule was old enough at 83. But not too old. In 2003 or 2004, when I was editor of Daily Sun, I had asked him to write a weekly column for the newspaper. He kept faith for almost 20 years. His last outing was on the Friday before his passage last week. Fidelity to your art and calling. That was what the man displayed till his last breath. And it showed that his mental faculties remained ever young and virile.

I had started reading Onabule in National Concord as an undergraduate in the 1980s. I read almost every word he wrote alongside other journalists in the stable like Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Mike Awoyinfa, Dimgba Igwe, Lewis Obi, Segun Babatope, Dele Alake, Chike Akabogu, and many others. It was, therefore, a great honor for me to join Concord Press after school, and work with many of them.

Onabule had in 1985 gone to work with IBB as Chief Press Secretary (CPS). He left his job as editor, National Concord, started at Dodan Barracks in Lagos, and moved with the administration to Abuja in December, 1991. He was, therefore, the first occupant of the office where I now sit as Media Adviser to President Muhammadu Buhari, at the Presidential Villa.

When IBB left power after the debacle that he made of the June 12, 1993 presidential election, Onabule returned to Concord Press as Visiting Member of the Editorial Board and Columnist. As Features Editor, it was my duty to handle his column weekly from script to final production. Naturally, we became quite close.

When Concord closed down, and we started The Sun in 2003, of which I was the pioneer daily editor, I invited him to write a column, which he did till his last week on earth. His strength as a writer was his power of recall; awesome. His sense of history; amazing. Frankness; unimpeachable. A walking encyclopedia. You may not necessarily agree with his position, but the argument and justification were often unassailable.

Duro Onabule: A library burns down, by Femi Adesina

He was popularly called Double Chief, a cognomen that came from his traditional chieftaincy, Jagunmolu of Ijebu, and his role as CPS to IBB. When he turned 60, I was at his Ijebu Ode home, where he may be buried September 16, to celebrate with him. When he turned 70, and held a celebration at Civic Center in Lagos, I was the Master of Ceremonies. This shows the bond between us. And see the trajectory of his career and mine. He was pioneer Features Editor of National Concord. I held the same position. He became Deputy Editor of the paper. I also did. He went on to become editor. I did. He was appointed CPS, I also got appointed Special Adviser on Media and Publicity. He was a writer all his life, I hope to be.

On the afternoon of the day he died, I was in the office at the Presidential Villa, when his thought suddenly flashed into my mind. I told myself that he would be 83 in September, and made a mental note that we needed to issue birthday greetings. Possibly, that was the very moment, unbeknownst to me, that he went into the paroxysms of death, and passed on. I heard the news later in the evening.

Onabule served the man who had toppled Muhammadu Buhari as military head of state, in what was a palace coup. And we know the animus that existed between the two men for a long time, till time, that inexorable healer, mended the wounds.

I had been incurably opposed to IBB, simply because of my love for Buhari. I believed he did us in, simply to satisfy a personal ambition. And I took a trenchant position against him as a columnist, till he showed me friendship and goodwill in 2013, when my mother died. He saw the news in the media, and placed a phone call to me. He also sent a high powered personality to the burial. I softened.

I was also opposed to Major General Abdulkarim Adisa (now deceased), when he began campaigning for IBB to return to power through the ballot box in 2007. I wrote many critical pieces on him, and he protested to Onabule. Out of respect for the latter, I held my fire, after he spoke to me on Adisa's behalf.

In the build up to the 2015 elections, I was surprised when Onabule threw his weight behind Buhari. Week after week, he wrote of his conviction on how Buhari would win what he usually called 'a grudge election' between the component parts of the country. True to his prediction, Buhari won. And he never withdrew his support for the President these past seven years. He stood by him through thick and thin.

I remember December of 2016, at Christmas season. I had compiled the names of some loyalists, encouraging the President to place personal phone calls to them. He went through the list, and told me to add Chief Tunji Braithwaite. One after the other, we began to call them up, including Onabule. Their discussion was so friendly, and he expressed his appreciation to the writer for his support. Incidentally, the President's chat with Braithwaite that night was their last, as the man died shortly after.

In 2020, after Chief of Staff Abba Kyari passed on, and Professor Ibrahim Gambari was appointed to replace him, some caterwauling people dug up a critical article I'd written about Gambari during the Sani Abacha years. They thought he was a headmaster coming to the Villa to flog me with a whip. They shared the article everywhere, in both traditional and social media. They even made audio recordings of it, just to cause bad blood between me and the incoming Chief of Staff.

When Professor Gambari, a most urbane and decent man, with wide international experience, resumed work, he told me at our first meeting: 'Femi, just take me as your big uncle. We are both here to serve the President to the best of our abilities.' I laughed the antagonists to scorn. Rambunctious. I even had my two feet in the air.

But at the peak of their evil propaganda, Onabule had waded in. He wrote a piece, with the headline, 'Femi Adesina: So what?' As an alumnus of the Villa School, he educated them on how the place was structured, and how it operates. They stole away like a beaten dog, with its tail between its legs. Hahahahahaaaaaa.

There have been times things were particularly rough for government, with me coming under a lot of heat from the caviling public. Then at the nick of time, a phone call or text message would come in from Onabule, asking me to disregard the mob, and focus on what I was doing. He would remind me that I was answerable only to my boss, and not to the critical public. Often, he reminded me of how they descended on him after the annulment of the June 12,

Duro Onabule: A library burns down, by Femi Adesina

1993 election, and asked him to dump IBB, and return home. They often reminded him that MKO Abiola, winner of the annulled election was his former employer at Concord Press, a Yoruba man like him, and, indeed, they were both from Ogun State. Onabule stayed with Babangida to the last day, and even beyond.

The last time I saw Chief Onabule was on a flight from Lagos to Abuja. Where was he headed? Minna, to see IBB. Loyal till the last. No wonder the former military president, in his tribute, described him as a man with 'remarkable and unalloyed loyalty to friends.'

When Onabule turned 70, I had asked him at his Epe Lane residence at Dolphin Estate, Ikoyi, Lagos. 'Chief, why have you not written your memoir as IBB's spokesman for 8 years. You owe the public that book.'

He kept quiet for a few minutes, reflecting. Then he looked up, and said, 'It's good to write. But it's not a must. I may write, and I may not write.'

And unless he had something going in the final years, he didn't write. A library burned to the ground on August 16, a day before the 81st birthday of his former principal. Adieu, Double Chief. You were a dear senior friend. I'll always remember you.

Load-Date: August 27, 2022

---

End of Document

Remembering Nigeria's journalism pathfinder, Stanley Macebu

The Sun (Nigeria)

February 4, 2021 Thursday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 990 words

Byline: Cyril

Body

---

By: Uzor Maxim Uzoatu

Dr. Stanley Nkwachikwelumamaya Macebu was a rare breed in the freshest sense of the term, a charge of fine electricity who all on his own changed the face of journalism practice in Nigeria.

Stanley was at once a scholar, philosopher, cerebral journalist, informed commentator, mentor, liberal, technocrat, icon, legend, connoisseur, all rolled into one diminutive body of irresistible charisma.

As the founding Managing Director of the Guardian Newspapers, Stanley bequeathed on this country in word and deed "the Flagship of the Nigerian Press."

He died at age 67 by 4.15 in the morning on Sunday, March 7, 2010 at the National Hospital, Abuja.

Born on December 28, 1942, the incredibly intelligent lad attended Government Primary School, Port Harcourt, where he broke all the academic records.

He took a scholarship to Ngwa High School, Aba, where he excelled at the very top of his class.

He was then admitted for his Higher School Certificate at the esteemed Kings College, Lagos, where his intellect was the staple of legend. He even taught at Kings College, a prodigy.

Kings College legends such as Dr Yemi Ogunbiyi and the immortal "Motor-Park Economist" Ashikiwe-Adione-Egom can never tire of giving testimony of Stanley's good works.

Stanley took his prodigious intellect to the English department at the University of Ibadan from 1963 to 1966.

Remembering Nigeria's journalism pathfinder, Stanley Macebuh

He departed the shores of Nigeria in 1967, just before the outbreak of the civil war, to study at the University of Sussex in England.

It is a mark of his genius that he acquired his DPhil (Doctor of Philosophy degree) at the age of 26.

The University of California, Berkeley, California, USA then poached him as an in-house African philosopher during the Civil Rights Movement era in the US.

It was Stanley's Doctorial dissertation supervisor who recommended the wunderkind to the American authorities for him to join the UCLA Faculty at Berkeley, California.

He distinguished himself for two years at Berkeley before two other universities in America, Columbia University of New York and City College of New York, both engaged in a battle to have him on their faculties.

Both universities had to agree to share his multiform services!

Stanley therefore set the record of lecturing in the two universities at the same time, and it was organized in such a way that he taught full-time at City College and part-time at the Institute of African Studies of Columbia University.

Stanley had risen to the post of a tenured Associate Professor of English in the US before he was invited by Patrick Dele Cole to return to Nigeria to breathe fresh air into the Daily Times newspaper as the Editorial Adviser.

He brought along the legendary Dele Giwa, and Nigerian journalism would never be the same again.

Stanley initiated the policy of separating the Editorial Board as the think-tank of the newspaper from the reportorial regimen.

Back then, it was the feature writers that supplied the editorials more or less as afterthoughts.

When the politics in Daily Times got out of hand he left, only to latter join forces with the financier Alex Ibru to found The Guardian, which he from the very beginning intended to be not just a great liberal newspaper but the "Flagship of Nigerian Journalism."

Stanley's audacious dream was to make The Guardian among the five best newspapers in the English-speaking world.

Stanley was a man who cherished ideas, and he hired all makes of intellectuals who even disagreed with him ideologically.

He believed in the sanctity of intellectual disputation.

The editorial board he set up was made up of Onwuchekwa Jemie, Sonala Olumhense, Femi Osofisan, Eddie Iroh, Sully Abu, Yemi Ogunbiyi, Chinweizu, Odia Ofeimun, Edwin Madunagu, Herbert Ekwe-Ekwe etc.

Stanley put his foot down that all opinion articles must come in within the 800-word ambit, stressing that anybody who could not make his argument within 800 words had not properly organized his thought in the first instance.

He also championed the cause of addressing everybody as "Simply Mister" against the Nigerian grain of addressing ill-assorted potentates as Chief, Prof, Dr, Engr., Rev. etc.

The labour of his ideas would eventually clash with the capital of the family that set up the newspaper.

Stanley performance had to leave The Guardian and tried his hands at business, but that was not his forte.

He helped some financiers to set up Sentinel magazine and the Post Express newspaper but his lofty ideas could not gel with the owners.

Remembering Nigeria's journalism pathfinder, Stanley Macebuh

He was at the inception of democracy in 1999 appointed Senior Special Assistant (Special Duties) to former President Olusegun Obasanjo.

The gruff ways of Obasanjo could not have suited the urbane subtlety of Stanley.

He later became the Deputy Chief of Staff to Obasanjo, but in the course of Obasanjo's second term in office he was in and out of the system.

Before his death, he was engaged as a consulting Editorial Adviser to Nduka Obaigbena's ThisDay.

Stanley made his mark as an intellectual, publishing in 1973 a seminal study of the iconic African-American novelist and essayist, James Baldwin.

He is said to have worked for many years on another academic tome on Jewish-American studies, provisionally entitled "The Tyranny of Things".

His very close associates reveal that Stanley regretted until his death the non-completion and publishing of the book after he had written well over 400 pages.

Even so, his return to Nigeria in 1977 denied him of his ultimate ambition of getting employed at Harvard University and eventually retiring there as a Professor Emeritus.

Stanley's life deserves all celebration, and he richly deserves the accolade of "Father of Modern Nigerian Journalism".

An aesthete, he not only had a rich taste for fine stylistic writing but also had an abiding love for fine cognac.

He will be sorely missed by all fine minds.

Uzoatu writes from Lagos

The post Remembering Nigeria's journalism pathfinder, Stanley Macebuh appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: February 4, 2021

---

End of Document

Duro Onabule: A library burns down

PM News

August 26, 2022 Friday

Copyright 2022 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1373 words

Body

---

When an old man dies, a library burns to the ground, says Amadou Hampate Ba, Malian writer, historian, and ethnologist (1901-1991). And so it was with frontline journalist, essayist and image maker of the Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida (IBB) military administration, Chief Duro Onabule, who passed away August 16, 2022. It was about five weeks shy of his 83rd birthday.

Yes, Onabule was old enough at 83. But not too old. In 2003 or 2004, when I was editor of Daily Sun, I had asked him to write a weekly column for the newspaper. He kept faith for almost 20 years. His last outing was on the Friday before his passage last week. Fidelity to your art and calling. That was what the man displayed till his last breath. And it showed that his mental faculties remained ever young and virile.

I had started reading Onabule in National Concord as an undergraduate in the 1980s. I read almost every word he wrote alongside other journalists in the stable like Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Mike Awoyinfa, Dimgba Igwe, Lewis Obi, Segun Babatope, Dele Alake, Chike Akabogu, and many others. It was, therefore, a great honor for me to join Concord Press after school, and work with many of them.

Onabule had in 1985 gone to work with IBB as Chief Press Secretary (CPS). He left his job as an editor, National Concord, started at Dodan Barracks in Lagos and moved with the administration to Abuja in December 1991. He was, therefore, the first occupant of the office where I now sit as Media Adviser to President Muhammadu Buhari, at the Presidential Villa.

When IBB left power after the debacle that he made of the June 12, 1993, presidential election, Onabule returned to Concord Press as Visiting Member of the Editorial Board and Columnist. As Features Editor, it was my duty to handle his column weekly from script to final production. Naturally, we became quite close.

When Concord closed down, and we started The Sun in 2003, of which I was the pioneer daily editor, I invited him to write a column, which he did till his last week on earth. His strength as a writer was his power of recall; awesome. His sense of history; amazing. Frankness; unimpeachable. A walking encyclopedia. You may not necessarily agree with his position, but the argument and justification were often unassailable.

Duro Onabule: A library burns down

He was popularly called Double Chief, a cognomen that came from his traditional chieftaincy, Jagunmolu of Ijebu, and his role as CPS to IBB. When he turned 60, I was at his Ijebu Ode home, where he may be buried September 16, to celebrate with him. When he turned 70, and held a celebration at Civic Center in Lagos, I was the Master of Ceremonies. This shows the bond between us. And see the trajectory of his career and mine. He was pioneer Features Editor of National Concord. I held the same position. He became Deputy Editor of the paper. I also did. He went on to become editor. I did. He was appointed CPS, I also got appointed Special Adviser on Media and Publicity. He was a writer all his life, I hope to be.

On the afternoon of the day he died, I was in the office at the Presidential Villa, when his thought suddenly flashed into my mind. I told myself that he would be 83 in September, and made a mental note that we needed to issue birthday greetings. Possibly, that was the very moment, unbeknownst to me, that he went into the paroxysms of death, and passed on. I heard the news later in the evening.

Onabule served the man who had toppled Muhammadu Buhari as military head of state, in what was a palace coup. And we know the animus that existed between the two men for a long time, till time, that inexorable healer, mended the wounds.

I had been incurably opposed to IBB, simply because of my love for Buhari. I believed he did us in, simply to satisfy a personal ambition. And I took a trenchant position against him as a columnist, till he showed me friendship and goodwill in 2013, when my mother died. He saw the news in the media, and placed a phone call to me. He also sent a high powered personality to the burial. I softened.

All the while I was opposed to his principal, Chief Onabule never took it against me. He would only say; you this young man, only God would settle the matter between you and IBB. And laugh.

I was also opposed to Major General Abdulkarim Adisa (now deceased), when he began campaigning for IBB to return to power through the ballot box in 2007. I wrote many critical pieces on him, and he protested to Onabule. Out of respect for the latter, I held my fire, after he spoke to me on Adisa's behalf.

In the build-up to the 2015 elections, I was surprised when Onabule threw his weight behind Buhari. Week after week, he wrote of his conviction on how Buhari would win what he usually called 'a grudge election' between the component parts of the country. True to his prediction, Buhari won. And he never withdrew his support for the President these past seven years. He stood by him through thick and thin.

I remember December of 2016, at Christmas season. I had compiled the names of some loyalists, encouraging the President to place personal phone calls to them. He went through the list, and told me to add Chief Tunji Braithwaite. One after the other, we began to call them up, including Onabule. Their discussion was so friendly, and he expressed his appreciation to the writer for his support. Incidentally, the President's chat with Braithwaite that night was their last, as the man died shortly after.

In 2020, after Chief of Staff Abba Kyari passed on, and Professor Ibrahim Gambari was appointed to replace him, some caterwauling people dug up a critical article I'd written about Gambari during the Sani Abacha years. They thought he was a headmaster coming to the Villa to flog me with a whip. They shared the article everywhere, in both traditional and social media. They even made audio recordings of it, just to cause bad blood between me and the incoming Chief of Staff.

When Professor Gambari, a most urbane and decent man, with wide international experience, resumed work, he told me at our first meeting: 'Femi, just take me as your big uncle. We are both here to serve the President to the best of our abilities.' I laughed the antagonists to scorn. Rambunctious. I even had my two feet in the air.

But at the peak of their evil propaganda, Onabule had waded in. He wrote a piece, with the headline, 'Femi Adesina: So what?' As an alumnus of the Villa School, he educated them on how the place was structured, and how it operates. They stole away like a beaten dog, with its tail between its legs. Hahahahahaaaaaaa.

Duro Onabule: A library burns down

There have been times things were particularly rough for government, with me coming under a lot of heat from the caviling public. Then at the nick of time, a phone call or text message would come in from Onabule, asking me to disregard the mob, and focus on what I was doing. He would remind me that I was answerable only to my boss, and not to the critical public. Often, he reminded me of how they descended on him after the annulment of the June 12, 1993 election, and asked him to dump IBB, and return home. They often reminded him that MKO Abiola, winner of the annulled election was his former employer at Concord Press, a Yoruba man like him, and, indeed, they were both from Ogun State. Onabule stayed with Babangida to the last day, and even beyond.

The last time I saw Chief Onabule was on a flight from Lagos to Abuja. Where was he headed? Minna, to see IBB. Loyal till the last. No wonder the former military president, in his tribute, described him as a man with 'remarkable and unalloyed loyalty to friends.'

When Onabule turned 70, I had asked him at his Epe Lane residence at Dolphin Estate, Ikoyi, Lagos. 'Chief, why have you not written your memoir as IBB's spokesman for 8 years. You owe the public that book.'

He kept quiet for a few minutes, reflecting. Then he looked up, and said, 'It's good to write. But it's not a must. I may write, and I may not write.'

And unless he had something going in the final years, he didn't write. A library burned to the ground on August 16, a day before the 81st birthday of his former principal. Adieu, Double Chief. You were a dear senior friend. I'll always remember you.

*Adesina is Special Adviser to President Buhari on Media and Publicity

Load-Date: August 27, 2022

---

End of Document

Gen. Babangida On The Marble

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

August 13, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1178 words

Body

---

56 views | Ozodinukwe Okenwa | August 13, 2021

Retired General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida (IBB) broke his silence last weekend on the rising Arise TV network. Ms Ngozi Alaegbu travelled to Minna, Niger State, to interview IBB inside his mind-boggling edifice. Living reclusively in obscene opulence in the city near Abuja since beating a forced hasty retreat from the national political scene post-June 12 Babangida must have considered it auspicious making himself heard again. The big man does not need any introduction to anyone conversant enough with his 'Maradonic' political exploits in power decades ago.

Gen. Babangida rose to national prominence in the middle of the 80's when he deposed a dictator in power at that time, Gen. Muhammadu Buhari, (himself a coup plotter who had overthrown a democratically-elected government of the late Shehu Shagari). He ruled Nigeria guilefully for eight odd years. He made name for himself by bastardising the promised democratic processes and institutionalising corruption. During his giddy years 'settlement syndrome' became a favourable 'weapon' with which the opposition were compromised.

A master of political perfidy Babangida was demystified and taken to global infamy by June 12, a presidential poll he organized and turned to a national tragedy after the winner and the loser had emerged. His criminal annulment of the result of the free and fair election won by the late Bashorun MKO Abiola led to chaos and loss of lives. Abiola lost his life (assassinated) while fighting for the mandate Nigerians freely gave him.

General Babangida is better described as a crafty bloody militiaman, a professional coup plotter who excelled in his military career through perfidy, graft and shady dealings. Officially he had acknowledged himself as a 'Maradona' and 'evil genius' but IBB is certainly more than that. He was inordinately ambitious and treacherous! Like the late Argentine soccer legend, Diego Maradona, who mesmerized and dazzled the global soccer community with his football talent Babangida dribbled the opposition until June 12 arrived with a bang and confused and consumed him.

He died militarily and politically after perfidiously spending billions of Dollars on a bogus transition scheme and taking Nigerians for a fraudulent democratic ride. IBB was an enemy of democracy, free press and freedom. A mass murderer he orchestrated the Ejigbo fatal plane crash that killed scores of promising officers! He killed Dele Giwa, the great investigative journalist, with a letter bomb! He committed a good number of atrocities that ordinarily he ought to be docked and jailed like the incarcerated former South African President, Jacob Zuma.

Gen. Babangida On The Marble

Featuring exclusively on Arise Television the 'evil genius' never disappointed. A hard look thrown his way indicated that he is indeed getting nearer to the grave. Yet as he joined the Octogenarian club he looked graceful in his old age. He spoke his mind without fear or favour.

Generally he spoke about the presidential poll slated for 2023. He talked about the massive corruption in the system, present and past. He bared his mind on the agitations rocking the nation championed by the detained Nnamdi Kanu and Sunday Igboho. He answered questions concerning June 12, democracy and the Nigerian present condition.

On June 12 the retired dictator was in his best treacherous element. He declared that the controversial annulment of the Abiola victory was based on the fact that if it materialised there would have been a violent coup d'état and more instability in the polity. He admitted that pressure was mounted on him by civilian and military elements to cancel the election. What he never told us was why he left the late Gen. Abacha behind as he retired the senior officers in the eve of his departure from power.

On the agitation for both Biafra and Oduduwa Republics the General predicted failure for the efforts saying that Nigerians did not believe in secession. He never told us when he conducted a referendum to arrive at such imbecilic conclusion. IBB made it clear Nigerians cherished their nation preferring to remain one yet what he failed to appreciate was that those supporting Igboho or Kanu are Nigerians and not foreigners.

Nigerians may be a happy people in love with peace but when the system is broken then something better ought to give!

On corruption in the system Gen. Babangida scored his highest point. He declared that he was surprised seeing those who stole billions walking free and enjoying their loot! He claimed that he fought corruption better than what 'Mr Integrity' is presently doing! He hit the bull's eye when he claimed that those that served under him could be seen as 'saints' compared to the Buharists and 'Buhardeens' presently in power.

On the general elections slated for 2023 the General never minced words calling for a new generation of leaders. He said he would go for a President 60 years or below as compared to the present old men running Nigeria aground and ruining her prospects for greatness. By that singular declaration Babangida must have had Atiku Abubakar and Bola Tinubu in mind. Atiku has never hidden his intention to contest the presidency yet again come 2023 despite the fact that he is getting older and older. Ditto Asiwaju Tinubu whose official age is put at 69 but rumours are flying about that he must have doctored his age!

Even sixty years IBB suggested is not good enough. Nigeria needs desperately a young man in his early or late 40s to take over power post-Buharism to knock sense into the senseless system. Africa remains a hopeless helpless continental case because it is brimming with youths but led by gerontocrats. In contrast Europe is an old continent of old men and shrinking youth but governed by young men. Take Emmanuel Macron of France, Justin Trudeau of Canada and Scott Morrison of Australia for examples.

Gerontocrats in power from Abidjan to Abuja, Conakry to Yaounde. Alassane Ouattara, Muhammadu Buhari, Alpha Conde, Paul Biya they are all holding sway; they represent what is wrong leadership-wise in mother Africa. But President Ouattara of Ivory Coast is an exception in terms of service delivery and world-class competence. A great achiever and big dreamer he has effortfully transformed his country in a space of a decade after a protracted political crisis that saw the economy devastated.

Unlike his Nigerian counterpart he is never in the habit of blaming his predecessors for whatever problems or challenges leadership or money could solve. As an economist and patriot he had used a wide global network and connections to attract investors guaranteeing steady power supply and security of lives and properties.

Gen. Babangida On The Marble

In the end Gen. Babangida has no moral, patriotic or democratic lesson to give to Nigerians. Himself, the late Gen. Abacha, Obasanjo and President Muhammadu Buhari are the major problems of Nigeria. The earlier they joined Abacha in hell the better for our collective survival as a great nation under God or Allah!

SOC Okenwa

soco\_abj\_2006\_rci@hotmail.fr

Gen. Babangida

Load-Date: August 13, 2021

---

End of Document

Of reign of gangsters and fraudsters

The Nation (Nigeria)

August 13, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1125 words

Body

---

I was at a shopping mall with my daughter on July 29 when a young lady approached us. She said she was doing a marketing survey for Lever Brothers. As evidence she gave two Lever Brothers products to my daughter. She said she needed our names and telephone numbers for the survey. While my daughter was asking why she needed our names and telephone numbers, I persuaded my daughter by confirming Lever Brothers often engage in periodic market surveys for their products.

But I was wrong. Within five minutes there was a call purportedly from a member of our University of Ife alumni associations. That was the beginning of my ordeal. Within 10 minutes, more than 10 people called to inform me that my number had been hacked. The following day, I headed for an MTN office nearest to me to show them the MTN number the fraudster used. To my greatest surprise, the young man simply said there was nothing MTN could do and advised me to go and appeal to the fraudster.

The security of life and property of citizens, protection of their rights and reconciliation of differences that naturally exist between groups are the primary responsibilities of a state. This task of the state is made relatively easy because of its monopoly of coercive use of force. And democracy which we ascribed to makes only two demands on government - respect for the will of the people and an abiding faith in the rule of law. Unfortunately, governance is one thing that has been in short supply since the beginning of the fourth republic. One manifestation of absence of governance is the take-over of the nation by brigands and fraudsters.

Unfortunately, like national interest, it is he elected sovereign that determines who the enemies and friends of state are. Thus, President Buhari as military Head of State back in 1984, identified journalist who report truth that embarrassed government officials as enemies of state and went ahead to jail Tunde Thompson and Nduka Irabor of The Guardian. As elected president, his close associates seem to have identified herdsmen killer squads as friends of the nation while victims trying to protect their land and farm crops are identified as bad hosts and enemies of the state.

His successor, the Babangida's regime equally identified journalists as enemy of state and Dele Giwa Giwa paid the supreme sacrifice when he was killed by a parcel bomb in his dining room. Abacha identified NADECO, which was rechristened 'Agbako' by his deputy, General Oladipo Diya as enemies of the state. The regime chased leading members of the group into exile while many of those who waited at home to confront his evil regime were assassinated.

Of reign of gangsters and fraudsters

Obasanjo identified the Yoruba who insisted on restructuring of the country as enemies of state. He marginalized the Southwest while ordering the members of Odua militant group to be shot at sight. For him, Asari Dokubo, head of the militant group who confessed receiving mouth-watering contracts from Obasanjo is a friend of the state.

For President Yar'Adua, James Ibori who was later jailed for his sins against his people was a friend of the state while Nuhu Ribadu who probed Ibori who was rescued by an Asaba High Court and put Tafa Balogun, the former IG in chains, forced him to regurgitate the billions of police equipment and welfare funds he stole, was enemy of state who must be haunted out of the country.

Like Boko Haram, a creation of some PDP warring northern governors according to General Owoye Azazi, the then President Jonathan's National Security Adviser, the Niger Delta militants responsible for the loss of about 400,000 barrels of crude oil to oil bunkering daily was a creation of Niger Delta governors. But President Jonathan who according to the Financial Times of London empowered leading members of the groups with multi-billion-dollar contracts to secure of our waterways and protect oil pipelines while the navy remained under-funded saw Niger Delta militants as friend of the state.

Absence of governance finds expression in corruption, greed and debilitating poverty amidst bandits' illegitimately acquired opulence. Absence of governance is also a recipe for a failed state whose signs we are told include endemic corruption by the governing political class, absence of transparency and accountability by the political class and loss of confidence of the ruled in the existing institutions. There are other socio-economic consequences. In the name of privatisation and commercialisation, brigands and fraudsters sold all the commercial concerns established by the founding fathers to themselves and their cronies. The economy came under severe strains. Part of SAP legacy is that an exchange rate which was almost at par with American dollar in 1985 is today N460 to $1.

Babangida and Abacha groomed new breed of politicians that bred nothing but corruption. El Rufai disclosed how, through the instrumentality of Bureau of Public Enterprises (BPE), members of the gang shared among its members, most blue-chip Nigerian companies. It is also on record that PPPRA set up government in 2003 was used by members of the political elite and their children to siphon about N1.7 trillion under the fuel subsidy regime.

When President Buhari first came as military Head of State in 1984, his presence as the leader of responsive government was felt by his absence. The fear of Buhari was the beginning of wisdom. Today by paying little or no attention to lawless brigands and fraudsters, he has allowed the state to undermine her role as a neutral arbiter that guarantees ordered society through laws and rules.

Apart from the economy, other manifestation of absence of governance and reign of gangsters is the ongoing mindless killings by herdsmen across the Middle Belt region of the country. Not too long ago, Theophilus Danjuma, former Chief of Army staff and defence minister called on Nigerians to get ready to defend themselves. With army formations and police contingents Kaduna governor El-Rufai called for, we are assaulted everyday with newspaper howling headlines of many that have been killed by invaders who simply disappear into the thin air without trace.

Community policing has been adjudged as the best solution to insecurity in communities. And the logic is unassailable. While federal police posted to remote communities in the country have little or no commitment to the people beyond doing their official duties, police from within the community have a stake in their communities. The Nigerian Police do not swear an oath to die for Nigeria. They therefore don't have apologies for not going beyond their lines of duty. The Nigerian police we see at every remote area openly collecting bribes from motorists do so because they are protected by their anonymity.

Load-Date: August 15, 2020

ODUKOMAIYA: The man who gave me my first newspaper job

The Sun (Nigeria)

August 8, 2014 Friday

Copyright 2014 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate.info, an Albawaba.com company All Rights Reserved

Length: 1301 words

Byline: Our Reporter

Body

---

The man who gave me my first newspaper job is an avuncular, old newspaper-man who turned 80 on July 19, 2014: Pa Henry Odukomaia, a man who mid-wifed two newspapers and even gave the two newspapers their names. First, it was Chief M.K.O. Abiola's Concord. Next was Chief Emmanuel Iwuanyanwu's Champion. And just like Odukomaia,

The man who gave me my first newspaper job is an avuncular, old newspaper-man who turned 80 on July 19, 2014: Pa Henry Odukomaia, a man who mid-wifed two newspapers and even gave the two newspapers their names. First, it was Chief M.K.O. Abiola's Concord. Next was Chief Emmanuel Iwuanyanwu's Champion.

And just like Odukomaia, I have, by the grace of God, been associated with the birth and nurturing of five newspapers: Weekend Concord, Sun, Soccer Star, Spectator and lately Entertainment Express.

I feel very proud and highly honoured to be asked to pay tribute to this great newspaperman without whom I probably would not have reached the height I have reached today in journalism.

Going back memory lane, I could remember the year 1979 at the ITT office in Kaduna where I sat before a recruitment panel chaired by Prince Odukomaia. In the panel was Alhaji Fola Ashiru. They had flown all the way from Lagos in Chief Abiola's plane to recruit the best journalists in the land that money could buy.

I had left the University of Lagos in 1977 with a Second Class Upper degree in mass communication. After my NYSC where I served with the police in Jos, I was recruited by the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) as a reporter in Jos. With the news agency, I learnt the basics of news reporting. But I wasn't fulfilled as a news agency reporter. I came into journalism to make a name, to get a byline. But at NAN, nobody gave you a byline. Your story went to the general pool, into anonymity, covered by a general NAN byline. So when the opportunity to join a newspaper came my way, I jumped at it. More so, the hype that attended the coming of Concord newspapers plus the star names paraded in their advert copies made it so enticing.

ODUKOMAIYA: The man who gave me my first newspaper job

The very stars and columnists that I read about in the then Daily Times of Nigeria were all moving to the new Concord newspaper owned by the nouveau riche million-aire MKO Abiola. The biggest star of them all was Dele Giwa, the vibrant journalist who had been headhunted from the New York Times to come home and help build journalism in his fatherland. Dele Giwa with his Parallax Snaps column had grown into a cult hero. He was one hell of a guy I enjoyed reading. He was my role model—the guy I wanted to be like, my benchmark. I felt that if Dele Giwa was leaving the mighty Daily Times to join the new Con-cord, then there must be something in the new newspaper worth looking at. That was my reason for applying for the post of a Correspondent in the National Concord.

And luckily for me, I had a name that rang a bell. My un-cle, Moses Dapo Awoyinfa, had worked as the Chief Press Secretary during the military regime of General Yakubu Gowon. At the interview, Odukomaiya and Ashiru asked whether Moses Awoyinfa was my father and I said yes. In our culture, an uncle is also a father. From the look of satisfaction on the faces of my interviewers, I knew I had passed the interview. Even without having any such uncle, I believe I would still have passed the interview anyway, with my qualification.

That was how I left News Agency of Nigeria to become the Kaduna Correspondent of Concord. From Kaduna, I was discovered by my hero Dele Giwa who enjoyed the feature pieces I did for him to the point where he created a column for me called “Reporter’s Notebook” in the Sun-day Concord where he was the pioneer editor. Reporter’s Notebook was an offbeat column where I reported on the lighter side of my encounters as a reporter in Kaduna. The rapport with Dele Giwa reached a point where I had to be transferred on promotion to Lagos to work directly under the celebrated editor.

Working with Giwa was an entirely new journalistic ex-perience. For me, it was another “University of Journalism” where I garnered enough skills and experience that was brought to bear when I became the pioneer editor of Week-end Concord, Nigeria’s first Saturday paper. It’s so sad that Dele Giwa did not live long enough to see his “grandchild”: the Weekend Concord. It’s one paper he would have loved because everything we learnt from him inspired the paper. Right from day one, Weekend Concord was an instant hit. It was a trailblazer.

From 1989 to 1999, I edited the paper for 10 years with Mr. Dimba Igwe, another Dele Giwa protégé as my depu-ty. It was the best 10 years of our professional lives where we nurtured a generation of young newspapermen like Dele Momodu, Femi Adesina, Shola Oshunkeye, Chika Abano-bi, Eric Osagie, even the former Minister of Sports, Bolaji Abdullahi and others who all later made their own marks in journalism as editors and managing directors.

I never had the opportunity to work closely with Mr. Odukomaiya but I know that he gave Concord a solid foundation that enabled the Con-cord plane to soar into a commercial and edito-rial success. He was able to implement Chief Abiola’s vision to the letter. Abiola wanted an influential paper that would be the talk of the na-tion, a paper that will create a buzz, a paper that will break big stories and keep everyone on his or her toes, a paper that will create, in the words of Abiola “conviviality, cordiality and congeniality” among Nigerians. It was this “3Cs” that inspired Odukomaiya to come up with the name “Na-tional Concord” for the newspaper which Abiola bought instantly.

I didn’t know much of the details of what led to Odukomaiya’s departure from Concord. But I know it had to do with family intrigues which culminated in the exit of the highly principled media hero. From Concord, he left to pioneer Chief Iwuayanwu’s Champion. And again, he proved that thunder could strike twice in the same place. In Champion, he championed journalistic excellence, taking the paper to greater heights. But then, the ugly spectre intrinsic in running another man’s business reared its head again: A clash of interest between the consummate newspaper man, Odukomaiya and the publisher, Chief Iwuanyanwu. In the heady days of the annulment of the June 12, 1993 presiden-tial election presumed to have been won by Abiola, Oduko-maiya was asked to apologize for a story he approved to be reported. A story about how the accounts of military offic-ers were frozen in Europe and America following the an-nulment of the June 12 Election by the Gen. Babangida-led government. The publisher Chief Iwuanyanwu who was a government contractor coerced Odukomaiya into apologis-ing for carrying the story but he stood his ground. He was 60 when he left Champion in 1994. Although his head was bloodied, he left like a true champion that he is, with his head unbowed.

ODUKOMAIYA: The man who gave me my first newspaper job

At a point, he was even tempted with an offer to return to his job, if only he would recant and say sorry. But he told his publisher: "If the condition for me to come back is to withdraw my letter, then I would not come back. If I were that kind of person, you wouldn't have employed me in the first place. Let bygones be bygones. I have served you faithfully. I have enjoyed working while the matter was within the confines of you and I. Now it has gone beyond you and I, so let me stay in my house."

At 80, I am sure Pa Odukomaiya is at peace with him-self, having fought a good fight, run a good race and kept the faith. That is the crowning glory of a faithful news-man—keeping faith with the profession, rather than serving mammon. He is a man of unimpeachable integrity. I wish him good health, more years on earth and a glorious crown above—when it is his turn to get there! That is the ultimate glory. Happy birthday, sir!!!

Load-Date: August 8, 2014

---

End of Document

Celebrating Dele Momodu, my star reporter

The Sun (Nigeria)

May 23, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1205 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Like the Beatles, we were young, gifted and out to change the world, not with pop music, but with a new brand of pop journalism, a new narrative, a new song, a new approach to news. Call it new news! M.K.O. Abiola's Concord newspaper offered us that platform to excel, to fly like eagles, to be creative, to change the narrative of news reporting, to infuse literature into journalism through a Saturday new newspaper fleshed out of the daily National Concord and called Weekend Concord.

It was the idea of our then Managing Director and Editor-in-chief, the cerebral Dr. Doyin Abiola, a great woman of journalism who is our own version of Katherine Graham of Washington Post. Katherine Graham who wrote the bestselling memoirs titled "Personal History." I am waiting to read Dr. Abiola's memoirs. There will be a chapter on how she went abroad on holidays in 1989 and had this brainwave of creating a distinct Saturday newspaper with its style, culture and identity different from the main daily and the Sunday edition. She then called me—I was the Features Editor of National Concord—and gave me her vision of the newspaper and instantly asked me to run with it and give her a dummy—a prototype of what the newspaper would look like.

I had just written a book, Art of Features, together with my twin brother from Sunday Concord days, the late Pastor Dimba Igwe of blessed memory. Shortly after completing the book, I was sent to the features desk as Features Editor to take over from Lewis Obi who went to edit the African Concord newsmagazine. It was an opportunity to implement everything we wrote about on what a feature story should be. Like a football coach, I had to pick a team. In assembling my team of fresh, bright young men for the new Weekend Concord, one talented journalist with African Concord Dele Momodu came to mind. He had written some pieces for me at the Features desk where we changed the whole orientation towards features, making features livelier, more human angle-oriented and turning the feature pullout into a paper within a paper, such that it improved the circulation of the daily paper. This was what must have impressed Dr. Abiola to ask me to start a fresh paper from point zero. About that time, Dele

Celebrating Dele Momodu, my star reporter

Momodu was introducing Nigerians to Woman at Point Zero, an exotic small novel by Nawal El Saadawi, the Egyptian doctor and feminist who wrote this poignant novel after encountering a woman on death row for killing a pimp on a Cairo street and telling her pathetic story. Nawal El Saadawi has Dele to thank for introducing Nigerians to her literary works like God Dies by the Nile, The Hidden Face of Eve and other works which Dele wrote about—having bagged his Master's degree in Literature after a first degree in Yoruba. It was this love for literature that brought us together. Within Concord, we created a small circle of literature aficionados which included Kunle Ajibade, Sam Omatseye, Dimgba Igwe and Mike Awoyinfa who as the Literary Editor of Sunday Concord did extensive magazine interviews with Wole Soyinka, Chinua Achebe, Amos Tutuola, T.M. Aluko, J.P. Clark, Cyprian Ekwensi, Onuora Nzekwu, Chukwuemeka Ike, Flora Nwapa and Buchi Emecheta. How I wish I can get back all these interviews and put them into a book! I really feel a sense of loss. There was no Google and no Internet in those days where you could archive your stories. Who can help me out?

```
(adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({});
```

As the pioneer editor, I wanted Weekend Concord to have a literary flavor. So I reached out to Dele Momodu but he initially didn't understand what kind of paper I envisioned. On hearing the name Weekend Concord, his mind went to Lagos Weekend, a popular paper from the Daily Times stable that specialized on sex, divorce and had a 'Wakabout' column written in Nigerian pidgin.

"No, no, no, I am not interested," Dele initially told me. But I had to sit him down to explain the paper. Luckily, he caught the vision. And the rest is history. I am proud to say, the Weekend Concord became an instant success because of stars like Dimgba Igwe, Dele Momodu, Femi Adesina, Omololu Kassim, Shola Oshunkeye, Eric Osagie, Wale Sokunbi, Aliu Mohammed, Ose Oyamedan, Blessing Okpowo, Chika Abanobi, Lat Oyemade, Yetunde Francis, Timothy Oyeola, Felix Asimone, Emmanuel Oturu, Gbola Adebayo, Gbenga Opebi, Lanre Ajeboriogbon, Waziri Adio, Bolaji Abdullahi, Lanre Issa-Onilu, the late Sunday Umahi and the late Bolaji Macaulay.

Right from the start, Dele Momodu demonstrated leadership and was promoted twice as News Editor and Assistant Editor. I can still remember him writing his stories longhand and helping to edit and rewrite stories. He is not just a good writer whose prose is every editor's delight but has a nose for news. Dele is a writer and a reporter. Two rarities merged with the love for adventure.

```
(adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({});
```

How can I forget Saturday, March 4, 1989, the day we first hit the street? The birth of a newspaper must be occasioned by a big bang. Just like the birth of creation itself. The paper must come out with something earthshaking, the kind of story that would forever register in people's mind. For the Weekend Concord to live up to expectation, we needed something extraordinary. And this was where Dele Momodu came to the rescue with a WORLD EXCLUSIVE! An interview with the ex-wife of our Nobel Prize hero telling us the untold love life of the literary genius who made Africa so proud winning the Nobel in 1986. I don't know how Dele talked the woman into talking. Nawal El Saadawi would have been proud! It was my proudest moment as an editor—and probably his proudest too as my star reporter! Today, I remember the past and join the world in celebrating the great Bashorun Dele Momodu at 60. May 16, should have been double celebration. It's also the birthday of my late friend, the unforgettable Dimgba Igwe. May his soul rest in peace.

At 60, you have lived a good life Dele, but the best is yet to come. Like the phoenix, you have this knack for reinventing yourself. I like what you are doing today, dominating the social media with good, old journalism brought all the way back from our younger days in Weekend Concord, interviewing everyone with a story to tell. Keep up the good work.

Happy birthday from the one you call "my boss for life." It is humbling saying in your interviews that Mike Awoyinfa taught you a greater part of the things you know today in journalism. It is the same thing I say of my late editor, an Auchi man, another Dele, born and bred in Ile-Ife like you: the legendary Dele Giwa. As you turn 60, may God open a new vista of goodness and greatness for you to the glory of His Holy name. Amen.

Apology and Corrigendum

Celebrating Dele Momodu, my star reporter

In my column last week, Chief (Mrs.) Abimbola Akinjide, SAN, was erroneously referred to as Chief Abimbola Rotimi Williams. The error is regretted and hereby corrected with apologies.

(adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({});

(adsbygoogle = window.adsbygoogle || []).push({});

The post Celebrating Dele Momodu, my star reporter appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/39/159019610552.jpeg>

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

---

End of Document

Dotun Oyelade Reporting...(Memoirs Of A Newshound)

Nigerian Tribune

September 11, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1882 words

Body

---

Prince Dotun Oyelade, is a broadcast journalist, publisher and politician. But he restricted the coverage of his publication, Dotun Oyelade Reporting...(Memoirs of a Newshound), to the first two aspects of his life: journalism and publishing. He intends to write on his political life in the years to come but flagged some of his political landmarks in the work to include being Publicity Secretary to Alliance for Democracy in 1999 and Private Secretary to Governor Lam Adesina from 1999 to 2003. He was Special Adviser on Public Communications to Governor Alao Akala from 2007 to 2011 and was also Head of the media campaign team of Governor Seyi Makinde January 2018 to May, 2019.

The interesting publication is broken into 5 parts of 18 chapters. The first part consists of two chapters and these have to do with how Prince Oyelade cut his professional teeth in journalism by working at NTV. The first chapter ought to have chronologically been the third but the author made it the first invariably to teach some lessons to students of journalism education. Oyelade was in Akure in 1978 to report the visit of Olusegun Obasanjo. As he charged through the crowd with his microphone to get a scoop for his federal television channel he was bullied back by some unfriendly soldiers guiding the head of state. It took him some time to get out of the panic mode. This must have been included in the book to show that it is not easy for an early career journalist to get breaking stories as taught in the classroom; it involves unpredictable risks and embarrassments. It was actually in the second chapter that Oyelade narrated how he was employed by NTA in August 1977 under the leadership of Yemi Farouqui. His supervisors on the job included Bayo Sanda, Fabio Lanipekun, Biodun Sotumbi, Biodun Aladekomo, and Biodun Adetuberu. In the news department, Oyelade worked with Segun Oyedele, Folu Ogundimu, Segun Soroye, Mufu Akinloye; Kayode Adedire, Femi Idowu, Biodun Ariyo now Senator Biodun Olujinmi, Bankole Laotan, Tunji Oyetoso, Lekan Alabi, Biodun Oduwale, Rasheed Adegbienro, Tunde Jawando, Kola Akinleye, Bukola Famuyiwa, Kunle Adeigbe and a host of others. He used colourful adjectives to describe the innovations brought to NTA by each of these personalities. He called attention to the suspect image of the journalist working under the military, the intrigues of reporting the 'Ali must go student protest', attempts to repress the media etc.

Part two of the book consists of 5 chapters focusing on Oyelade's sojourn and exploits at the TSOS/BCOS. In chapter three, he told the story of how the amity between Governor Bola Ige and Dr. Yemi Farounbi led to the founding of TSOS and how the station was provided the best possible facilities and conditions of service for attaining for practicing journalism. He was recruited into the station under very rigorous and painstaking conditions but had an exemplary career there. He listed all the people he worked with in the station but singled out Yanju Adegbite, who later became the Project Coordinator at BCOS from 2011 to 2019, as the first face to appear on TSOS TV. In Chapter 4, he called attention to a number of ground breaking reports he wrote for the station: the Lawrence Anini saga, trial of Gen. Mamman Vatsa, the Cocoa House inferno, the death of Awolowo and Dele Giwa; the inaugural AFRC meeting of the Babangida regime etc. In chapter 5 Oyelade called attention to how the corporate identity of BCOS changed when the NPN government of Chief Olunloyo came to power in October 1983 in Oyo. Though the regime was sacked by the military on December 31 same year the three months period of its existence witnessed several staff of TSOS sacked and redeployed. Oyelade was redeployed to the State secretariat at Agodi where he wasted away in the conference room of the Head of Service until the civilian administration left and he was returned to TSOS which became BCOS with the merger of the TV station and Radio Oyo. Oyelade was serving as Chief Executive Officer of the Corporation in 2001 when Governor Lam Adesina asked him to combine this with the assignment of a Private Secretary. Chapter 6 is a fuller length discussion of the merger of Radio Oyo and TSOS by the regime of Col. Oladayo Popoola to form BCOS. It also discussed the circumstances under which Chief Bisi Adesola became the first GM of the Corporation. Chapter 7, the shortest of the essays, has to do with how Oyelade went to the US on a fellowship and nearly acceded to be quest to stay back with the media outfit he visited.

Part 3 consists of 7 chapters and has to do with Oyelade's foray into publishing: another field in which he has made outstanding contributions. In chapter 8 he told the story of how it all started in February 1988 after interviewing Professor Ojetunji Aboyade, the world-renowned economist and former Vice Chancellor, University of Ife, now OAU, at the BCOS Studios. Oyelade was asked if he was enjoying his job and he told Aboyade that the glitz of the job was gone and he was ready to move on. Within a month of this discussion Oyelade was hired to manage a publishing house jointly established by Professors Akin Mabogunje and Aboyade: Fountain Publication. He was offered an initial salary of N1000 per month in 1988 which was more than twice the salary of a Controller at BCOS at the time. He was provided a Citroen saloon as his official car and a driver. One of the books produced by the publishing house at this moment was Mariam Babangida's Home Front which documents the experiences of senior army officers' wives. It fetched the publishing house millions. However, Oyelade was with Fountain Publication for just a year; the owners were more engrossed in their academic activities. In chapter nine, Oyelade narrated how he had to move to Chief Joop Berkhout's Spectrum Books where several works were produced: including Emeka Ojukwu's Because I Am Involved. The publishing house lost the opportunity to handle Obasanjo's Not my will when Oyelade advised the former Nigerian head of state to delete from his manuscript the aspect in which some uncomplimentary things were said about Chief Obafemi Awolowo. Obasanjo is reported to have described Oyelade as 'Omo ale Ogbomoso' (a bastard of Ogbomoso) for this advice. Chapter ten has to do with how he left Spectrum Book in 1991 to register his own company, Current Publications. This soon brought him in contact with family members of Chief Adeseun Ogundoyin, the successful Oyo State-born businessman, politician and philanthropist who suddenly died at the University College Hospital (UCH) on June 18 that same year. He was commissioned to publish a picturesque encapsulating the active life of the accomplished business mogul for the anniversary in 1992. Chapter eleven has to do with how he published the 'The Broadcast Journalist' in 1993 where he shared his professional experience to impart hands-on knowledge on students and practitioners of Broadcast Journalism. Three renowned Broadcast Managers (Dr.V. Maduka, Dr. Yemi Faroubi, and Chief Adebisi Adesola) wrote the preface to the book and he reproduced these in the present publication as a testimonial. In 1995, he published the book Soun Ajagunbade III. In chapter 12 he provided the contexts for the publication and called attention to some critical issues in it. Chapters 13 is on how he could not complete the book on Chief Emmanuel Oyedele Ashamu before his demise. Chapter 14 is on his other publishing exploits: it focused on how he published 'Destiny At Work' on the Late Otunba Alao-Akala and got it launched on June 3, 2009 at Mapo Hall in Ibadan.

In 2015, he also authored the biography of the Chief of Defence Staff, Air Chief Marshal Alex Badeh.

Part 4 of the book consists of only one chapter (15th) and it is on the 'Current Studios and Publications': a broadcast commercial studio for video and audio recording and post-production. The modern equipment for the studio were brought in from the United Kingdom. It soon become the leading hub for popular artistes in the 90s, not only locally but also from Lagos. Iconic actors and actresses like Adebayo Salami (Oga Bello) Sunday Omobolanle (Aluwe) Jide Kosoko, Alhaji Kareem Adepoju (Baba Wande) Idowu Phillips (Iya Rainbow) Lanre Hassan (Iya

Dotun Oyelade Reporting...(Memoirs Of A Newshound)

Awero) Iyabo Ogunsola (Efunsetan Aniwura); Mike Bamiloye (Mount Zion), Anike Obot and a host of other upcoming stars, musicians and producers rented cameras and other equipment to shoot films from the company. Many came back to do their editing at the studio. Dotun Oyelade's professional antecedent as a broadcast journalist with a specialty in documentaries and reporting enabled the studio to get jobs from government and other corporate concerns.

Part 5 is on the man Dotun Oyelade. The 16th chapter was compiled by Biola Olawale, Deputy Director Of News, BCOS. It has to do with how Prince Dotun Oyelade assumed duty as the Executive Chairman of the Broadcasting Corporation of Oyo State (BCOS) in July 2019 with the experience of a foundation staff of TSOS in 1982 before he voluntarily resigned in 1986 to further his ambition and career. Again, he came back to the Broadcasting Corporation of Oyo State (BCOS) in 2001 as Chief Executive Officer (CEO) under the administration of Governor Lam Adesina. The rest of the chapter lists his achievement on the job: staff manpower development, staff welfare, motivation and reward system, execution of iconic projects, amendment to the corporation's edict with a view to identifying certain provisions inconsistent with modern day realities; reinstatement of officers wrongfully dismissed/retired; redeployment of staff of bcos from the mainstream of the civil service. Chapter 17 are people's perception of Prince Oyelade while the last chapter, the 18th contains tributes by his family members: wife and children.

The publication, Dotun Oyelade reporting...(Memoirs of a Newshound), is not an everyday autobiography but an innovative case note that has a lot of lessons for students of journalism studies. The publication describes Oyelade as a newshound. The term refers to an aggressive or energetic journalist with insightful and instructive attainments. The contents of this book stands Oyelade out in this respect; he was indeed a newshound. The Prince achieved a lot in broadcasting but he used the platform of this book to reject being called a 'veteran journalist'. He worked closely with several eminent politicians (Lam Adesina, Alao Akaka, and Seyi Makinde) but he said this has not made him a professional politician but a journalist in politics. Towards the end of this publication a number of prominent Nigerians corroborated what the author reported about himself. In other words, the work under review is not an autobiography per se but an autobiography innovatively redefined. He prefaced each of the issues he raised with detailed historical background in a manner that makes the chapters instructive for students of history. I found this approach to academic writing to be very original and worthy of commendation. Students of journalism studies have a lot to learn from the publication not only in terms of the exemplary way Prince Oyelade did his work but more importantly his writing skills which he excellently demonstrated here.

Load-Date: September 14, 2022

---

End of Document

A Nation On The Precipice

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

December 24, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1204 words

Byline: Sunny Awhefeada

Body

---

Dele Giwa, the unforgettable journalist, preempted our today when he wrote in the mid-1980s that Nigeria had reached the stage of unshockability! Members of his generation would have applauded him for his insight, sublimity of thought and verbal dexterity. True, the 1980s was the high watermark of the tendencies that birthed today's crises and woes. Nigeria attained independence two decades earlier and despite her promising beginning as carrying the promise of the Black race, she tottered into a bloody internecine conflict that raged for thirty months. Thus the 1960s were a mixed grill for Nigeria, her rise and fall. The 1970s reawakened and repositioned Nigeria. Despite being run by callow soldiers the nation looked ahead and marched on the solid path to progress. The New Year of January 1970 not only ended the civil war, but it ushered in a series and sequence of events that enabled Nigeria to regain ascendancy. Our history books tell us about how Nigeria pointed at the way Africa should go by making the continent the centerpiece of her foreign policy. Nigeria took on apartheid South Africa, gazed at America without blinking and one by one ensured the total liberation of Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe and more!

Many people still find inspiring the 1976 "Africa has come of age" speech of General Murtala Muhammed, then Nigeria's head of state, which emboldened Africa and left the West in trepidation. Kole Omotoso recreated that glorious moment in Just before Dawn. Africa was enthused. Murtala died a few days after that speech and with him dimmed the light that Nigeria tried to become. Nigeria, nay Africa, has been wandering between dusk and darkness since then. The kind of honest, selfless and purposeful leadership offered by Murtala Muhammed has not been found since then. Murtala was decisive, pragmatic and self-sacrificing. His moments as head of state remain Nigeria's halcyon days. Many people look back to the 1970s and rue the opportunities lost, the roads not taken and the roads mistaken! As a result of monumental failure of leadership and, recently, followership complicity, Nigeria has now found itself in a vortex of crises. Nigeria has become a casualty of misrule and one by one the citizens are being consumed. Even the rulers are not spared. The powerful also cry!

Looking back and comparing today to the yesterday of the 1970s, the simple and glaring inference is that Nigeria is on the fast lane to the abyss of failed states. Obiora Udechukwu, the poet and fine artist, in his collection of poetry, What the Madman Said, did say poignantly: "The LAND is not our land/This is not our land/This is not the promised haven". Udechukwu's deposition derives from the shocking reality of what became of Nigeria despite the promise of greatness it bore before and just after independence. Barely six years after breaking the shackles of colonialism Nigeria was on the verge of collapse. Udechukwu ascribes the fate of Nigeria to the leaders who are actually dealers thus: "Shrill voices that drove strangers away/Word-owners that drove strangers away/What have you done to your people?/What have you done to the children of men?/What have you done to the land?". Our dealer-leaders are predatory. They fought against the colonialists (strangers), routed them and became the neo-colonizers of their own people.

A Nation On The Precipice

Udechukwu's query regarding what the dealer-leaders did "to our people", "to the children of men" and "to the land" can find lucid and loud answers to the plurality of crises assailing Nigeria today.

The crises bedeviling us today accumulated from years of malfeasance, criminal indifference, moral ennui and acute feeling of helplessness. The failure of the ruling class, relegation of justice and absence of sanctions left the citizens to be at the mercy of one another. The citizens lost faith in government and have taken laws into their own hands. The citizens started seeing the state and its agents as adversaries about ten years ago. The curve has taken a frightening dimension as the citizens have turned against one another. That is why bandits, terrorists, kidnappers, armed robbers and the ubiquitous unknown gunmen have turned on fellow citizens. What is confronting Nigeria is the Hobbesian reality of life being "nasty, short and brutish". The citizens have become predators and preys, depending on the circumstance.

This is just ten days into December, yet we have been confronted by many events that sear our very humanity. The murder of a school boy, Sylvester Oromoni, by schoolmates has taken center-stage of public discourse. But we are a hypocritical lot. These things happen again and again and we paper over them and move on. Bandits burnt forty-two travellers to death in Sokoto. Eye witnesses reported that officials of the Federal Roads Safety Commission (FRSC) in Lagos pursued a truck that rammed into school children and killed seventeen of them. Some eight children got suffocated to death in a bus and a one-eyed thief of a government official demanded a million naira for their autopsy! Students are daily kidnapped for ransom like the five students kidnapped between Eku and Abraka where one encounters no less than five police checkpoints mounted for the sole purpose of extortion!

A trip these days, even the shortest one, usually elicits long prayers despite the many armed bearing uniformed men on the roads! Soldiers, police, NSCDC, NDLEA, FRSC, hunters, vigilantes and many more have taken over our roads, yet the unknown gunmen are still enjoying uninterrupted reign. Hunters have had to rescue policemen from abductors and even protect police stations! The University of Abuja in the nation's federal capital has also contracted hunters to protect the campus! I think it is high time we disbanded the security services and begin anew.

We are assailed on all fronts. Many government workers across the country are being owed months of unpaid salaries. They are now being threatened that there would be no salary for December! Government claims that N199 Billion is being spent on petroleum subsidy and that Nigeria earned zero revenue from oil export. Non-payment of salaries, dwindling fortune of the Naira and galloping inflation have combined to further emasculate the already traumatised populace. This Christmas is going to be the bleakest in our history.

But should we give up on Nigeria or on ourselves? The answer is, and should be, a loud NO! We can still redeem our country and ourselves. We can still be pulled back from the brink. As I have consistently maintained, only the people can rescue Nigeria. Let us not wait any further. The people must reinvent new terms of engagement in the political cum public space. Those who aspire to lead or rule must be made to imbibe ideals that are anchored on the common good. They must be made to live like us and experience life like us. They should patronise only public hospitals and public schools. They should travel by road and not by air, at least in the next five years. They must not move about with security details. Their homes must not be lit by alternative power sources. Then they will put on their thinking cap, think aright and govern aright. Then Nigeria will be great again.

A Nation On The Precipice

---

End of Document

A Nation Astray

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

December 10, 2021 Friday

Copyright 2021 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1204 words

Byline: Sunny Awhefeada

Body

---

Dele Giwa, the unforgettable journalist, preempted our today when he wrote in the mid-1980s that Nigeria had reached the stage of unshockability! Members of his generation would have applauded him for his insight, sublimity of thought and verbal dexterity. True, the 1980s was the high watermark of the tendencies that birthed today's crises and woes. Nigeria attained independence two decades earlier and despite her promising beginning as carrying the promise of the Black race, she tottered into a bloody internece conflict that raged for thirty months.

Thus the 1960s were a mixed grill for Nigeria, her rise and fall. The 1970s reawakened and repositioned Nigeria. Despite being run by callow soldiers the nation looked ahead and marched on the solid path to progress. The New Year of January 1970 not only ended the civil war, but it ushered in a series and sequence of events that enabled Nigeria to regain ascendancy. Our history books tell us about how Nigeria pointed at the way Africa should go by making the continent the centerpiece of her foreign policy. Nigeria took on apartheid South Africa, gazed at America without blinking and one by one ensured the total liberation of Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe and more!

Many people still find inspiring the 1976 "Africa has come of age" speech of General Murtala Muhammed, then Nigeria's head of state, which emboldened Africa and left the West in trepidation. Kole Omotoso recreated that glorious moment in Just before Dawn. Africa was enthused. Murtala died a few days after that speech and with him dimmed the light that Nigeria tried to become. Nigeria, nay Africa, has been wandering between dusk and darkness since then. The kind of honest, selfless and purposeful leadership offered by Murtala Muhammed has not been found since then. Murtala was decisive, pragmatic and self-sacrificing. His moments as head of state remain Nigeria's halcyon days. Many people look back to the 1970s and rue the opportunities lost, the roads not taken and the roads mistaken! As a result of monumental failure of leadership and, recently, followership complicity, Nigeria has now found itself in a vortex of crises. Nigeria has become a casualty of misrule and one by one the citizens are being consumed. Even the rulers are not spared. The powerful also cry!

Looking back and comparing today to the yesterday of the 1970s, the simple and glaring inference is that Nigeria is on the fast lane to the abyss of failed states. Obiora Udechukwu, the poet and fine artist, in his collection of poetry,

A Nation Astray

What the Madman Said, did say poignantly: "The LAND is not our land/This is not our land/This is not the promised haven". Udechukwu's deposition derives from the shocking reality of what became of Nigeria despite the promise of greatness it bore before and just after independence. Barely six years after breaking the shackles of colonialism Nigeria was on the verge of collapse. Udechukwu ascribes the fate of Nigeria to the leaders who are actually dealers thus: "Shrill voices that drove strangers away/Word-owners that drove strangers away/What have you done to your people?/What have you done to the children of men?/What have you done to the land?". Our dealer-leaders are predatory. They fought against the colonialists (strangers), routed them and became the neo-colonizers of their own people.

Udechukwu's query regarding what the dealer-leaders did "to our people", "to the children of men" and "to the land" can find lucid and loud answers to the plurality of crises assailing Nigeria today.

The crises bedeviling us today accumulated from years of malfeasance, criminal indifference, moral ennui and acute feeling of helplessness. The failure of the ruling class, relegation of justice and absence of sanctions left the citizens to be at the mercy of one another. The citizens lost faith in government and have taken laws into their own hands. The citizens started seeing the state and its agents as adversaries about ten years ago. The curve has taken a frightening dimension as the citizens have turned against one another. That is why bandits, terrorists, kidnappers, armed robbers and the ubiquitous unknown gunmen have turned on fellow citizens. What is confronting Nigeria is the Hobbesian reality of life being "nasty, short and brutish". The citizens have become predators and preys, depending on the circumstance.

This is just ten days into December, yet we have been confronted by many events that sear our very humanity. The murder of a school boy, Sylvester Oromoni, by schoolmates has taken center-stage of public discourse. But we are a hypocritical lot. These things happen again and again and we paper over them and move on. Bandits burnt forty-two travellers to death in Sokoto. Eye witnesses reported that officials of the Federal Roads Safety Commission (FRSC) in Lagos pursued a truck that rammed into school children and killed seventeen of them. Some eight children got suffocated to death in a bus and a one-eyed thief of a government official demanded a million naira for their autopsy! Students are daily kidnapped for ransom like the five students kidnapped between Eku and Abraka where one encounters no less than five police checkpoints mounted for the sole purpose of extortion!

A trip these days, even the shortest one, usually elicits long prayers despite the many armed bearing uniformed men on the roads! Soldiers, police, NSCDC, NDLEA, FRSC, hunters, vigilantes and many more have taken over our roads, yet the unknown gunmen are still enjoying uninterrupted reign. Hunters have had to rescue policemen from abductors and even protect police stations! The University of Abuja in the nation's federal capital has also contracted hunters to protect the campus! I think it is high time we disbanded the security services and begin anew.

We are assailed on all fronts. Many government workers across the country are being owed months of unpaid salaries. They are now being threatened that there would be no salary for December! Government claims that N199 Billion is being spent on petroleum subsidy and that Nigeria earned zero revenue from oil export. Non-payment of salaries, dwindling fortune of the Naira and galloping inflation have combined to further emasculate the already traumatized populace. This Christmas is going to be the bleakest in our history.

But should we give up on Nigeria or on ourselves? The answer is, and should be, a loud NO! We can still redeem our country and ourselves. We can still be pulled back from the brink. As I have consistently maintained, only the people can rescue Nigeria. Let us not wait any further. The people must reinvent new terms of engagement in the political cum public space. Those who aspire to lead or rule must be made to imbibe ideals that are anchored on the common good. They must be made to live like us and experience life like us. They should patronise only public hospitals and public schools. They should travel by road and not by air, at least in the next five years. They must not move about with security details. Their homes must not be lit by alternative power sources. Then they will put on their thinking cap, think aright and govern aright. Then Nigeria will be great again.

End of Document

Remarkable Historical Occurrences And Events In Nigerian History Made In August

Nigerian Tribune

August 31, 2022 Wednesday

Copyright 2022 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1517 words

Body

---

Exceptionality in man is usually celebrated and immortalised. Every day adds up to weeks, months, and years. Records are painstakingly shattered and in some cases, made while names are written in ink of gold and some in ink of blood on the dusty pages of history. However, not all pages of history can be dusty. Amongst a few historical pages in Nigeria which are often cleaned up are the following which were peculiarly made in August in different years.

1. Mungo Park Discovered River Niger August 19, 1805

The River Niger was reached this month at Banbahoo by Mungo Park, Anderson, Martyn and seven other Europeans. About 35 others had died or murdered by robbers. Park built a small canoe which he called HMS Jolibar here, and moved.

2. Britain annexes Lagos August 6, 1861

On August 6, 1861, Britain annexed Lagos, declared it a British colony in 1862 and established it as a protectorate over most of its Yoruba neighbours between 1890 and 1897. With its population numbering more than 60,000 people, Lagos colony had become a sophisticated commercial hub by 1872.

In 1906, the British added Lagos colony to the Southern Nigeria Protectorate. Later, in 1914, Lagos became the capital of the Protectorate of Nigeria.

3. Lagos Treaty of Cession August 6, 1961

The landmark of colonialism is present around us to remind us of years of domination and foreign rule. Signed by (King) Oba Dosunmu; the then ruler of the coveted commercial hub; Lagos, the Lagos treaty of cession is one of the fundamental and institutional documents that signalled the beginning of foreign rule in Lagos and other parts of sub-Saharan Africa which will later in 1914, be amalgamated and christened; Nigeria.

Remarkable Historical Occurrences And Events In Nigerian History Made In August

A petrified Dosunmu signed the document on behalf of his chiefs at the persuasion of Norman B Bedingfield, which made him a regent for the Queen of England at the threat that the British will bombard Lagos upon his dissent.

The Lagos treaty of cession of 1861 theoretically affirmed Lagos as a colony before its actual conferment and declaration of the status of 'crown colony' which will, later on, take place in 1862.

4. The August 1985 Palace Coup

On 27 August 1985, a palace coup was carried out by former Head of State, Major General Ibrahim Babangida, who was the Chief of Army Staff overthrew the government of Major General Muhammadu Buhari after a successful coup. However, Buhari was arrested and detained for three years until 1988. It was this agony and sorrow that led to the death of the mother of Former Head of State Buhari while trying to save his son from prison.

5. Samuel Sochukuma Okwaraji's Tragic Death On Pitch August 12, 1989

Battling for a victory at the Lagos national stadium, Surulere in front of a massive crowd was the Nigerian 18 - player- team against Angola for the world Cup qualifier Match, setting the stage for one of the most tragic moments in Nigerian football history.

Number 6, deadlocked 25 years old mmidfielielder'SISamuelraji suddenly slumped while playing and was pronounced dead caused to high blood pressure and enlarged heart leading to an ironic win for Nigeria who won the match against Angola with a 1-0 but lost Samuel Okwaraji; a lawyer turned footballer and promising scholar in her battle for the world cup qualifiers.

After decades of his tragic demise, Okwaraji's bust lies at the National Stadium in Lagos; the venue of his death immortalised as an example of sacrifice and service.

6. Gen. Babangida relinquishes power August 26, 1993

Following worldwide criticism of the scandal-rocked Babangida military regime over the annulment of the 1993 June 12 presidential elections, thereby frustrating every effort towards a civilian led government, the president; Gen Ibrahim Babangida voluntarily handed over in a less ceremonious way to a pre-organised Interim government that will later have to battle for legitimacy, to be headed by Chief Ernest Shonekan.

Brought into power by the 1985 palace coup, the handing over happened at the height of the scandal ridden government with various protests and planned strikes calling for the resignation of the military ruler. The trial and execution of some members of the millitary and co plotters of two alleged unsuccessful coups planned by Manman Vasta and Gideon Okar coupled with the assassination of the popular journalist; Dele Giwa, prepared the regime for an ungraceful departure.

Hence the annulment of the June 12 1993 elections popularly won by one of the two government-created political parties; the SDP candidate and president elect; Chief Olawale Moshood Abiola, came as an icing on the cake leading to the end of a controversial 8-year rule.

7. Nigeria's First Olympic Gold Medal in Football August 3, 1996

Largely considered the golden age and height of the Nigerian Football club in the country's history, Nigeria clinched her first and since then, only gold Olympic medal in football making her a trailblazer and pacesetter in the continent as the first African country to win a gold medal in football at the Olympics.

A significant moment in Nigeria's sporting history, the 1996 'dream team' who had lost shortly before the Olympics to another team, least expectedly clinched gold to the astonishment of the world.

The semi-final where Nigeria with the help of Kanu Nwankwo's winning goal, significantly called 'the golden goal', ousted Brazil which was equipped with players like the football legend: Christiano Ronaldo in a 4-3 win was largely considered the 'final before the finals'.

Remarkable Historical Occurrences And Events In Nigerian History Made In August

Nigeria will go on to prove this in her final match against Argentina with Dosu Joseph the goalkeeper guarding the post and Garba Lawal and 17 other talented players winning with a 3-2 goal count.

8. Chioma Ajunwa Wins First Nigerian First Olympics Gold Medal August 2, 1996

One of Nigeria's proudest moments was when footballer turned athlete cum police officer; Chioma Ajunwa, gave a gold-worthy, mind-blowing jump length of 7.12 meters; a record which stood for more than two decades unbroken until sprinter; Ese Brume broke it with a 7:17 metres jump recently.

After a 4 year ban upon failing a drug test, Chioma bounced back to achieve a feat that will write her name among the national heroes with the thought of gold in history. She became the first African woman to win a gold medal and also the first gold medalist out of the three gold medals Nigeria has.

Now the Lagos State assistant commissioner for police under the Sanwo Olu-led government, she was recently gifted a house promised by the then military government after 25 years.

9. Nigerian doctor, Dr. Ameyo Stella Adadevoh, died in Lagos, August 19, 2014

On 19 August 2014, Nigerian doctor, Dr. Ameyo Stella Adadevoh, died in Lagos, in quarantine because she had been infected with the Ebola virus disease (EVD) while selflessly discharging her duties as a physician.

Back in July 2014, Patrick Sawyer, a Liberian-American, flew from Liberia to Nigeria. However, on getting to Lagos, he fell ill and was admitted to a private hospital and became a patient of Dr. Adadevoh who diagnosed Sawyer with EVD and took responsibility for both his health and the containment of the Ebola virus.

In the process of treating Sawyer, Dr. Adadevoh died less than a month after her patient. She was one of 19 confirmed EVD cases and eight deaths recorded in Nigeria.

10. August 2022 Commonwealth Games - Nigeria Made History

The just concluded XXII Commonwealth games which was previously known as Durban 2022 to be hosted by South Africa but due to financial constraints, was proudly hosted by Birmingham was no doubt a success, especially for team Nigeria has she garners 12 gold medals; her highest in the history of common wealth all uniquely won in the women's category, two of which drew international attention.

In the women's 4x100m relay race, the Nigerian quartet team featuring Tobi Amusan, Favour Ofili, Rosemary Chukwuma and Grace Nwokocha made history by becoming the African first women's relay team to win a Commonwealth Games gold. However, in the men's 4x100m relay team category, featuring Udodi Onwuzurike, Favour Ashe, Alaba Akintola and Raymond Ekevwo also made history with the bronze medal win, the first by the men since 1982.

11. Osun Osogbo August Annual Festival

The Osun Osogbo cultural festival is an annual ceremony that is usually celebrated in every August of a given year at the sacred grove, to worship the goddesses of Osun river , referred to as goddess of fertility. The festival is believed to be one of Nigeria's well documented cultural festivals and recognizes Osun grove as a global cultural heritage by UNESCO. This religious tradition is as well celebrated in other part of the world, most especially countries in south America such as Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia and Cuba. Regardless of Western influence on African culture and religion, the Osun Osogbo festival has always maintained its originality, authenticity and acceptability among nations worldwide.

Over the years, the festival attracted different races of people, both foreigners and non-foreigners usually attend the tourist site from all over the world, as well as Osun worshippers.

Remarkable Historical Occurrences And Events In Nigerian History Made In August

---

End of Document

Taking the power of the air

The Punch

October 23, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1265 words

Body

Lekan Sote Published 30 June 2021

The content of the broadcast media -radio, television or the Internet- are sent from a source, to receiver, by air. So, if you said that the content of the broadcast media is air-borne, no one would think you were talking about a disease.

Sometimes, broadcast engineers and communication scholars choose to describe the pathway of the broadcast media as airwaves, channel for broadcasting; electromagnetic waves, or electric and magnetic fields moving in the same direction; or microwave, a very short wavelength in radio communication.

That probably explains Minister for Information and Culture, Lai Mohammed's quest for the National Broadcast Commission to regulate every business that uses the airwaves. But asking the NBC fix tariffs is an outright overkill.

The minister may have an argument in asking that social media platforms, like Twitter; international television networks, like the CNN; and their carriers, like DSTV, that operate almost as ungovernable out-of-country pirate stations, must have identifiable Nigerian street addresses.

They must register with the Corporate Affairs Commission, obtain Tax Identification Number and pay Company Income Tax to Nigeria's Federal Inland Revenue Service, just like the telcos that also use Nigeria's airwaves asset for their business.

But the minister is not handling the matter quite right. It looks like he, and the government he serves, are smarting from the use to which the social media were put during the explosive #EndSARS protest that resulted in violence, arson, destruction of private and government properties, maiming and death of many in October 2020.

The Executive Director of Institute of Media and Society, Dr. Akin Akingbulu, is of the opinion that including online platforms, the habitat of "citizen journalists, "will be injurious to the public space, freedom of expression and media freedom in Nigeria."

Taking the power of the air

Experience shows that whenever any Nigerian government strays into the space of private citizens or corporations, the government behaves like a bull in a china shop, and it will require massive dexterity to steer it out, away from causing much damage.

Gnawing at Mohammed's credibility is his growing reputation as a cross between Josef Goebbels, Adolf Hitler's Minister for Propaganda, and "The Thought Police" of Oceania, the dystopic society chronicled in 'NINETEEN EIGHTY-FOUR,' by English author, George Orwell.

No one trusts him, as his sly Jacob is using Olusegun Odebunmi and Unyine Idem of the House of Representatives as the hands of Esau to achieve what appears to be the totalitarian purpose of the regime he serves.

At the public hearing of the House of Representatives Committee on Information, Culture, Ethics and Values, he practically ordered, "I want to add that the Internet broadcasting and all online media should be included" under the law that will expand the scope of the NBC, the airwaves gestapo.

The Special Adviser to the President on Media and Publicity, Femi Adesina, sensing the coming ferocity of the braying dogs of the media, threw Alhaji Lai under the bus, and deftly washed the hands of the President, Major General Muhammadu Buhari (retd.), off the controversial bills.

Adesina says: "That is not strictly a Presidency thing, because the President has nothing to do with that. It's the Minister (for Information and Culture, Lai Mohammed, who is unilaterally initiating the bill without the knowledge and approval of the President) that can talk about it."

But then there is absolute confirmation that the President, a former military Head of State, betrayed such tendencies in the past. He once told the late Dele Giwa and Ray Ekpu, editors of Newswatch newsmagazine, that he would tamper with the press. And he did.

He rolled out Decree 4, whose Draconian Section 1 reads, "Any person who publishes in any form, whether written or otherwise, any message, rumour, report or statement...which is false in any material particular or which brings or is calculated to bring the Federal Military Government or the Government of a state or public officer to ridicule or disrepute, shall be guilty of an offence under this Decree."

The Decree added that offending journalists and publishers would be tried by what it described as an open military tribunal, (as if that was a big relief), and its ruling would be final and unappealable in any court, and those found guilty would be eligible for a fine not less than 10,000 naira and a jail sentence of up to two years.

To prove that he meant business, he put Tunde Thompson and Nduka Irabor, two journalists with The Guardian newspaper, in the slammer at Kirikiri Prisons in Lagos, for two years. Nigerians, most of whom have long memories, have not forgotten this misadventure and are therefore wary of the intent of this new onslaught on the media.

Some discerning Nigerians say no one, who knows the danger, would tolerate another person, no matter how benign, to rattle a sharp sabre above their heads. Such a proposition, everyone would agree, is enough ground for apprehension.

President Buhari, who answered some questions and parried others, during the watershed interview he granted the team from Arise News TV ahead of June 12, 2021 Democracy Day celebration, cannot be the goofy shyster that Adesina is inferring. Buhari has a mind of his own, and Minister Mohammed would have unilaterally taken the course he is taking now at his own peril.

To be fair, placing the media under the ambit of the Nigeria Press Council is not quite a problem. After all, the medical, pharmaceutical, engineering, legal and other professions have councils that set standards for them under relevant ministries of the government.

But unlike other professions, the media is mentioned in, and assigned a role by Nigeria's Constitution under Section 22. Also, unlike other professions, whose membership and practice can be easily regulated by government statutes,

Taking the power of the air

the media is better regulated by ethics or Code of Conduct administered by its members, not by a Minister of Information.

Ethics, which is not law, cannot be enforced by an external body, though you can ask a court of law to interpret and enforce its letters. It has to be done from within the profession. Also, membership of the media profession cannot be too restricted.

Indeed, the media, being essentially an omnibus creative space, must actively seek to accommodate content from all manner of professionals. No content must be excluded from the media, as long as it is not injurious to public interest.

That is why it is easy to agree with those who argue that the Minister for Information and a Nigeria Press Council, run by the government, is not competent to determine who should practise journalism, or license a newspaper, that is already registered by the Corporate Affairs Commission that statutorily registers all businesses in Nigeria.

Anyone who is worried about a journalism profession that is not going to be directly led by government, obviously forgot that the statute books are replete with sanctions for any journalist that breaches the laws of slander, libel, sedition and national security.

Also, they forgot Section 45 of Nigeria's Constitution, which provides that even fundamental human rights can be suspended "in the interest of defence, public safety, public order, public morality or public health; or... protecting the rights and freedom of other persons."

Anyway, those who oppose the Minister for Information's direct control of the media should more properly articulate their concerns, as government too loosens its noose.

Twitter @lekansote1

Load-Date: October 23, 2021

---

End of Document

I was happy Soyinka got angry Concord interviewed ex-wife — Awoyinfa

I was happy Soyinka got angry Concord interviewed ex-wife — Awoyinfa

The Punch

August 14, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2000 words

Body

---

A veteran journalist and author, Mike Awoyinfa, tells KEHINDE AJOSE about his life at 70, journalism, and other issues

You were the Managing Director/Editor-in-Chief of Sun Newspaper at some point in your career. What was the experience like for you?

Before going to The Sun, I had written a book called '50 Nigerian Corporate Strategists', where top Nigerian CEOs shared their experiences. I wrote it with my friend, the late Dimgba Igwe. We interviewed big names in the corporate world. There was no question we did not ask them, including management-oriented questions, how a business is run, and how they rose to the top of their careers. We also asked them what it takes to motivate Nigerians to work harder, as well as time management. It was a very revealing project. The book was sold for N10,000 then, and it was selling like hot cake. I was still with the Weekend Concord as the editor then.

Before them, we had also written a book titled, 'The Art of Features Writing'. That was the book that opened the gateway for me and Dimgba. We met in Sunday Concord, in those years under Dele Giwa. He was the editor that mentored us. In those days, Sunday Concord was the place to be and we learnt a lot under Giwa. Everything we learnt as regards management was what I applied in The Sun. The strategy we used was that I allowed Dimgba, who was my deputy, to take full charge of the management. He was the disciplinarian and he had the talent to manage people. On the other hand, I was the dreamer, the ideas man, thinking of the future. I was also giving editorial leadership.

What were the challenges you had to deal with at Sun Newspapers?

It was the usual challenges of how to gain acceptability in the market place. One can pump all the money in the world into a product but if one does not get the branding right, one might not be able to make an impact. And, money will go down the drain. There are many newspapers that have died that lend credence to this. Even the name one gives a newspaper has to be based on strategies. When we started Sun, the owner, Orji Kalu, wanted a paper called 'New Republic'. Based on our background and pedigree, we told him that if we had created a paper called 'New Republic', we won't know how to sell it. Before then, there was a paper called 'Republic' which died a natural death.

I was happy Soyinka got angry Concord interviewed ex-wife — Awoyinfa

We felt that calling a paper 'New Republic' was not strategic enough. We told him that we came from a tabloid background, so we should call the paper, 'The Sun'. He said we could call it whatever we wanted. We then started and created the product drawing from our Weekend Concord experience. We knew that how one starts a product is very important. If one starts without a bang, it would be very hard for one to catch up. We made sure our first edition was a very powerful one.

What were some of the things you did back then to stand out?

As of that time, General Ibrahim Babangida (retd.), had not spoken on the June 12, 1993, election annulment. Luckily, the chairman of the company, Kalu, took us to Babangida. We sat down with him, and he bared his mind on Abacha and other related issues. The interview was published in the first edition of the paper. When it was published, it was a big bang. People were looking for it and asking, 'Where is that paper Babangida spoke to?' Our branding too was good. We did a television jingle. We brought in a white man, Mr Allen, who was our technical director. In the jingle, he said, 'Hi, do you remember them? This is Mike Awoyinfa and Dimgba Igwe. They used to be with Weekend Concord of those days. Now, they are starting The Sun based on the best tradition of British tabloid journalism. When people saw the white man, they thought we were from The Sun of London. The design was similar to that of The Sun of UK. People thought The Sun of UK had established a branch in Nigeria. That was one of the things that helped us. We also reached out to the singer, Orits Williki, who created another jingle for us. People loved it, and children were dancing to it.'

What do you regard as your legacies in that position?

The fact that the newspaper has not died is a legacy for us. That means the foundation we built was very strong. It also means the training we gave then was very strong. The brand itself is strong, so the continuity and sustainability are there.

You are noted for crafting creative headlines. How were you able to hone that skill?

That was our selling point. One of the things that sell a newspaper is the ability to craft good headlines. Sometimes, one crafts it with words, and at other times, one uses pictures. One cannot exactly explain what makes a good headline. It's a spiritual thing. It is a combination of many factors—words, ideas and creative thinking. For headlines, one should do what nobody is thinking about. It should be something that is exclusive, and that will last for a long time. Essentially, a headline that people will remember for long.

What were the memorable editions you produced as the Weekend Editor of the Concord Newspapers?

An example is when the late Alaafin of Oyo, Oba Lamidi Adeyemi, had problems with the immigration in the United Kingdom, and they found drugs on someone in his entourage. It became a big news. 'Alaafin arrested in UK' was the ordinary headline. But at Weekend Concord then, we did not believe in creating ordinary headlines. As the editor, I was in charge of crafting headlines. I did not delegate it to anybody in the production team, which is what they do in most papers. I was the chief headline writer. When that incident happened either on a Friday or Thursday, I asked someone to go to the library to ask for all the pictures of Alaafin that we had. In those days, there was no Internet. They brought all the pictures and I went through them. Suddenly, I saw one where Alaafin was laughing. Then, God dropped the idea in my brain. I was telling someone, 'God is the number one headline caster'. He is the one that puts headlines in people's brains. Even when I am sleeping, I think of headlines. The theory is that if one puts something in one's mind all the time, one will get it right. That is the art of creative thinking. After seeing the picture of Alaafin laughing, I came up with the headline: 'Drugs? Not Alaafin matter'.

Related News

Soyinka knocks Pyrates Confraternity for mocking Tinubu

Pyrates Confraternity's song mocking Tinubu distasteful, says Soyinka

What does Wole Soyinka want?

I was happy Soyinka got angry Concord interviewed ex-wife — Awoyinfa

Another example was when the late Gen Abdulkareem Adisa was arrested for plotting a coup. We put a picture of him on front page and a big screamer that said, 'A disaster'. We did not need any elaboration. We just used a picture of him looking troubled. Knowing one's market and knowing what to do is important. I recall that the publisher of Concord, MKO Abiola, used to commend me back then. He would say, 'Mike? He knows what people want to read'. For me, that is the greatest compliment anyone can ever pay me; that I have a nose for news. Any editor should know what the readers want. That is the basic rule of marketing; give your customers what they want. That is what we applied to journalism. And, it worked for us. When we went to The Sun, we applied the same formula.

Can you recall the first edition of the Weekend Concord that you produced?

The first edition was a very memorable one which I cannot forget. I recall that we had our editorial meeting and Dele Momodu said he would go to interview Wole Soyinka's ex-wife to find out why they broke up. He travelled, met the woman and struck up a rapport with her for a day or two. And, the woman gave a very great interview. The headline was, 'My love life with Wole Soyinka'. It was a big story and it sold out. We made a huge impact to the point that Soyinka was very angry. What made him annoyed was the fact that he knew Dele Momodu very well. They had been in Ile Ife, Osun State, together. I was so happy that Soyinka was angry. That is because someone once said that news is a story that somebody somewhere does not want you to publish. That is the real definition of news. Any other thing is advertising.

What are your thoughts about journalism as it is currently practised?

Every generation thinks their own brand of journalism was better than the current one. The kind of team we had in Weekend Concord of those days was like the Super Eagles team that won the first Olympic gold medal. We had creative young men with ideas. We were ready to die to get stories. I don't think that spirit is there any longer. These days, the facilities are there, including the Internet, but the reporters are not using it to leverage their reporting. It is unfortunate. These days, some journalists look for news through bloggers. Bloggers actually break news for some journalists in Nigeria. Meanwhile, those bloggers are not even trained journalists.

What advice do you have for young journalists?

I am not saying they should not use the Internet. Rather, they should use it positively to be able to fly high. They should tap into the advantages of the Internet. They should buy foreign newspapers to see how they are designed and how they are written. The Internet should be used as a tool for learning. As old as I am, I don't sleep until 12am. Every night, I watch the news and take note of the kinds of headlines they cast. That kind of passion is missing. People should develop that kind of passion for journalism excellence.

Also, there should be more training. Media owners and managers should look for competent hands to train reporters. I believe there is still a vacuum in the Nigerian market. Anybody that understands journalism can easily bring in a new paper and it will succeed.

At 70, do you have any unfulfilled dreams?

I thank God because everything I wanted to be as a journalist, I have been. As the features editor in National Concord, I changed the orientation about feature writing, to let people know that a feature story is a good human angle story. It is about people. A feature should bring in things that will make people laugh, and also cry. It was based on the 'revolution' I brought that I was invited by the Managing Director of the company, Dr Doyin Abiola, to start the Weekend Concord. Whatever one does, people are watching one. There is no how one does well and one will not rise. There is nothing wrong with being ambitious. I was very ambitious. Early on, I decided that I wanted to get to the highest height of the profession. Editing the 'Weekend Concord' was one of my highest achievements. Right now, my dream is to be the number one biographer in Nigeria. I believe biography is a higher form of journalism. It involves asking the same questions— who, what, when, where, and why. I pray God continues to give me the mental alertness, strength, courage and enthusiasm to go out there and look for stories that I will keep on telling. At the end of the day, everything is about storytelling. I want to go to the grave with my brain empty.

I was happy Soyinka got angry Concord interviewed ex-wife — Awoyinfa

Do you think printed newspapers could go extinct due to the proliferation of online journalism?

As a 'chronic' newspaper man, I can never believe that printed newspapers will die. I believe they will live forever. It is just like saying television or radio will die. These arguments keep coming up generations after generations. No matter what the competition is, newspapers will always be relevant. There is nothing like waking up early in the morning, drinking a cup of coffee and reading one's newspapers. There is a sound that a printed newspaper makes that one cannot get on the Internet. I don't pray that newspapers will ever die. As long as people are given what they want to read.

How do you keep fit?

I used to be a fanatical jogger. But with my sickness, I have not been able to continue my physical exercise. I pray to God to regain my health, so that I can continue my exercise. I actually exercise like a boxer.

Load-Date: August 14, 2022

---

End of Document

Wayas' waltz across history's stage

The Sun (Nigeria)

December 14, 2021 Tuesday

Copyright 2021 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1434 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

The lights have dimmed on Joseph Wayas, the flamboyant Senate President of the 1979-1983 era. He is dead but he will be remembered for his foray from the world of business into the uncharted waters of politics and his role in shaping the politics of that era. I first met Joe Wayas, as he came to be better known, in July 1972. He was one of the commissioners under the military government of Col. Udoakaha Esuene. I was a rookie reporter on vacation assignment at the Nigerian Chronicle, which was published by the Cross River State Newspaper Corporation in Calabar.

The editor of the paper, Mr. Moses Ekpo, who is the Deputy Governor of Akwa Ibom State today, had assigned me to interview all the commissioners for the newspaper. On the day I was to interview Wayas, the editor said to me, "Please, get there early because the man is a stickler for time."

My editor did not know that he was only preaching to the converted because I have always felt insulted by the idea of African time, as if Africans have no respect for time and are indisciplined as a race. On one occasion, I was to chair the inauguration of a private university in the South South. I travelled from Lagos and got to the venue 30 minutes before the scheduled time. At my arrival, I noticed that the organisers were only just beginning to saunter in.

There was a two-hour delay. I put away my prepared speech and first gave the university a lecture on how they can lead the community by doing what is right. Sorry for the digression. When I arrived at the office of the commissioner, he was ready and the interview was started on time. For me, that was an important lesson I learnt about Wayas and his ways. It was also something I carried in my head as a journalist, that you did not have to keep your interviewee waiting. At Newswatch, we had sought to interview the governor of Lagos State, Mr. Babatunde Fashola, some years ago in our prominent interview platform we called The Summit, a high-profile interview forum conducted by the senior editors of the magazine. It was always conducted in our boardroom. Mr. Fashola told us he would come at 7am. Some of our editors suggested I should ask the governor to come a little later because 7am was too early.

Wayas' waltz across history's stage

Of course, I turned down the stupid suggestion. The rationale for my decision was this: if a busy man like a governor could create time to come to us to be interviewed, why should we make some incredulous excuses even though we were the ones who needed his views in our magazine? The governor arrived a few minutes before 7am and earned the respect of all of us as a very disciplined and committed public officer in a country where some others would keep you waiting so as to emphasise their importance. Sorry again for the digression.

When Nigeria's Head of State, General Olusegun Obasanjo, announced that his government would hand over to an elected civilian government in 1979, Wayas was one of the young men who threw their hats into the ring. He contested on the platform of the NPN for the position of senator in the Ogoja Senatorial District and won. He received plaudites of praise as a young man who was able to pursue his ambition successfully with missionary determination at a time that politics was a vocation for older people. He made it seem like easy street when he had only just crossed into the bitter territory of middle age. But more importantly, Wayas, a man from a little known minority tribe, was able, through appropriate networking and astute consensus-building, to get elected as the Senate President under the government of Mr. Shehu Shagari as President. That was a major achievement for a young man from a minority tribe.

Wayas' tolerance of the feistiness of the Nigerian press was tested during his tenure. The Daily Times was edited by Tony Momoh, lawyer and journalist, while the editorial board was chaired by Dr. Stanley Macebuh, a man who delivered his articles with philosophical nuances. There was also Dele Giwa, a former New York Times reporter who had just been employed. The brave liberalism of the Daily Times was not in doubt and it seemed to be at the time the foremost champion of press freedom and accountable governance. The Daily Times had published a grapevine story exposing the unparliamentary ways of some members of the National Assembly. The National Assembly was livid and its president, Wayas, sent, or caused to be sent, a letter to the Daily Times inviting its editor, Momoh, to appear before the Senate. To the Daily Times, it seemed to be a gratuitous piece of irritation. Momoh didn't go. Instead, he challenged the Senate's action in court. At this time, arguments had been fevered in media circles as to whether or not the Senate had a right to invite any editor to disclose his source of information. Momoh was convinced that he could not get a fair hearing if he went because a wall of prejudice had already been built against him at the Senate. To him, an impartial arbiter, the court, was the place to run to. He sued the Senate at the Lagos High Court for an attempt to infringe on press freedom. The High Court agreed that an individual had the right to refuse to disclose his source of information. That verdict bolstered the confidence of the press.

But it was mere pyrrhic victory because the Court of Appeal over-ruled the high court, holding that the 1979 Constitution did not shield a journalist from disclosing his source of information. The matter did not reach the Supreme Court so that issue remains an unfinished business because, if any journalist should disclose his sources of information to unauthorised persons, his sources will dry up. And what is a journalist without sources of information?

I was editor of the Nigerian Chronicle in Calabar during the Ali-Must-Go episode of 1978. The Obasanjo government was in a financial crisis. It took some stern measures, which included the abolition of scholarships and loans to students, increase in fees and the drafting of soldiers into schools when the national students union decided to go on a long protest asking the government to sack the Federal Commissioner for Education, Col. Ahmadu Adah Ali. Ali was a soldier, a medical doctor and former secretary of the National Union of Nigerian Students (NUNS), as well as a former executive director of the National Youth Service Corps (NYSC), 1973-75. I wrote an article published by the Chronicle on April 28, 1978, in which I suggested that Ali should be fired for misleading the government into taking those rash decisions and putting our education at grave risk.

That afternoon, the governor of Cross River State, Col. Paul Omu, sent for me. He had read my article on Ali in the first edition of the paper. He asked me to remove the article from the second edition of the paper. I told him that the first edition was sold outside the state, including Lagos, and it would be fruitless deleting the article from the edition that our people were going to read when the decision makers must have read it in the first edition already. Omu was the very definition of a gentleman who was always ready to listen to opposing arguments and did not terrorise me for publishing what he didn't agree with. He was a soldier with a difference, warm, affable and accommodating.

Wayas' waltz across history's stage

On my assumption of duty as editor of the Sunday Times in 1981, I went to the Senate to interview the Senate President, Wayas. As I was there, Ahmadu Ali, then a senator, walked in. I stood up, gave him my hand, expecting a handshake. He refused. He started ranting about what I wrote about him during the students' protest. I told him there was no malice in me against him and that he had a right of reply, if he felt I was wrong, but he didn't. Wayas played an excellent part and got us to bury the hatchet and to hug each other. The sting and clash of battle was over. That event of the Ali-Must-Go receded finally into history's mist, thanks to Wayas the reconciliator.

When politics resumed in 1998, Wayas became a founding member of the All Peoples Party (APP). He didn't seem to be comfortable in that party because it seemed to be a tribal party. In 2001, he left for the People's Democratic Party (PDP), which he thought had more nationalistic credentials. But the party soon became overwhelmed by its early successes at the polls and its managers thought Nigerians would stay with them, rain or shine. That did not happen. In 2015 it lost to the APC, a congregation of strange bedfellows that has taken the country down a steep slope that appears to lead to hell fire. Now Nigerians are between the rock and the hard place.

Load-Date: December 14, 2021

---

End of Document

29 Years After, IBB Opens Up on What Killed Dele Giwa & 159 Officers on Crashed Military Plane

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

December 7, 2015 Monday

Copyright 2015 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 974 words

Byline: Lailas Blog

Body

---

Twenty-three years after a military plane crash in which more than 159 officers lost their lives in Ejirin swamp in Lagos in 1992, then military ruler, General Ibrahim Badamosi Babangida (IBB) has finally spoken on the ill-fated incident.

Babangida, in an exclusive chat in the maiden edition of The Interview, disclosed that the crashed aircraft ought not to have flown on that specific day, based on the issue of maintenance and number of flying hours already attained.

Responding to a question posed by The Interview on what actually transpired on that day and if the crash was properly investigated, the 73-year-old former president said:

"It was investigated. It was reported. But you guys had a mindset. Certain people had a mindset; nobody was interested in the report. But it was investigated. What happened in sum total was that the aircraft should not have been flying. There are mandatory stages, number of hours and maintenance. All those things that are mandatory were not there."

When he was asked on what happened to the people who authorised the plane to fly on that ill-fated day, Babangida said there was no penalty meted out, adding:

"They ought to have been punished. I know that blame was apportioned. I wouldn't know about the punishment. We investigated; we even apportioned blame but no penalty."

On why that was so, he simply remarked, "That is the Nigerian factor."

Responding to inquiries on who killed renowned journalist, Dele Giwa who died from a parcel bomb blast, Babangida said, "A Bomb".

When asked in the interview on who sent the bomb, he replied:

29 Years After, IBB Opens Up on What Killed Dele Giwa & 159 Officers on Crashed Military Plane

"Would you ever think somebody could sit and ask a soldier or anybody, go and kill that man?"

Upon the interviewer's response that "It depends....", IBB was quoted to have replied:

"It depends on who? If what you hear about other African leaders is anything to go by, you are right to believe that it could happen because of what happened in the case of the Mobutus of this world. But there is also one human being who believes in God, who believes you cannot take away life, who believes that God forbids you to do that, who believes that God created you equally. Somebody of that nature cannot, in all fairness order the execution or killing of another person."

When he was pressed on his relationship with late Dele Giwa, Babangida replied:

"We were friends. Very soon, somebody is going to accuse me of saying he is my friend. I knew him very closely. I have correspondence between him and me. But that is not enough for you to believe that we were friends. What is enough is that I took a bomb and killed him."

When The Interview countered that "There was a general feeling that he knew a lot of military guys and knew more than he was supposed to know....", IBB cut in.....

"That he knew we were dealing in drugs and Gloria Okon. Somebody should have come out with it by now. He must have left some manuscripts."

When he was asked if he suppressed the investigation, the former president replied,

"There was a report on that investigation if you may be interested to know."

On the interviewer's remark that witnesses in the investigation were apparently hidden, Babangida replied,

"No. Most of what you guys talked about was fictitious. Even one of the persons you guys said was involved does not seem to exist. Gloria Okon; she does not seem to be in existence."

And then you came out with, what is the name of the other girl who was supposed to be my wife's friend? She was in prison or something; you came out with that one. There is virtually no truth in it all. People are not very good in putting stories together to make it look credible. They only make it look fantastic.

If you are dealing with an idiot, of course you can do anything. But you deal with a man who thinks, a man who tries to rationalise".

On Saturday, September 26, 1992, a Nigerian Air Force Hercules C-130 (NAF 911) transport plane, carrying more than 200 persons, took off at 5:27 pm from the Runway 19 of the Murtala Muhammed International Airport, Lagos, with its destination the city of Kaduna in northern Nigeria.

However, a few minutes after take-off, the heavy-laden plane, which was said to be carrying not just the military boys and girls but young students of the Nigerian Military School (NMS), Zaria, alongside civilians, relations and friends of military officers, developed a fault and nose-dived into the deep swamp not too far from the Lagos State Low Cost Housing Estate, Ejigbo to the Festac Town, Lagos, killing all those onboard.

In the crash officers of the 19, 20, 21 and 22 Regular Courses of the Nigerian Defence Academy were badly hit. A list of 159 names of those officially listed as passengers of the C-130H was released on October 1 by the Director of Army Public Relations, Colonel Fred Chijuka.

The list was made up of seven Lieutenant Colonels, 96 Majors, a Sergeant, Michael Bahago, two students – Mr. O B Oshodi, Mrs. M A Abu, and a reporter, Mr. Augustine Okpe. There were also the eight-officer crew including Alaboson, Mamadi, Squadron Leader J A Adeiza and Flight Lieutenant S O Adamu. The other men, Alum Wakala, Tarfa Saidu, W T Datong and A Soyemi in addition to 19 Air Force officers, were made up of 18 Squadron Leaders and a Sergeant, O. Jaja.

29 Years After, IBB Opens Up on What Killed Dele Giwa & 159 Officers on Crashed Military Plane

The Nigerian Navy lost 16 Lieutenant Commanders, Ghanaian Armed Forces, five; Tanzania lost Major M S Mgonja while Ugandan Major J R Mulazi also lost his life in the crash.

The Nigerian Army Education Corps lost a total of 19 officers, Infantry 17, Artillery 15, Intelligence nine, Signals nine, Supply and Transport eight, Military Police seven while the Electrical and Mechanical Armoured and Medical Corps lost four officers each. Others included Ordnance three while Finance and Personnel and Training lost two men each.

Culled from: <http://www.lailasblog.com> /2015/12/29-years-after-ibb-opens-up-on-what.html?m=1

Load-Date: December 7, 2015

---

End of Document

Wayas' Waltz Across History's Stage

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

December 15, 2021 Wednesday

Copyright 2021 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1426 words

Byline: Ray Ekpu

Body

---

The lights have dimmed on Joseph Wayas, the flamboyant Senate President of the 1979- 83 era. He is dead but he will be remembered for his foray from the world of business into the uncharted waters of politics and his role in shaping the politics of that era. I first met Joe Wayas, as he came to be better known, in July 1972. He was one of the Commissioners under the military government of Col Udoakaha Esuene. I was a rookie reporter on vacation assignment at the Nigerian Chronicle which was published by the Cross River State Newspaper Corporation in Calabar.

The editor of the paper, Mr Moses Ekpo, who is the Deputy Governor of Akwa Ibom State today, had assigned me to interview all the Commissioners for the newspaper. On the day I was to interview Wayas the editor said to me "Please get there early because the man is a stickler for time." My editor did not know that he was only preaching to the converted because I have always felt insulted by the idea of African time as if Africans have no respect for time and are undisciplined as a race. On one occasion I was to chair the inauguration of a private university in the South South. I travelled from Lagos and got to the venue 30 minutes before the scheduled time. At my arrival I noticed that the organisers were only just beginning to saunter in.

There was a two hour delay. I put away my prepared speech and first gave the university a lecture on how they can lead the community by doing what is right. Sorry for the digression. When I arrived at the office of the Commissioner he was ready and the interview started on time. For me, that was an important lesson I learnt about Wayas and his ways. It was also something I carried in my head as a journalist that you did not have to keep your interviewee waiting. At Newswatch, we had sought to interview the Governor of Lagos State, Mr Babatunde Fashola some years ago in our prominent interview platform we called The Summit, a high profile interview forum conducted by the senior editors of the magazine. It was always conducted in our boardroom. Mr Fashola told us he would come at 7am. Some of our editors suggested I should ask the Governor to come a little later because 7am was too early. Of course, I turned down the stupid suggestion.

Wayas' Waltz Across History's Stage

The rationale for my decision was this: if a busy man like a Governor could create time to come to us to be interviewed, why should we make some incredulous excuses even though we were the ones who needed his views in our magazine. The Governor arrived a few minutes before 7am and earned the respect of all of us as a very disciplined and committed public officer in a country where some others would keep you waiting so as to emphasise their importance. Sorry again for the digression.

When Nigeria's Head of State, General Olusegun Obasanjo announced that his government would hand over to an elected civilian government in 1979, Wayas was one of the young men who threw their hats into the ring. He contested on the platform of the NPN for the position of Senator in the Ogoja senatorial District and won. He received plaudits of praise as a young man who was able to pursue his ambition successfully with missionary determination at a time when politics was a vocation for older people.

He made it seem like an easy street when he had only just crossed into the bitter territory of middle age. But more importantly, Wayas, a man from a little known minority tribe was able, through appropriate networking and astute consensus-building, to get elected as the Senate President under the government of Mr Shehu Shagari as President. This was a major achievement for a young man from a minority tribe.

Wayas' tolerance of the feistiness of the Nigerian press was tested during his tenure. The Daily Times was edited by Tony Momoh, lawyer and journalist while the Editorial Board was chaired by Dr Stanley Macebuh, a man who delivered his articles with philosophical nuances. There was also Dele Giwa, a former New York Times reporter who had just been employed. The brave liberalism of the Daily Times was not in doubt and it seemed to be at the time, the foremost champion of press freedom and accountable governance. The Daily Times had published a grapevine story exposing the unparliamentary ways of some members of the National Assembly. The National Assembly was livid and its President, Wayas sent or caused to be sent a letter to the Daily Times inviting its Editor, Momoh, to appear before the Senate.

To the Daily Times it seemed to be a gratuitous piece of irritation. Momoh didn't go. Instead he challenged the Senate's action in court. At this time arguments had been fevered in media circles as to whether or not the Senate had a right to invite any editor to disclose his source of information. Momoh was convinced that he could not get a fair hearing if he went because a wall of prejudice had already been built against him at the Senate. To him an impartial arbiter, the court, was the place to run to.

He sued the Senate at the Lagos High Court for an attempt to infringe on press freedom. The High Court agreed that an individual had the right to refuse to disclose his source of information. That verdict bolstered the confidence of the press. But it was a mere Pyrrhic victory because the Court of Appeal over-ruled the High court, holding that the 1979 Constitution did not shield a journalist from disclosing his source of information. The matter did not reach the Supreme Court so that issue remains an unfinished business because if any journalist should disclose his sources of information to unauthorised persons, his sources will dry up. And what is a journalist without sources of information?

I was editor of the Nigerian Chronicle in Calabar during the Ali-must-Go episode of 1978. The Obasanjo government was in a financial crisis. It took some stern measures which included the abolition of scholarships and loans to students, increase in fees and the drafting of soldiers into schools when the national students union decided to go on a long protest asking the government to sack the Federal Commissioner for Education, Col Ahmadu Adah Ali. Ali was a soldier, a medical doctor and former Secretary of the National Union of Nigerian Students (NUNS) as well as a former Executive Director of the National Youth Service Corps (NYSC) 1973-75. I wrote an article published by the Chronicle on April 28, 1978 in which I suggested that Ali should be fired for misleading the government into taking those rash decisions and putting our education at grave risk. That afternoon the Governor of Cross River State, Col Paul Omu sent for me.

He had read my article on Ali in the first edition of the paper. He asked me to remove the article from the second edition of the paper. I told him that the first edition was sold outside the state including Lagos and it would be fruitless deleting the article from the edition that our people were going to read when the decision makers must have read it in the first edition already. Omu was the very definition of a gentleman who was always ready to listen to opposing arguments and did not terrorise me for publishing what he didn't agree with. He was a soldier with a difference, warm, affable and accommodating.

Wayas' Waltz Across History's Stage

On my assumption of duty as editor of the Sunday Times in 1981 I went to the Senate to interview the Senate President, Wayas. As I was there, Ahmadu Ali, then a Senator, walked in. I stood up, gave him by hand expecting a handshake. He refused. He started ranting about what I wrote about him during the students' protest. I told him there was no malice in me against him and that he had a right of reply if he felt I was wrong, but he didn't. Wayas played an excellent part and got us to bury the hatchet and to hug each other. The sting and clash of battle was over. That event of the Ali-must-Go receded finally into history's mist, thanks to Wayas the reconciliator.

When politics resumed in 1998 Wayas became a founding member of the All Peoples Party (APP). He didn't seem to be comfortable in that party because it seemed to be a tribal party. In 2001 he left for the People's Democratic Party (PDP) which he thought had more nationalistic credentials. But the party soon became overwhelmed by its early successes at the polls and its managers thought Nigerians would stay with them, rain or shine. That did not happen. In 2015, it lost to the APC, a congregation of strange bedfellows that has taken the country down a steep slope that appears to lead to hell fire. Now Nigerians are between the rock and the hard place

Load-Date: December 15, 2021

---

End of Document

A Return To A Season Of Anomie print

PM News

December 18, 2013 Wednesday

Copyright 2013 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1660 words

Body

---

There are some events which, over the last 50 years or so, remain indelible in the memory of those who were alive at the time they happened. It is said that those Americans and indeed non-Americans who received the news of the assassination of John Kennedy, the first Roman Catholic President of the USA, carry the circumstances of that murder in their mind for the rest of their lives.

Such was the profundity of the shock waves which went all round the world in the aftermath of that moment of madness on a street in Dallas, Texas, incidentally the home state of the Vice-President and successor to Kennedy, Lyndon Baines Johnson. The Kennedy assassination was a global event but one which at least in Nigeria struck a similar chord was the equally mad incident which took place in Lagos in the morning of 19 October 1986 when the nation woke up to the news that Dele Giwa, the charismatic journalist and one of the founders of Newswatch magazine, had been assassinated when a parcel exploded in his hands as he unwrapped it within the safety of his own home.

Many people have been assassinated in Nigeria since that incident but no other assassination has provoked as much response from the Nigerian public as the murder of Dele Giwa as this was the first and only time that the dastardly device of a parcel bomb has been used to dispatch a Nigerian to the great beyond. But even more than the unusual character of the devise used to kill Dele Giwa, was the suspicion that the perpetrators of this heinous crime were government agents acting on instruction from the highest authority in the land at that time. Since then, the longest-running question on the minds of millions of Nigerians remains: who killed Dele Giwa? This question has however remained unanswered and it is for this reason that the book, Honour for Sale- An Insider Account Of The Murder Of Dele Giwa by Major Debo Basorun (rtd.) deserves to be closely interrogated and is sure to be over the next few months.

The unsolved murder of Dele Giwa is important for several reasons, perhaps the most important being that this assassination marked the end of the period of innocence for Nigeria and Nigerians as after it, a culture of cynicism and mistrust of government was instituted and it will take a great and sustained effort to bring Nigerians back to a state of trust in those who as soldiers or civilians are involved in steering the rickety and treacherous ship of the Nigerian state. It was the first sordid episode of gross impunity exhibited by purported agents of the Nigerian state and it has set the tone for the governance of the Nigerian nation.

Since then, several high-profile killings have been laid at the door of Nigerian rulers, especially the infamous Sani Abacha whose judicial murder of Ken Saro Wiwa and eight other Ogoni activists continues to represent the nadir of government impunity and insensitivity not only in Nigeria but all over the world. This extant state of mistrust of

A Return To A Season Of Anomie print

Nigerian governments needs to be changed and a clear solution of the murder of Dele Giwa is a necessary first step on the road of reconciliation between the people of Nigeria and those who are set up in authority over them.

By his own repeated admission, Major Basorun was an important member of the Babangida administration and on many occasions he was the voice of the Babangida government, he being the public relations officer and spin doctor to Babangida when he was Chief of Army Staff, COAS, and later on for nearly three years when his principal was the self declared Military President (what nonsense) of the country. Although he was as close to the seat of power as anyone could be without actually occupying it, it is clear that the author could, by no stretch of the imagination, be regarded as an insider in that government as he had no power base and could not get anything done on his own authority, hence his constant need to see Babangida for the authority he needed to get anything done.

.Debo Basorun

.Debo Basorun

It is unlikely therefore that he was privy to the inner workings of the body, that is, the government to which he pledged his allegiance and which for a long time he thought he belonged. Unlike Akilu, according to him, the physically insignificant but extremely powerful chief of intelligence to the government and the man who has been identified or perhaps mis-identified as the brain behind Giwa's assassination, the Major was not capable of any independent action and had to follow all the orders issued to him not just by his boss, the President, but by other officers even if it is because they were senior to him in the military hierarchy or because even though they were junior to him in the pecking order, they had powerful connections which placed them outside Army protocol. As an insider, one who moved in such close proximity with the President, he would have been involved in the planning of the murder of Dele Giwa and would not have needed to stumble on clues which as he surmised, pointed accusing fingers at Babangida and his henchmen, one of who was definitely not Major Basorun.

The Major may not have been an insider as he thought he was but he was definitely very close to the seat of power and had the opportunity of observing the principal actors in that macabre dance of death and cold deceit at very close quarters. For this reason the Major deserves to be paid close attention to. Just as a man cannot hide anything of note from his valet, Babangida could not keep his disguises on in the presence of his image maker. From Major Basorun's account it is easily apparent that his boss was a character the study of which would have benefitted a whole tribe of psychologists not to talk of psychiatrists who would have had to propound new and extremely powerful theories to explain their findings. By many accounts other than that of the author, Babangida was a very charming man who was capable of going that extra mile to accommodate his friends and even on occasion, his acquaintances. This side of him made it possible for him to cultivate a large pool of loyalists some of whom have been quoted as being ready to die in his cause. It is quite clear from these memoirs that one of such acolytes was the Major who, to all appearances, is still under the spell of the general even if his mentor has been translated into a mortal enemy, one who, at one time, harboured seriously dangerous intentions towards him. Maybe it is the distance of time that has mellowed whatever grievances Babangida evinced in his onetime protégé but from this record the possibility of reconciliation between the two men cannot be ruled out.

.The book

.The book

The Babangida government, for many reasons, captured the imagination of Nigerians in a way that no other government has done. The government came in riding on giant waves of what was thought to be realistic expectation but it not only betrayed all the hope invested in it but paved the way for another government which waged a relentless war of terror on the people of Nigeria. Babangida and his government moved Nigeria into new and dangerous channels from where we are still seeking a way out twenty long years after they 'stepped aside' under a unprecedented wave of well deserved opprobrium. Never have so few betrayed so many in the history of Nigeria. It is the work of people like Major Basorun who can give us an insight into the workings of Babangida's government of 'settlement', deceit, nauseous exhibitionism and naked violence. For this reason, the Majors book must be regarded as a source document, one which must be studied with great care as such accounts are the only tools we have to provide answers to some of the questions which that government poses to the future of this nation.

A Return To A Season Of Anomie print

One aspect of the book and one which the author may not have intended is that it shows the human side of Babangida and it is a side which, but for the proximity of the author to the people he was writing about, we would have found difficult to believe. Babangida was presented to us as a man of action, one who was easily capable of facing all obstacles head on. What was not common knowledge was that the general's fiat did not cross the threshold of his own home where he was subjected to physical abuse by the woman who was presented as his alter ego and one whose death had a visible effect on the general.

The man may have been capable of all sorts of anti-human behaviour but he was also one who worshipped at the perfumed altar of Venus. It is almost a relief to find that the man has a human side after all. This man with all his Jekyll and Hyde attributes, who ruled with a bloody and destructive iron fist artfully concealed by a delicate velvet glove, was subservient not only to his wife but to a coterie of egotists who had him in close bondage and in the end brought him to the valley of impotence and disgrace. He appears on the pages of this book as a tragic figure who can be pictured as rattling around his mansion in Minna wondering how on earth everything has collapsed precipitously around his ears.

One question that this book raises is: can we find it in our hearts to have some sympathy for his condition? Major Basorun has a great deal to say in his book and even if he does not make any attempt to add something to the already bulging but far from complete Dele Giwa dossier, the book has enough gravitas to stand on its own. It is most welcome that some of the soldiers who were actors in the various sectors into which the Nigerian Army trespassed with resulting calamity for 30 long years are standing up to be counted on the side of the violated peoples of Nigeria. Those of them who are still thinking of picking up their pens rather than the guns which they dropped or were forced to drop all those many years ago should be encouraged to bite the bullet and make their observations public as a means of bringing some healing to our bruised and battered polity.

Load-Date: May 8, 2014

---

End of Document

God will Judge Supreme Court Justices - Ihedioha

The Sun (Nigeria)

March 8, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 926 words

Byline: Cyril

Body

---

Godwin Tsa, Abuja Former Imo state governor, Hon. Emeka Ihedioha has handed over the justices of the Supreme Court that truncated his seven-month reign as governor of the state to God. The court had on January 14, 2020, replaced him with Senator Hope Uzodinma of the All Progressives Congress (APC) after holding that his (Ihedioha) emergence as governor of the state was based on wrong computation by the Independent National Electoral Commission (INEC). The apex court had equally dismissed his application for the setting aside of the judgment in its March 3, 2020 ruling for lacking in merit. But in a statement in Abuja on Sunday, the former deputy speaker of the House of Representatives said he had resigned his to his fate.

Ihedioha who described the judgment of the Supreme Court as a fraud said God will be the ultimate judge. He, however, singled out Justice Centus Nweze who entered a dissenting judgment in his favour for praise. The statement reads: "On Tuesday 3rd March 2020, the Supreme Court of Nigeria gave a ruling rejecting our application to set aside its earlier judgement of 14th January 2020 on the Imo State governorship election. This is certainly not the outcome we wanted or we worked so hard for and I know how disappointed you must feel. While it is disheartening to note that your desire to introduce good governance has been halted, at least for now, it is also gratifying that our modest efforts have not gone unnoticed. I therefore feel a sense of pride and gratitude for the wonderful energy and commitment that we deployed together to secure the mandate that has now been brazenly stolen from us. "Permit me to use this opportunity to thank all those who played one role or another in this historic quest for justice and truth. I must thank members of the diplomatic community for voicing their concerns for the stability of our country. I commend the chairman and members of the People's Democratic Party (PDP) for their vanguard role and leadership during this period. "In particular, my special thanks go to all Imo citizens for their uncommon support, solidarity, and collective outrage. Never have a people been so united and committed to a cause. You prayed, fasted, marched, protested and even cried. You sacrificed your time, resources, and endeavour for this just cause. On this matter, the people of Imo State collectively rose to demand for justice and fairness. Imo

God will Judge Supreme Court Justices - Ihedioha

people rose up in defence of their right to elect leaders of their choice. Our people resoundingly rejected oppression and power grab, defied imposition, injustice and tyranny. I salute Imo people for this display of courage in the face of oppressive state power. "I will forever be in the debt of Nigerians of all walks of life, across ethnic, religious and political divides, senior citizens, journalists, civil societies, ordinary men and women of good conscience, who added their voice to condemn the injustice done in our case. These are people unknown to me personally but who could not bear the illogic of turning number four to number one on the basis of a fraudulently procured result, and appealed to the Supreme Court to save itself and our judiciary. "Whatever may be the personal injury I suffer as a result of the miscarriage of justice, my main concern in this whole tragic episode is not about me. It has always been about the implications this judgement could have for the future of our democracy and the right of the electorate to have their votes count. If institutions that are critical to the entrenchment of rule of law could thwart the wishes of the people in a cynical manner, where lies the future of our democracy? That was why I sought a review of the Supreme Court judgement. Even though justice was not served at the end, the well articulated dissenting judgement delivered by His Lordship, Justice Centus Nweze, has vindicated our stand. I am sure that history and posterity will be kind to him. "To those who are rejoicing about their successful political fraud at the expense of Imo people, as well as their collaborators, let me leave them with the immortal words of the late journalist, Dele Giwa: "No evil deed will go unpunished; any evil done by man to man will be redressed; if not now then certainly later; if not by man, then by God for the victory of evil over good is temporary". We believe that God will render the ultimate judgment. He has been with us through this peaceful struggle. And our future is in His hands. " I wish to express my appreciation to members of our legal team who pushed the frontiers of electoral jurisprudence to advance our constitutional democracy. I wish also to thank my team of committed colleagues who served in various capacities during our administration. It has been a great privilege to serve the people of Imo State as Governor. I am proud to have been the recipient of their genuine mandate. I will forever cherish the support, solidarity and cooperation given to me during my tenure. My belief in the ultimate triumph and supremacy of the will of the people remains intact. I pray God to bless and reward all those who stood firm on the path of justice and fair play. "On a personal note, I accept trials and difficulties as part of life as they enable one to become wiser and more sympathetic to the plights of others in similar circumstances. But I am firmly resolved never to give up on the struggle for a better Imo State. And for a better governed Nigeria."

The post God will Judge Supreme Court Justices - Ihedioha appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: March 8, 2020

---

End of Document

Dahiru Lawal On Yushau Shuaib: Less Sense, More Nonsense

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

March 27, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1386 words

Byline: Tony Eluemunor

Body

---

I know that some medicines could be worse than the diseases they are meant to cure, especially when the recommendation is from a quack doctor.

I also know that as Chinua Achebe noted about Onitsha Market Literature phenomenon, inadequate learning has not stopped some persons from writing books to educate their fellow men and to make some profit on the sidelines.

So, I know full well that quackery, even audacious quackery, did not begin today and that it has been acquiring turbulent virulence and extravagant boasting. Yet, when Mr. Dahiru M Lawal reacted to my column of 6th March, I was shocked.

It lacked civility, was uncoordinated because he rambled on and on, jumping from one issue to the other. It was an unfocused chaotic clutter; a total mess.

Not one error listed against Shuaib, whom he praised as his mentor, and projected as a Mass Communication genius and philosophical prodigy of Aristotelian dimensions, was refuted. Error number one: he wrote, "Sometime in 2021, my mother was denied boarding on an Air Peace plane going from Ilorin to Abuja, even though she was among the first set of passengers who arrived at the airport very early that morning.

Apart from frustrating her attempt to board the aircraft, the airline further charged her exorbitantly for the use of the same ticket for the next day's flight." That is a severe charge against an airline. A few sentences later this appeared: "Mama came early but was on the wrong queue at a counter of another airline.

By the time she realised the mistake, the Air Peace Counter had been closed". Yet, Shuaib still wrote in that article of March 4th: "Sometime in 2021, my mother was denied boarding on an Air Peace plane".

Is that not a blunder in reasoning, if one is blaming A for B's mistake? Is that not pure illogicality, warped thinking, self-contradiction? Oh, reader, what could have made an "award winning" Lawal to refer to the Wikipedia as a journal? Journal? Haba Mallam, haba! It is an online encyclopedia while a journal is ..., no, I will leave that undefined for Lawal may want to debate me too on that.

Dahiru Lawal On Yushau Shuaib: Less Sense, More Nonsense

Now, I will jump to three important issues; his attack on my person as a journalist and Chief James Onanefe Ibori's defender and the awards Shuaib has been winning.

Yes, some nonentity once mocked me as too untalented to work for the PUNCH, Guardian or THISDAY and not wining any journalistic awards, saying that explained why I became Ibori's spokesman to defend a corrupt politician.

I replied that I worked in the PUNCH two weeks and left to pursue an M.Sc. degree in Mass Communication at UNILAG. After that, Dele Giwa invited me into Newswatch in 1986 (and I add for Lawal's benefit that within two months there, I won an award for Initiative and Excellence. "Oga" Ray Ekpu wrote the citation that tagged me "a child of promise" and asked others to emulate me. My next place of work was THISWEEK where I won a double promotion, rose from Correspondent to Assistant Editor within three years and headed two different Desks; National News and Politics and wrote cover stories for three consecutive weeks, perhaps a first globally in any well-seeded media house.

In 1990, my fourth year in journalism, Harvard's famed telephone call came and I became a Fellow and Ford Foundation scholar at the Nieman Foundation for Journalism, the first academic fellowship and the most prestigious one for journalists.

Oh, I still remember that I was invited into Reuters office in Lagos that same year and asked if I would be free to accept the Reuter's Fellowship at Oxford University. Stupidly, I replied that I preferred to go to Harvard; I didn't ask if the Oxford admission could have been deferred! And for you, Lawal, I joined the Guardian in August 1999 and within a month or two the Saturday Editor, Banji Adisa, asked me if I could turn my essays into a full-fledged column; that was the birth of Abuja Notes.

Do I need to add that I acted as a West African Correspondent for the second largest newspaper group in Africa then, The Daily Nation of Kenya, or that Dr. Stanley Macebuh invited me to be Deputy Editor at the Post Express? Or that I have toured Eastern Europe at European Union's expense in service of journalism? If you want more about my writing, please say so and I may tell you how I was contributing to the Daily Sketch twice a week by 1976 and '77 ever before I went to the University of Nigeria, Nsukka, for my first degree. Yes, I was contributing to the opinion and sports pages and was paid N7 for each article.

Thank you, dear Kayode Ojo, who was Sports Editor then. Please take on me on this for I have more to say; the money the Editor of Monthly Life paid me saw me through UNILAG; thanks to you Mr. Wole Olaoye, now a businessman and columnist for Daily Trust.

You said that I shamelessly defended a "the most corrupt politician in the country". My reply is in three parts; one, only simpletons doubt that Ibori was targeted because of his politics.

He supported the late Dr. Alex Ekwueme's presidency bid in 2003.

Also, only self-deceit can make a journalist think that there was an anti-corruption war during Olusegun Obasanjo's presidency and Nuhu Ribadu's time at the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission.

Three, I am still defending Ibori from ignoramus too blind to see the injustice done to him. Somebody was willing to be someone's attack dog. It is likely, too, that you may have heard of Third Term bid.

I wrote on Sunday May 30, 2004 (or so) that someone would attempt to change the constitution to allow him become President for a third time, and that it would fail.

That was in a special presidency two-page series that ran in the Daily Independent for one week. You stated that THISDAY heaped tributes on Shuaib; I saw where a lady interviewed Shuaib, not a THISDAY editorial, not a news item. THISDAY? I forgot to tell you that by 1995/96, I sat on the Editorial Board of THISDAY.

Dahiru Lawal On Yushau Shuaib: Less Sense, More Nonsense

So far, checking for the awards, reminded me of what Achebe said about a bad dictionary; you would take a confusing word to it and it would give you a more perplexing one. Remember that you wrote that Shuaib (or his firm?) won "the Most Creative PR Agency Worldwide 2020 by Global Creativity Index GCI and Statista, the world-renowned statistics portal". Searching for Global Creativity Index, I saw "The Global Creativity Index 2020" which listed countries; "Australia takes the top spot, followed by the United States and New Zealand.

I looked up those behind GCI and saw an article in BLOOMBERG; "Richard Florida is a professor at the University of Toronto's School of Cities and Rotman School of Management. Mr. Florida explained in that 2010 article: "Earlier this week I identified the world's leading nations on innovation, technology and the creative class.

I have created, the Global Creativity Index". Then, further mutations of GCI came up like variants of Covid-19 virus. I have to stop here to await Lawal's reply and then, I'll speak on my hunt for the powers behind a certain GCI award and how it led to Statista and PRovoke.

So far, I found no news of the body/bodies and the award in Reuters, Associated Press, or American or British newspapers.

I still wonder how or why a certain variant of GCI which turns to Statista/PRovoke will say something and no organization will report it except your prnigerianews (which published the inanities against me) and from there Nigerian newspapers got the news, quoting prnigerianews.

I know that there are awards and there are "awords". One means something relevant; one stands for just hot air. Ade Ogidan On Late Donatus Duru Nothing saddens the soul like death.

The African-American musician, Roy C (Hammond) put it succinctly in his "Fireside" pop music; "Like life when death comes around, we are so sad." It steals laughter from our hearts. And the death of others reminds us that our own hearts "are beating funeral marches to the grave".

Please let's lengthen that quote from A Psalm of Life by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow: "our hearts, though stout and brave, still, like muffled drums, are beating Funeral marches to the grave.

In the world's broad field of battle, in the bivouac of life, be not like dumb, driven cattle! Be a hero in the strife!" Strife? Many have called me to ask if Daily Independent was not a national paper from inception and other questions.

Load-Date: March 27, 2022

---

End of Document

Abubakar Tsav - When the Times Were Tough [opinion]

Vanguard (Lagos)

June 15, 2020

Copyright 2020 Vanguard Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 1110 words

Byline: Owei Lakemfa

Body

---

They were tough times. The mid-1990s. Times when General Sani Abacha ruled with an iron fist, generals terrorised the populace and the military dictated at gun point. Times when critics like Chief Alfred Rewane and Mrs. Kudirat Abiola were despatched with bullets and the writer-environmentalist, Ken Saro-Wiwa with a rope. They were the times when public and military buses were bombed, journalists and pro-democracy activists jailed for phantom coups and many patriots fled into exile.

I was then Editor of a national evening newspaper, TNT (Today's News Today) and Lagos was the hot bed of popular opposition to military rule. So it was no surprise that the tough cop, Abubakar Tsav, the Police Commissioner Kano, Abacha's home state, was redeployed to take charge of Lagos.

He immediately went about trying to beat everybody into line, including the opposition and even policemen. But after a few weeks, there were wide jubilations at the State Police headquarters and a number of police stations and barracks based on a signal redeploying Tsav. We had a good Crime Reporter, Owolola Adebola who went round capturing the mood of the policemen and interviewing some of them and we published it. But Tsav was retained and he sent his anti-robbery squad after us. They met me but I convinced them that I was not the editor, and escaped. So did Adebola.

When the squad realised that they actually met me their prime target and had slipped through their hands, they became enraged packing whoever they found and eventually decided to detain the News Editor, Tokunbo Oloruntola and another staff, holding them as hostages, but I refused to hand in myself. Tsav had first come to national attention when he investigated the murder of leading journalist, Dele Giwa who was killed by a parcel bomb in October 1986. He was convinced that top security officers in the Babangida regime carried out the murder, and had the courage to seek permission for their interrogation which was denied.

There were several bomb blasts, especially in public locations, including the Lagos airport. He, at a press conference on November 28, 1996, claimed that the bombings were being carried out by the opposition National Democratic Coalition, NADECO and "Wole Soyinka's National Liberation Council, NALICON".

In the case of the late airport security chief, Dr. Sola Omotsola who was killed in a car bomb, Tsav said his men broke into his office immediately after the blast and found incriminating evidence, including a radio frequency counter and computer spare parts. But the victim's daughter, Omodele Omotsola challenged Tsav's claims pointing out that the police had on November 15, 16, 17 and 18, 1996 searched her late father's office more than four times and found nothing incriminating; so how come Tsav was two weeks after the blast claiming bomb-making equipment was found in her father's office? She accused the regime of planting the so-called evidence.

Abubakar Tsav - When the Times Were Tough [opinion]

When confronted with such evidence by the Newswatch Magazine (December 16, 1996 edition) Tsav said: "I have not entered that office once myself; as soon as the blast occurred, we assigned men to investigate the case; the first and second teams went in with bomb disposal experts and the police ... they did not conduct a thorough search initially... but what really gave room for discovery of additional incriminating pieces of evidence was that when the police visited the office again they went with mine detectors, the mine detectors will find anything, and that was what allowed the police to get the additional information."

But NADECO Chairman, Chief Michael Adekunle Ajasin said Tsav lied: "We have no agents of violence and in our demands we have been calling for dialogue." Three years later when he appeared before the Human Rights Violations Investigations Commission (the Oputa Panel) Tsav admitted he lied against the opposition. He said the series of bombings in Lagos were by agents of General Sani Abacha, adding: "I believe the explosives were planted in Omotsola's office by the SSS (State Security Services)."

He also revealed that the then Inspector General of Police Ibrahim Coomasie ordered people arrested, especially for bombing without any evidence of wrongdoing.

On the state murder of the journalist, Bagauda Kaltho and the claim by Abacha's terrorist chief, Deputy Commissioner of Police Hassan Zakari Biu that a man who died on January 18, 1996, in the Durbar Hotel, Kaduna bomb blast was Kaltho, Tsav said: "Everything he (Biu) is saying is not true. I mean the evidence he gave in respect of Bagauda Kaltho. He said he got photographs from the wife of Bagauda Kaltho. He also said he got reports from the SSS through the Inspector General of Police, which said the person who was killed in the bomb blast at the Durbar Hotel was Bagauda Kaltho.

"And he said that he never met Bagauda anywhere in his life. Then how could he come to that conclusion that the man killed was Bagauda Kaltho? He merely saw his pictures. He should be in prison. As far as I'm concerned, he is a prisoner on parole."

Tsav saw the military as a problem: "Soldiers now commit crime, and behave as if they are above arrest, whereas soldiers are supposed to be subject to civil authority... After the (1966) coup, the military destroyed the police, and from then became law unto themselves."

On the police from whose loins he was produced, Tsav argued: "Our problem in this country is the Nigeria Police Force, it is not the government. If you like, give the police the Central Bank, give the police a general assembly plant, give them all the communication outfits, they will still not perform."

On insecurity, he argued that: "Banditry and insecurity are created by politicians and the politicians know who the bandits are. They know why these people are doing this. If the police are courageous enough to search houses and monitor activities of politicians, you will see what they will recover from them."

Despite growing distrust, mass dissatisfaction and disenchantment with the Buhari administration, Tsav believed: "Buhari is the best person to lead Nigeria now. He is incorruptible, and his war against corruption has been exposing looters" adding that the only drawback is that "he is too slow, and some of his aides are corrupt."

On Monday June 8, 2020, he took his eternal bow. Tsav was a nationalist who lacked the theory of a patriot; a tough cop who did not understand the uses of state power; a loyalist which made him susceptible to manipulations; a moralist with predisposition for social justice but whose grasp of power relations found him sometimes in the camp of dictators. He was, instinctively, a good man.

End of Document

We'll reopen Dele Giwa's case - Sowore

The Punch

October 20, 2022 Thursday

Copyright 2022 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 146 words

Body

---

The presidential candidate of the African Action Congress, Omoyele Sowore, has said that the case of a late journalist and activist, Dele Giwa, who was murdered in Ikeja, Lagos on October 19, 1986, with a bomb enclosed in a parcel, will be reopened.

In a memorial post for the late activist on Wednesday, Sowore knocked former military President, Ibrahim Babangida, alleging that he was part of the plot to assassinate Giwa. He subsequently stated that Giwa's case would be reopened.

"36 years ago, ex-military dictator, Ibrahim Babangida, plotted with Halilu Akiliu (Ex-Director of National Intelligence) and Col A.K Togun (now deceased) to send a letter bomb that assassinated foremost investigative journalist, Dele Giwa, in his house in Ikeja. We'll reopen the case!" Sowore posted.

He shared pictures of the late journalist as alongside a flyer that read, "Who killed Dele Giwa?"

Load-Date: November 29, 2022

---

End of Document

I Will Temper With Press Freedom

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

June 13, 2019 Thursday

Copyright 2019 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 891 words

Byline: Sunny Awhefeada

Body

---

The title of this essay should reverberate among people who had become adults around 1984. I don't belong to that age bracket, but the precocious in my generation would remember the statement "I will tamper with press freedom" wistfully. Yes, wistfully. We were enjoying the Harmattan and conviviality of yuletide and New Year in pristine Evwreni on 1st January 1984 when the news of an end of year coup d' tat got to us. We were innocent children savouring the rare taste of Christmas rice and stew and getting set for our masquerade show that earned us dough. Our only awareness that things had gone awry was that some of the items that constituted our menu had begun to vanish. Tea was no longer on our table just as bread was no more for breakfast. Rice had also become a rare item, except for Christmas and New Year. But we heard our parents and guardians and even teachers talk about corruption and rigging of election. We heard them, but they meant nothing to us. All of that changed in January 1984 in our first year in secondary school.

The teachers in the residential quarters where we lived bought many newspapers that January as that was the most authentic and lasting record of what was going on in Lagos, then the seat of power. Curiosity made some of us to begin reading the newspapers intensively as if for an examination. The stories were exciting as they detailed the actions of the new rulers who were young and good looking soldiers as evidenced in the pictures in the newspapers. Stories of arrest and detention of politicians of the deposed regime made the headlines. Our parents and guardians hailed the soldiers and we children adored if not admired them. Then one day we saw one newspaper, I think it should be National Concord, with the headline "I will tamper with press freedom". The statement was attributed to the Major General Muhammadu Buhari, the young military head of state. His picture was on the cover. He was trim, young, good looking, likable, and austere. As children we didn't know the impact of that declaration. We were rather enchanted by the power and authority the statement commanded. We soon adopted the phrase "I will tamper with" in our dealings in school. Our prefects also borrowed the phrase "with immediate effect" from the new military rulers.

Yes, Buhari as military dictator did tamper with press freedom. I am sure, not too long after that declaration Tunde Thompson and Nduka Irabor, both of The Guardian were sent to prison. Two notorious military legislations reinforced the gross violation of human rights and the muffling of the press. One was Decree No. 2 and the other was Decree No. 4. The former allowed the regime to detain anybody indefinitely without trial. The later was an artillery nozzle aimed at the heart of the press. In its quest for scapegoats the soldiers branded many deeds, even innocuous ones, as sabotage. Thus, for twenty months the media gasped for breadth under Buhari's jackboot. He waged a war against the nation in the name of War Against Indiscipline.

I Will Temper With Press Freedom

When Major General Ibrahim Babangida, Buhari's buddy for twenty years, shoved him aside and took over governance he did so under the excuse of redressing the excessive human rights abuse and gagging of the press experienced under the latter's draconian regime. But military rule was military rule, because even though Babangida pretended to be a reformer he entrenched Buhari's assault on the media. The situation got worse under General Sani Abacha who usurped the Interim National Government (ING) to crown himself head of state. Thus, for sixteen years, from 1983 to 1999, the soldiers in power tampered with press freedom. Dele Giwa paid the supreme price. Others spent time in Abacha's gulag or were "jailed for life" as Kunle Ajibade experienced and wrote.

Yet, in spite of the media's gory experience in those sixteen gruesome years many journalists stood up in defiance against oppression. Those brave souls who founded and worked with news magazines such as Tell, The News, Tempo and others typified the heroism of defiance in the face of military barbarism. They proved that the pen was truly mightier than the armoured tank and not even the sword. The press created a site of struggle which took a pan-Nigerian dimension. The experience became a recreation of the role the press played in the quest for independence before 1960. Yes, the 1990s was the decade of struggle for a second independence from benighted military rule. Nigerians won mainly due to the role of the press.

The recent closure of the AIT and Raypower, both media outfits of DAAR Communications Limited, is the true to type of the abrasive assault on the press for which soldiers in power are known. When Ishaq Modibo Kawu the pugnacious Director General of the National Broadcasting Commission (NBC) reeled out reasons for the closure of the station it was merely an act intended to give a dog a bad name in order to hang it. It is still fresh how the presidency blacklisted and barred the AIT from Aso Rock. Soldiers also invaded and occupied the offices of Daily Trust. Daily Independent journalist was also unlawfully incarcerated by the DSS. Many other instances of tampering with press freedom now abound because we are back to 1984.

The post I Will Temper With Press Freedom appeared first on Independent Newspapers Nigeria.

Load-Date: June 13, 2019

---

End of Document

Mike Adenuga buys Masekela's trumpet

The Sun (Nigeria)

February 10, 2018 Saturday

Copyright 2018 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1173 words

Byline: Uche Atuma

Body

---

It's a tale of two African giants—one a giant of enterprise, the other a giant of jazz, Africa's "Father of Jazz" and trumpet maestro.

Their paths crossed in Ghana resulting in Mike Adenuga buying the trumpet of the world-acclaimed South African jazz icon who died in January of prostate cancer at the age of 78. The encounter is told in our long-awaited book, The GURU—Eyewitness Biography of Mike Adenuga slated for release this year at the next Dimgba Igwe Memorial book launch.

As Mike Adenuga's biographer and a newsman, I cannot but report this exclusive news item in the light of the death of Masekela, a man who is to South Africa what Fela was to Nigeria. Incidentally Fela and Masekela were good friends. Masekela even did a cover version of Fela's song Lady. But it's for the Herb Albert-like song Grazing in the Grass, a song that topped the American Billboard chart in 1968 that Masekela is best remembered. Masekela's biggest hit "Grazing in the Grass" conjures the image of a nomadic jazz man playing his music across the fields, across green pastures. Only that he didn't kill people like the deadly Fulani herdsmen of the apocalypse ravaging our farmlands, leaving behind sorrow, tears and blood. Instead, he was the victim fleeing from the injustice, the brutality and the killing fields of apartheid and finding redemption in the jazz instrument of the trumpet that became his voice and weapon. As an activist, he simply used his trumpet to protest the cruelty and injustice of apartheid in songs like Soweto Blues and Bring Him Back (Nelson Mandela).

Jazz-wise, I won't call myself a big fan of Hugh Masekela. But I love the sound of his horn which appeals to me more than the sound of his singing voice. Generally, I prefer the instrumental aspect of jazz music to the vocal part. And the trumpet is my favourite jazz music instrument. My favourite trumpeter will forever be Miles Davis. I like his style, the muffled sound of his trumpet and the ability to explore other musical territories to enlarge the coast of jazz. While jazz purists like Wynton Marsalis will stick to the orthodox New Orleans type of jazz, Miles Davis is ready to innovate, to explore other genres including rock music and "jazzifying" them. Take what he did with Michael Jackson's Human Nature and Cyndi Lauper's Time After Time.

Mike Adenuga buys Masekela's trumpet

My introduction to Miles Davis was through Willis Conover, the man called the "Voice of Jazz", the deep baritone-voice broadcaster and disc jockey whose long-running "Jazz Hour" programme on Voice of America (VOA) radio introduced millions across the world to American jazz music.

I can never forget the first time I heard Miles Davis new album Tutu named after the South African bishop and anti-apartheid activist. Tutu remains my favourite album. It's the album that has turned me into a Miles Davis devotee. Next to Tutu, I love Miles' Kind of Blue rated as the No.1 jazz album of all-time.

I was watching the Hugh Masekela funeral ceremony where speaker after speaker paid homage to the late jazz icon. From Hugh Masekela's promoter, I got to know that Masekela didn't want to form his own band. He wanted to play with Miles Davis. But Miles Davis told him to go and form his own band and play "your African shit."

So this "shit" and "shithole" thing about Africa popularized and sensationalized by Donald Trump has come a long way. From what I gathered, it was Miles Davis who challenged Hugh Masekela to form his own band which he then infused with his native South African brand of music. But for Miles Davis, Masekela would probably have been lost in the anonymity of American jazz. He wouldn't have differentiated himself to be the African jazz leader that he is today even in death.

From listening to Willis Conover in my University of Lagos days in the mid-seventies, jazz has captured my soul. It is the music that inspires me as a writer. I remember the good old days in the Sunday Concord, when my editor, the legendary Dele Giwa killed by a parcel bomb initiated me into the jazz world of Earl Klugh, the acoustic guitar maestro. The Sunday Concord newsroom called "The Writer's Enclave" was filled with Dele Giwa's apostles like Soji Akinrinade, May Ellen Ezekiel, Lewis Obi, Banji Adeyanju, the late Dimgba Igwe, Chuma Adichie and the rest of them. I remember I was the resident deejay spinning jazz music from my massive tape recorder cum radio as we banged our typewriters to produce stories. There were no computers then as we have today.

Dele Giwa, the American-trained journalist who was with the New York Times had worked with the Daily Times as features editor from where he was headhunted to become the pioneer editor of the Sunday Concord. I owe so much to Dele Giwa, the editor of editors. How I wished he lived to see my Weekend Concord, a paper influenced by the stuff I learnt from him. From my biography of Mike Adenuga, you will read that Dele Giwa, Mike Adenuga and Femi Akinrinade (Adenuga's first-ever business partner) were all students and friends in New York of those days, a New York filled with jazz and soul music. They all drove gypsy cabs which was one of the most dangerous jobs in New York in addition to studying.

Yes, Mike Adenuga loves jazz, but he prefers more of African highlife music. It's a passion he shares with his daughter Mrs. Bella Adenuga-Disu who told me in a rare interview: "My father likes good music. He is a lover of highlife music. Dad and I have common musical taste. I love highlife music and people think it's crazy. I love Victor Uwaifo, E.T. Mensah, Osita Osadebe. People find my musical taste weird but my dad and I have that in common. Whenever a new CD is out, he sends me a copy. And he loves jazz a lot. My dad enjoys good music and he enjoys good food."

As a kid, Adenuga was crazy about I.K. Dairo's music. He adored him. He would sit all day long by the radio waiting to hear Dairo's music. His sister told me so.

In our book, the story of how Adenuga, an Afrocentrist whose company Glo sponsors African Voices on CNN and who loves and supports anything Africa bought Hugh Masekela's trumpet in Ghana. The story is told by Ian Randolph, Adenuga's trusted friend from way back: "On a personal note, when I lost my mother in 2000, my chairman Mike Adenuga took over the burial in Ghana. He empowered me enough to give her a burial plus his presence at the burial. It was the most gratifying. And he came with a large delegation, not just him. He donates to churches, charities and so many causes and he doesn't say a word about it. His philanthropy is legendary. In Ghana, there was a charity for homeless children. He doesn't go out much. But on that day, I convinced him to go. Hugh Masekela, the world-acclaimed South African jazz trumpeter was performing. And they auctioned his trumpet. And he bought it for $50,000. Then they didn't know who he was. And he made me give the money as if it was my money."

Mike Adenuga buys Masekela's trumpet

The post Mike Adenuga buys Masekela's trumpet appeared first on The Sun News.

Load-Date: March 21, 2018

---

End of Document

The Nation stars at NMMA

The Nation (Nigeria)

December 17, 2019 Tuesday

Copyright 2019 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1035 words

Body

---

With a haul of eight honours, 18 nominations in 17 categories, The Nation on Sunday night proved its mettle at the 27th Nigerian Media Merit Awards (NMMA).

At the event, held at the Muson Centre in Onikan, Lagos State, this newspaper beat The Punch in the Prize for Editorial Writing of the Year.

Vintage Press Limited Chairman Wale Edun congratulated the winners.

He said: 'I want to heartily congratulate the eight worthy award winners, on their fantastic achievements. Such acclamation and recognition is becoming something of a noble tradition at The Nation. Nonetheless it is never to be taken for granted; we should celebrate!'

This year's NMMA featured 37 categories in print and six each for radio and television.

Deputy Editor Emmanuel Oladesu's report 'The big contest' won the Lateef Jakande Prize for Political Reporter. Correspondent Precious Igbonwelundu was runner up with her entry 'Conflicting...as National Assembly moves to endorse the creation of state police.'

Multiple awards winner Sina Fadare beat Vanguard and Nigerian Tribune nominees in the 9Mobile Prize for Innovative Reporter of the Year with his story 'The magic of smokeless coal.' His report 'Beekeeping: Gateway to wealth creation and good health' was runner up in the Bukola Saraki Prize for Agriculture Reporter of the Year, won by Ebhuomhan Sebastine of Daily Independent.

Fadare was recently appointed as Editor of Yoruba newspaper in the Vintage Press Limited stable - Gbelegbo.

With his report 'Revealed: How N600m SURE-P funds for tourism were misappropriated,' Innocent Duru floored two entrants from New Telegraph to clinch the Adamu Mu'azu Prize for Tourism Reporter of the Year.

Capital Market Editor Taofik Saloko's 'Multiple Subscriptions: Amnesty for 'ghost' shareholders' was the judges' favourite for the Access Bank Prize for Capital Market Reporter of the Year and Daniel Eshiet won the Coca Cola Nigeria Prize for Brand and Marketing Reporter of the Year with his report 'Nigeria's burgeoning diabetes drug business.'

The Nation stars at NMMA

Assistant Editor Gboyega Alaka's investigative piece 'Shina Rambo is dead! Pastor who claims to be Shina Rambo is fake' won the coveted Ernest Sisei Ikoli Prize for Newspaper Reporter of the Year and Medinat Kanabe was crowned the NMMA Female Reporter of the year with her story 'Anyone can be victim of maternal mortality.'

Prolific sports writer Alimi Taiwo was a finalist in the Bashorun MKO Abiola sports reporting category which former New Telegraph's Deputy Sports Editor Dapo Sotuminu clinched; Energy Editor Emeka Ugwanyi was runner up in the Peter Odili Prize for Power Reporter won by Ujah Emmanuel of Vanguard. Ugwuanyi was also runner up in the Chevron Nigeria Prize for Oil and Gas Reporter which Juliana Francis of the New Telegraph won.

Assistant Editor Okwy Iroegbu-Chikezie's report 'ECOWAS protocol under xenophobia threat' was runner up in the Olusegun Mimiko Prize for Foreign News Reporter; Money Market Correspondent Collins Nweze was runner up in two categories: Sonny Odogwu Prize for Business Reporter of the Year, and Union Bank Prize for Banking and Finance Reporter. Industry Correspondent Oluwakemi Dauda was finalist in the Nigerian Port Authority (NPA) Prize for Maritime Reporter of the Year.

This newspaper has consistently lived true to its mandate of 'truth in defence of freedom,' parading an array of seasoned professionals.

The Nation won the NMMA Newspaper of the Year in 2018 with four other awards, emerging runner up in 16 categories. In 2017, this newspaper's reporters clinched 10 of the 29 prizes up for grabs in the print media category, leaving seven other newspapers to share the remaining 19.

This year, The Punch had seven wins, including the Babatunde Jose Prize for Newspaper of the Year, which it contested with The Guardian and Daily Trust; Alade Odunewu Prize for Columnist of the Year (Adelakun Abimbola); Cecil King Memorial Prize for Print Journalist of the year (Samson Folarin), Photographer of the Year (Obasa Olatunji) and MTN Prize for Telecommunications Reporter of the Year (Ogunfunwa Adedoyin). It had 18 nominations in 13 categories.

With record 34 nominations in 24 categories, New Telegraph clinched 10 awards; The Guardian got five awards, including the Dele Giwa Prize for Editor of the Year; Vanguard won three and The Sun won one.

Other winners at the event were Tony Okuyeme whose story 'High expectations amid disquiet over national theatre' won the Olu Aboderin Prize for Entertainment Reporter; Isioma Madike's entry 'The dying culture of giving first salary to parents,' won Olagunsoye Oyinlola Prize for Culture and Tradition; Dorothy Orakpo won the Ibrahim Shekarau Prize for Education Reporter with the story 'Deepening rot in education sector triggers alarm'; China Abanobi won the Olusegun Mimiko Prize for Foreign News Reporter with 'Flipside of the American dream' and Princewill Ekwujuru's 'Divergent views in debate over relevance of CSR' got the Keystone Bank Prize for CSR reporter.

Ifeanyi Emmanuel's 'Agony of residents sacked by flood' was adjudged winner of the NAFCON Environment Reporter category; Adeola Yusuf won Conoil Prize for Energy Correspondent with entry 'The big power scandal' and Yeeken Nurudeen's story 'Plastic recycling plants: how Nigeria's 392m investment on project end up in ruins' clinched the Sonny Odogwu Prize for Business Reporter of the Year.

Also, Chijoke Jideofor emerged winner of IGI prize for Insurance Reporter; Babatunde Ajaja won NPA Prize for Maritime Reporter; Olasunkanmi Akoni received the prize for Real Estate/Construction reporting; Emenike Chukwuemeka won Nnamdi Azikiwe prize for Cartoonist of the year, Akinfenwa Olugbenga got the Alex Ibru Prize for Investigative Reporting, Bertram Nwannekanma was announced winner of the Abubakar Imam Prize for Newspaper Features Writer and Mike Ebonugwo won the Gani Fawehinmi Prize for Human Rights Reporter.

Award Committee Chairman Prof. Ralph Akinfeleye said there was no winner for the Buba Marwa Prize for Defence Reporting because the nominations were below the 70 per cent cut-off.

He urged editors to be meticulous in editing copies to minimise errors, and encouraged media practitioners to uphold the tenets of the profession.

The Nation stars at NMMA

Load-Date: December 18, 2019

---

End of Document

Noble Birth, Troubled Adulthood

Vanguard (Lagos)

December 30, 2019

Copyright 2019 Vanguard Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 1162 words

Byline: Owei Lakemfa

Body

---

Muritala Ramat Muhammed was the charismatic General who emerged Head of State following the July 29, 1975 coup. In a counter-coup on February 13, 1976, he was cut down in a hail of bullets. The frightened regime which survived him was shocked it had no inkling such a coup was in the offing. It, therefore, decided to establish a secret service which would combine internal security, local and foreign intelligence gathering, counter-intelligence and propaganda.

The regime mandated then Governor of Benue Plateau State and former Director, Military Intelligence, Major General Abdul Mohammed, technocrat, Mr. Sunday Bolorunduro Awoniyi and then Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Internal Affairs, Alhaji Liman Ciroma to work on this project. This gave birth to the Nigerian Security Organisation, NSO, under Decree 27 of 1976.

Initially, the Metropolitan Club, Lagos was to be seized and used as the NSO headquarters, but the regime rejected this and rather, ordered the seizure of the Civil Service Club at 15, Awolowo Road, Ikoyi, Lagos. A few years down the line, that address, which was a relaxation centre, became one people prayed not to be taken as it came to symbolize repression, torture and detention without trial.

Another major issue about the NSO that changed, was secrecy, especially of its officers. Chief Olusegun Obasanjo, a general who was Head of State when the NSO was created, wrote in his book, Not My Will that: "At inception, our aim was to make the NSO thoroughly faceless and inconspicuous but silently functioning with a clinical efficiency... Its principal officers were to remain innocuous and maintain a totally low and obtrusive profile."

Given this policy, Obasanjo said: "One can then imagine our chagrin when information came to us about Newbreed magazine's story on the NSO with the picture of the Director, Maj-Gen. Mohammed, splashed on the face of the magazine to the bargain... I was told what Okolie (Newbreed Publisher) had planned to do would have done irreparable damage to the NSO, he would have blown whatever cover the NSO had... We had no choice but to seize his magazine in national interest."

This obsession about the secrecy of NSO, (renamed the State Security Service, SSS) is now laughable as the organization even advertises itself. In fact, like the police, customs, immigration, prisons (correctional services) and the armed forces, it has its own uniform. When in our streets today, you see people clad in full black attire with boots, and sometimes with fancy-looking Israeli weapons, know they are of the 'secret service.' Sometimes, their uniform consist of masks making them look like Ninjas. As for its leaders, there are no known attempts to conceal their identities.

Noble Birth, Troubled Adulthood

The NSO under Obasanjo, quickly degenerated into a terror gang, detaining student leaders, critics and those who politically disagreed with the regime. It also established, outside the ambits of the law, a super-secret detention centre on Ita-Oko, an island surrounded by crocodile-infested waters. The island could only be accessed by boat or helicopter.

One quite commendable project of the NSO, was channeling funds and arms to the liberation movements especially in Southern Africa.

The Shagari administration inherited the NSO and deployed it against real and imagined enemies. When it had political problems with the opposition Great Nigeria Peoples' Party, GNPP, in that party's stronghold of Borno State, it deployed the NSO to abduct the GNPP House Majority Leader, Alhaji Abdurahman Shugaba Darman, declared him a foreigner and deported him. When Alhaji Zanni Bukar Mandara, a military food contractor was overheard complaining in the presence of some soldiers about the worsening economic situation in the country, the NSO seized and charged him with attempting to overthrow the administration.

The NSO was so liberally used by the Buhari-Idiagbon regime that overthrew Shagari, that the country was virtually a police state. The successor Babangida regime promised to cleanse it. Part of the cleansing ceremony was divesting it of foreign intelligence and military espionage and rechristening it on June 5, 1986 as the SSS. The body also calls itself the Department of State Services, DSS, with a motto of "Loyalty, Vigilance, Verity." But like the leopard, it remained the same. Within five months, the SSS Director General, Alhaji Ismaila Gwarzo and his deputy, Lieutenant Colonel Tunde Togun, were embroiled in the controversy on the bombing of leading journalist, Dele Giwa.

Many thought that with civil rule, the SSS/DSS would change its role to that of safeguarding the populace rather than whoever is in power. Perhaps if it had, it would have provided more intelligence gathering on the shadowy Boko Haram, the kidnappers that have made road travel in many parts of the country, a suicidal mission and bandits that have grown to armies seizing parts of the North West.

Every administration since the 1999 return to civil rule has misused the SSS in various ways including to seize newspapers and intimidate opponents. However, the situation has become far worse since the 2015 change of government to the ruling All Progressives Congress. I will pick just one incident for every year.

In 2015, the former National Security Adviser, Sambo Dasuki was charged with corruption. Three courts granted him bail but the SSS disobeyed the court orders for four years releasing him only last Tuesday. Related to that is the leader of the Islamic Movement of Nigeria, IMN, Alhaji Ibrahim El-Zakzaky with his wife, Zeenat, who the SSS has refused to release since December 2015 despite court orders.

In the night of October 8, 2016, the SSS broke down doors and gates of the homes of a number of judges across the country including those of the Supreme Court in what has turned out to be a continuous effort to cow the judiciary.

For over thirteen hours on November 21, 2017 in Abuja, the SSS teamed up with the National Intelligence Agency to square off against the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission, EFCC, aided by police operatives. The clash followed attempts by the EFCC to arrest the immediate past SSS Director General, Mr. Ita Ekpenyong and a former Director General, NIA, Ambassador Ayo Oke.

Perhaps the most infamous act of the SSS in its 41-year history was its Tuesday, August 7, 2018 invasion of the National Assembly during which its hooded agents prevented senators, honourable members, staff and journalists from accessing the Assembly, announcing that its takeover was based on orders from above.

This year, the most infamous act of the SSS was its Friday, December 6, armed invasion of the Federal High Court, Abuja premises to re-arrest journalist, Omoyele Sowore and co-accused, Olawale 'Mandate' Bakare who had been granted and fulfilled bail conditions. As it continues to experience a difficult adulthood, there are yet no indications that the SSS can be reformed to operate within the constitutional and the laws of the land.

Noble Birth, Troubled Adulthood

Load-Date: December 30, 2019

---

End of Document

Nigeria Kills Them All (For Precious Owolabi)

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

August 15, 2019 Thursday

Copyright 2019 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1021 words

Byline: Sunny Awhefeada

Body

---

Takena Tamuno's fame rested on his prodigious achievement as a pioneer historian and later as Vice Chancellor of the Universities of Ilorin and Ibadan. If a roll call of Nigerian poets were to be taken, Tamuno would not number among the bards. But he was a bard in his own right, a profoundly insightful one for that matter. Tamuno's apprehension of the Nigerian condition as expressed in his verse is prophetic and tragic. In one moment of vatic inspiration Tamuno's fecund pen dropped the following lines, "all things bright and beautiful/Nigeriakills them all".

Nigeria is enshrouded in irony as she is a beautiful ideal that has become a mirage that daily hunts her citizens. My memories of childhood reverberate with thoughts of a great country, which our marching song at IMG Practicing School, Oke-Ado, Ibadan, configured to be the best place on earth. That nostalgic song "Ilu mi Ilu mi/ Ilu Nigeria/ Odara odara/Olewa kpukpo/Kosibi ti mo lelo/Ninu ile aye/Kimo le gbagbe/Ilu Nigeria" roughly means "My country Nigeria/ Is good/ She is beautiful/There is no place I will go to in the world/That I will forget Nigeria". The Nigeria of my childhood was a romantic ideal which now approximates nostalgia, very much in contrast to today's buffettings and most undesirable phenomenon. Nigeria is no longer that good and beautiful country amplified in that madrigal. Nigeria has become an ogress that eats her own.

I do not know exactly when Tamuno wrote his tragic, but prophetic poem. However, my memory of Nigeria as a land that "kills them all" dates back to 1986. That was the year Babangida's Police killed harmless students of the Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, and the then Vice Chancellor, the un-professorial Ango Abdulahi came out to say "ONLY FOUR" students were killed. That same year, on the 19th of October, a Sunday, the remarkably brilliant investigative journalist, Dele Giwa, was bombed to death. Nigeria lost her innocence. Although, the brutal act of blood-letting had been part of our history through the coups, counter-coups and the civil war of 1967 to 1970, the entrenchment of bizarre killings crept into our polity from around 1986. The murderous dictatorship that was to evolve and dominate Nigeria up to 1998/1999 turned the nation into a sprawling Akeldama (Acts 1: 19).

When Precious Owolabi, the journalist intern with Channels television went out to do his job as a reporter on Monday 22nd July, he never knew that Nigeria would consume him the way Funke Olakurin was consumed a week and a half earlier. This piece is a threnody for the Olakurins and the Owolabis and the many other known and unknown victims of the failure of the Nigerian state. It is trite that the purpose of government is the security and welfare of the citizens, but this has stopped being the case in Nigeria. Every day lacerates our minds with stories of brutal deaths in the hands of cultists, bandits, kidnappers, terrorists and even government security agents. Our bad roads, roads made hellish by government's phenomenal incompetence have also wrought deaths. So have the hospitals and collapsing buildings. The failure of governance, the state's abdication of its responsibility to the citizens, the refusal to sanction infractions and the abysmal lack of altruism among the ruling elite constitute the multiple cogs in Nigeria's wheel. The citizens are angry, disenchanted and kicking and, the crises assailing Nigeria is a manifestation of rebellion against the State.

Nigeria Kills Them All (For Precious Owolabi)

The brutal killing of Olakurin by bandit-herdsman, the murder of Owolabi in the Shiite-Police clash, and the many other killings that now hunt us could have been avoided, but for the failure of leadership. The social situation that led to this tragic bend derives from the failure of government in every sphere. Our turn for a Pan-Nigerian Renaissance came in 1999, but self-seeking Olusegun Obasanjo squandered that golden moment. Today, Obasanjo, the main character in the picaresque that is the Nigerian story, has stolen the toga of patriotism which he now grotesquely wears as a statesman speaking truth to power. From Obasanjo to Buhari, the lot of Nigerians has been most unenviable. Horror stalks the land, hunger, poverty, disease and other indices of irredeemable failure stare us in the face and we appear so very helpless.

That Nigeria has been taken hostage is not in doubt. We are a nation under siege. The sad reality is that nobody is safe anymore and the siege which T. Y. Danjuma described as "a war without fronts" is on us all. There are villagers in some communities who now have to pay the herders in order to have access to their farms. Communities have been decimated and we are now told that the herders, bandits and terrorists are not Nigerians, but foreigners. If it is true that they are foreigners why did they see Nigeria as a destination? And why are they unleashing violence on Nigerians? Why is government unable to deal with the situation and restore normalcy? The answers to these questions rest on the fact that Nigeria has become a failed state that can neither secure her borders nor protect her citizens.

The State has also showed its hands in the killing of Nigerians through its security agents. The Police are culpable in this. Some years ago, a bullet from the murderous convoy of a state governor killed Festus Iyayi in Lokoja and the perpetrators of that deadly act got away with it. Nigerians have resigned to "it is the will of God" and those who ruin the country daily entrench their interest. We ascribe every ill that befall us to God. But this should not be. The idea of Nigeria as represented in the popular imagination and nationalistic consciousness must be reborn. That idea of Nigeria is the motif in my primary school marching song. We must reinvent Nigeria. It is a task that the people should embark upon. We must stop Nigeria from killing her people. For now, it is "oh come together, let us mourn", but we must wake up someday from this tragic sleep and remake our dear country Nigeria.

The post Nigeria Kills Them All (For Precious Owolabi) appeared first on Independent Newspapers Nigeria.

Load-Date: August 15, 2019

Why IBB Should Not Be Celebrated - By Festus Afofun

Naija 247 News

August 21, 2021 Saturday

Copyright 2021 Naija 247 news Media Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1378 words

Body

---

The ravaging calamity that befalls Nigeria as a country since colonial era is the act or re-writing history. The Nigeria ruling elites have successfully rewrote the Nigeria history by excluding themselves from the gory path of history and rebranding themselves as Liberators.

The unscrupulous act of rebranding criminals as statemens gets me infuriated. Ibrahim Babangida 80th years birthday anniversary brought many fake achievements, hailings and wrong history about the former head of state and his roles in Nigeria Democracy.

Prominent person's, academicians and influencers in Nigeria are trying to rewrite the gory details of Ibrahim Babangida widely known as Maradonna.

IBB as mostly called is a well-known coupist and enemy of democracy in Nigeria. He was born in August 17, 1941. IBB was a military dictator who ruled Nigeria from 1985 when he staged a palace coup that ousted General Muhammadu Buhari regime. IBB oversaw the brutal assassination of Dele Giwa a veteran investigative journalist who expose the criminalities of IBB and his cronies. Aside from annulment of June 12 election, massacres of dissent voices and enormous corruption committed by Ibrahim Babangida what other things do you know about him?

Read five revelations I consciously expose out of numerous crimes against humanity committed by the cheaply celebrated paralyzed elder statesman Ibrahim Babangida.

1. Restrictions of Freedom of expression and press: Babangida crippled freedom of press and expression as various journalists, media houses, critics and civil societies suffered from his inhumane dictatorial 6years regime.

Three newspapers in Lagos owned by John West Publications were shut down in March, 1991 for thirteen days for what was described as 'embarrassing publications' against the corrupt Military head of state IBB and his wife, relating to the Jennifer Madike case.

Also William Keeling, a correspondent for the British daily Financial Times, was expelled from Nigeria and declared persona non grata after he wrote an article that exposed the Babangida government of not reporting about half of the extra five billion dollars that it was estimated to have earned from higher oil prices during the Gulf war.

Many media houses were shut down and scores of journalists were imprisoned without charges. The press bitterly suffered from the claws of Babangida's oppression.

Why IBB Should Not Be Celebrated - By Festus Afofun

2. Abortion of Democracy: Babangida was the Chief of Army Staff who annulled the June 12, 1993 election which happens to be the most free and fairest election in the history of Nigeria. The unofficial result of the election though not declared by the National Electoral Commission (NEC) but indicated a victory for Moshood Kashimawo Olawale Abiola of the Social Democratic Party (SDP), who defeated Bashir Tofa of the National Republican Convention (NRC). Babangida purportedly annulled the June 12 election after he discovered that Abiola won the election despite all machineries he put in place to truncate the electoral process.

The hidden reason why the archenemy of democracy General Maradonna failed the Nigeria people was that Abiola's campaign focused on economic issues, as he was a vocal critic of the government's structural adjustment program (SAP) which the Babangida government had commenced the SAP in 1986, and following prescriptions of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, he imposed austerity measures to ensure fiscal discipline by the state.

To interest you Tofa the government sponsored presidential candidate, support the SAP as he harmered the point that he will focus on the effective implementation of existing economy policies when he assume power.

Note that Babangida have closer ties with Tofa as he had once suggested Babangida remain president till 2000.

The evil genius annul the June 12, election because of his nepotic, tribalistic, selfish and bourgeois interest.

[b]3. Brutal clampdown on civil rights advocates: [/b]He jailed hundreds of activists and democrats who demanded for respect of human right and democratic government. He was so tyrannical and brutal that he admitted to a news magazine that his favorite alias was the 'Evil Genius'.

Sometimes in November 1991, the passport of human rights attorney Gani Fawehinmi was seized when he was on his way to London for medical treatment. No official reason was given for the action.

Human rights attorney Alao Aka-Bashorun's passport, which was seized in 1990, has not yet been returned.

Popular public interest advocate Femi Falana was harassed on numerous occasions, apparently because of his role as defense counsel for Jennifer Madike, whose case was a headache for IBB tyrannical rule. Femi falana was arrested on May 12 1991, when security agents asked to see documents used in the defense of his client.

The activist passport was also seized in October 1991, when he was at the airport trying to leave the country to attend a meeting of non-governmental human rights organizations from the Commonwealth countries. The meeting had been called to lobby the 1991 Commonwealth Heads of Government Conference, which was being held in Zimbabwe. He was questioned over the next two days about the Madike case and accused of being insufficiently patriotic because of his opposition to the government-sponsored candidacies of Nigerians to fill prestigious positions in the international arena.

Fela Anikulapo-Kuti was also jailed for years because he criticized the Maryam husband doctoral regime.

Babangida Maradonna also locked up pro-democracy activists in prison like Omoyele Sowore, Sheu Sanni and many others who led protests to demand for democracy in Nigeria.

4. Killings of students: Under Babangida rule Thousands of students were massacred across various Nigeria universities especially Zaria based on the order of the military dictator Ibrahim Babangida. IBB military governments' hostility to academic pursuits crippled universities throughout the country as academic operations were stopped.

In 1991, students were the targets of a Maradonna siege, The government cracked down on student's union and it's leaders in May as response to an ultimatum issued by the National Association of Nigerian Students which the government later banned.

Why IBB Should Not Be Celebrated - By Festus Afofun

Babangida arrested and jailed over 500 students ranging from Lagos State University (LASU), Obafemi Awolowo University (OAU), Ahmadu Bello University Zaria and other various institutions who protested against the government maladministration of educational system.

5. Corruption: Babangida was corrupt as Goodluck Jonathan former Nigeria president. IBB regime constitutionalized corruption even that his government of 8years regime does have time to fight corruption. His government finds pleasure in looting the national treasury to enrich himself, friends and families.

Ibrahim Babangida administration was unable to give an account of the Gulf War windfall, which has been estimated to be $12.4 billion.

According to wikipedia.com, General Ibrahim Babangida's tenure, corruption became a policy of the state that he routinely disbursed vehicles and cash gifts to people to earn loyalty, and the discipline of the military force eroded.'

The term 'IBB Boys' emerged, meaning fronts for the head of state in the business realm, someone who usually transact dirty deals from drug dealing to money laundering and all sorts of corrupt deals.

Babangida covetously enriched himself through banking, oil and import licenses as he used these favors to raise huge cash for himself and his allies.

As of today, IBB is regarded as the most richest past head of state in Nigeria due to his magnificent Mansion in Minna, Niger state and significant investment in Globacom one of the largest telecom operators in Nigeria.

I penned this piece down for this and next generation to know that Ibrahim Babangida IBB is shrunk that cannot be deodorized. He looted national treasury, closed down universities for several months, he murdered his opponents, jailed journalists, closed down several newspapers and used various government privatization initiatives to reward friends and cronies, which eventually gave rise to the current class of nouveau riche in Nigeria. Babangida is a thief that should be living in jail by now if only Nigeria is been led by good people not past criminals.

Load-Date: August 23, 2021

---

End of Document

The journalist, still an endangered species

The Sun (Nigeria)

October 29, 2019 Tuesday

Copyright 2019 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1285 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Ayo Oyoze Baje "Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again; The eternal years of God are hers; But Error, wounded, writhes with pain, And dies among his worshippers"

- William Bryant Truth is their first target. The next is the truth teller. The perpetrators of pure evil would go to great lengths to [...]

The post The journalist, still an endangered species appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Ayo Oyoze Baje

"Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again; The eternal years of God are hers;

But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,

And dies among his worshippers"

- William Bryant

Truth is their first target. The next is the truth teller. The perpetrators of pure evil would go to great lengths to deploy all imaginable machinations, in a bid to arm twist, cover up or out rightly drown the truth in the vast ocean of grand deceit. But Truth is eternal, incontrovertible, beyond the devious manipulations of any mortal. If only the power monger, be he a tyrant, dictator or some desperado democrat knows. But he does not!

The journalist, still an endangered species

So, emboldened by the devilish desire to maintain a semblance of innocence, after some hideous crimes must have been committed, he strikes. And not a few patriotic journalists have fallen easy preys to their antics. In the line of duty, to their nation and mankind, some journalists have become the voiceless victims to this set of people, drunk on the heady intoxicant called political power. Some have been beheaded by ISIS. Others languish in Syrian jails. Indeed, some have had their skulls broken, their faces lacerated and their limbs decapitated. Records abound of those brutally raped or bruised and battered to a state of coma. In fact, some victims still lucky to be alive have gory tales to tell. In this group are journalists suffering the trauma of persisting high blood pressure, lingering muscle pains, excruciating back ache and mind-bending insomnia.

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), noted in 2017 that at least 2,297 journalists have been killed since 1990. Amongst the deadliest countries listed in the statistics since 1992 are Iraq (184), Syria (111), the Philippines (78), Russia (58), Colombia (47) and India (41). On its part, the International Federation of Journalists (IFJ) has recorded related deaths in targeted assassinations, cross fire incidents and bomb attacks, including 112 who lost their lives to violence in 2015, 93 who were killed in 2016 and 25 so far murdered in 2017. Sectorially, those covering politics took the highest figures at 48 per cent, followed by war (38%), human rights, (21%), corruption (20%) and crime (15%). Though the number is lower than previous years, the IFJ has warned against complacency and continued impunity. But why, you may ask? Justice has been served for only four percent of journalists killed worldwide!

But before you breathe easy, delighted that Nigeria is not amongst the deadliest countries so listed, think again. According to the media advocacy organization CPJ, "Nigeria and Somalia are among the worst nations in the world in combating deadly anti-press violence, our 2013 Impunity Index has found. Five journalists have been killed with impunity in Nigeria since 2009. However, 13 Nigerian journalists were killed in 2012 alone in active service, making it the highest in the history of the country since independence in 1960".

Dear reader, what you have just read was my focus on the travails of journalists written back in 2017. That was then, but this is now. Only a few days ago concerned Nigerians condemned an alleged plot by security operatives to arrest investigative journalist, Fisayo Soyombo. But why?

The former editor of The Cable and a contributor to Al Jazeera, in his undercover stories exposed corruption in Nigerian police cells and prisons. He detailed how policemen "pervert the course of justice in their quest for ill-gotten money". In the second part published by The Cable, he exposed "how the courts shortchange the law and (how) the prisons are themselves a cesspool of the exact reasons for which they hold inmates." The final part of the report is yet to be published.

Before him, precisely on August 30, federal authorities in Cross River state charged Agba Jalingo, the publisher of the privately owned news website CrossRiverWatch, with disturbance of public peace and treason for his writings and social media posts about Cross River Governor, Benedict Ayade, according to CPJ and Attah Ochinke, the journalist's lawyer.

If found guilty, Jalingo could face up to three years in prison for the disturbance charge and up to life in prison for treason, according to the Nigerian criminal code. In a similar vein, a report by Jonathan Rozen/CPJ Africa Research Associate on April 15, 2019 stated that: "Under Buhari's first elected term, CPJ documented detentions, assaults, and harassment of the press.

In one particularly grave case, Jones Abiri, editor of the Weekly Source, was detained without charge in 2016 and denied contact with his family or a lawyer, for over two years. Also," before the February general election, authorities continued to harass the press: Premium Times reporter Samuel Ogundipe was detained and prosecuted for refusing to reveal a source; Buhari stated publicly that "rule of law must be subject to the supremacy of the nation's security and national interest" and the military raided two Daily Trust offices".

But let us note that Buhari is not the first Nigerian president so accused of hounding journalists. We recall, with deep pains, the brutal murder of the two Nigerian journalists, Tayo Awotunsi and Krees Imobibie, who disappeared in August, 1991 in Monrovia, Liberia's capital, while reporting on the civil war. Also, more than thirty years after, patriots still agonize over the cruel and callous killing of Dele Giwa, the pioneer Managing Editor of Newswatch Magazine through a letter bomb on 19th October 1986 during the IBB era.

The journalist, still an endangered species

That of Bayo Ohu, a reporter with the Guardian Newspapers on September 20,2009 and Channels Television reporter, Enenche Akogwu shot on January 20, 2012 in Kano still remain as scary scars on the conscience of the nation. Are we done?

Not just yet! The operatives of the EFCC unleashed mayhem on workers at the Sun Newspapers as reported on September 21, 2017. A statement from the paper stated that: "For one grueling hour, EFCC operatives subjected our staff to crude intimidation, psychological and emotional trauma.

The development had more to do with suffocating free press in Nigeria than law enforcement." In a similar vein, a score of soldiers on Operation Python Dance against members of the Indigenous People of Biafra, IPOB, stormed into the Nigerian Union of Journalists Press Centre in Umahia on 12 September, 2017. Some journalists were beaten up, with the seizure and smashing of their cameras , smart-phones, computers and other equipment containing newly-shot photos and videos.

Truth be told, we do not want to go back to the dark days of military dictatorship when seasoned journalists including the likes of Kunle Ajibade, Chris Anyanwu, Ben Charles-Obi, George M'bah, Onome Osifo-Whiskey and Babafemi Ojudu saw hell in Sani Abacha gulag.

The way forward is for journalists to be insured as being championed by the Nigerian Union of Journalists, NUJ. They should be trained in the areas of the laws of journalism, job security, journey management and how to ensure their mental health. Safety training for them should have in attendance their employers, to drive home the message of protection of their lives and provision of enabling environment to thrive.

Baje writes from Lagos

The post The journalist, still an endangered species appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: November 28, 2019

---

End of Document

Osinachi: Questions begging for answers -2

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

April 28, 2022 Thursday

Copyright 2022 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1499 words

Body

---

I do not think it is the wish or will of God for anyone to tarry a minute longer than necessary in an abusive or life-threatening marriage or relationship but His admonition to us is to flee from every appearance of evil (1 Thessalonians 5:22).

According to one philosopher, death is the greatest evil from which everyone recoils (Summum malum) as opposed to the highest good (summum bonum) to which everyone aspires. God said in Jeremiah 29:11: For I know the thoughts that I think towards you, says the Lord, thoughts of peace and not of evil, to give you an expected end" No one sets for himself or herself the expected end of being battered or clobbered to death in marriage. Again in 3 John 2 God says: Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth".

Of course justice will be served if anyone tarries longer than necessary and ends up getting caught up in the fiery vortex of domestic violence; if not by man then by God and if not now, then certainly later; as the celebrated but assassinated journalist, Dele Giwa, posited. Was justice not served in each of the cases of Abel (killed by his brother Cain), Uriah (killed through the machinations of King David), and Naboth (killed through the conspiracy and manipulations of King Ahab and his wife, the wicked Queen Jezebel)?

But what did it profit the avenged if not that each of these cases has been divinely ordained as object lessons for you and me? Scriptures, I dare to say, are there for us to apply to our own life here on earth. I do not think anyone will need the bible in heaven or hell!

As stated in Part 1 of this piece last week, the perfect will of God for man is that a man would find the bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh (Genesis 2:23) as the perfect help meet that God in His infinite wisdom decided that the man requires (verse 18) and the two shall abandon all else, including father and mother, and become one flesh (verse 24).

This is one very strong argument advanced not just against divorce but also against polygamy by some Christian preachers. Can a man cleave to more than one woman? How many women or wives did God make out of the rib He took out of the side of man? There is no denying the fact that God established His perfect will for man in the Garden of Eden. Unfortunately, the ENTIRETY of God's perfect will for man was subverted right there in the same Garden of Eden; as a result of which God drove Man out of the Garden and withdrew all the privileges man had hitherto enjoyed. It will therefore be wrong for anyone to say that man still operates in the perfect will of God; he does not! God's established state of blissful marital life (verse 25) was lost right there in the Garden of Eden. Henceforth, man (and woman) shall struggle not only in marital life but in all other spheres of life.

Osinachi: Questions begging for answers -2

That is the essence of the curses pronounced by God (Genesis 3: 14-19). Mercifully; God gave man a second chance: He sent His Son Jesus to die for us! But as our people would say, the scar will never, ever look like the normal skin! I shall discuss the mortal dangers of "one-man, one-wife" to the Church at a later date.

No man should play holier-than-thou! If you allow anyone to do that to you, it is your fault! God who created man repented that He did (Genesis 6:6) but decided all the same to make do with whatever is left of His perfect creation (Genesis 1:31) now corrupted (Genesis 6:3). Hence the bible is littered with God's admonitions, pieces of advice, corrections, and warnings unto man, including even punishment - all directed at reminding him of his past, his present and the future.

One such admonition is to be found in the oft-quoted but wrongly interpreted Malachi 2. Verses 14 & 15 warn men not to deal treacherously with the wife of their youth. This is the "putting away" or divorce that God hates: "For the Lord, the God of Israel, saith that he hated putting away: for one covereth violence with his garment, saith the Lord of hosts: therefore take heed to your spirit, that ye deal not treacherously". God was talking more specifically to the man than to the woman. The practice must have been prevalent in those days, as it is now, that men, when they have become wealthy or fulfilled, when their social status is upswing, they suddenly realise they need a more beautiful, more educated, more socially savvy, and more "lepa" wife to fit into their new social status.

The wife of their youth, probably after a few children and years of child-bearing, the woman who suffered with them, who stood by them through thick and thin, no longer possesses the magical "figure-eight" or has become too old for comfort and a younger, fresher damsel is thus needed to take her place. God says: Do not put her away! That was the "putting away" that God hates; not a woman fleeing the evil of an abusive or life-threatening marriage. God did not condemn women to "stay put" in an abusive or life-threatening marriage.

Now, one other statement preachers have relied upon to cage women especially and forbid anyone, male or female, from fleeing death is the marital vow: "I take you to be my husband/wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death do us part, according to God's holy law"!

To start with, this statement is not in the bible. It is not from God but is the coinage of men like you and me - and for purposes and reasons we must not shy away from interrogating! Even if the original coiners of that statement meant well, events have since proven that it has become not only anachronistic but also destructive of the very purpose it was meant to serve.

It should thus be jettisoned and expunged from whatever marital vows anyone is asked to say these days. At the very least, it should be seriously edited! I stand to be corrected that the "death" referred to in the marital vows of "till death do us part" cannot be death in the hands of murderous husbands or wives but natural death, which is a debt we all must pay as God commanded after the fall of man in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:19).

In "The Good Book Blog" of the Talbot School of Theology Blog, John Hutchison had this to say: "What a commitment we make in that moment of time (when we recite the marital vows), with 'God and these witnesses' listening! Are these just empty words of tradition or do they represent a genuine promise of commitment?

The longevity and quality of your marriage depends upon it!" But many who recite the vows understand them only as necessary "rites of passage" and do so absent-mindedly. They tag along, eager to get done with it and be gone for their honeymoon! From what we now know, these marital vows are like someone signing his or her death warrant if one ends up in a bad marriage.

Osinachi: Questions begging for answers -2

But marriage is not soldering where men and women sign to die - most times, needless death determined by others who will be nowhere near the battlefield! Marital vows are said to become famous through its presence in the marriage service of the Book of Common Prayer (1549), where bride and bridegroom each must pledge to stand by the other "for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness or in health." This expression was derived from the still older Sarum Manual.

Two other bible passages that preachers quote to turn a blind eye to or sanction marriage turned into slave camp or torture/horror chambers are Genesis 2:24: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" and Matthew 19:6. "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder" So, preachers run away from consenting to divorce, thinking that if they do, they will be running counter to God's commandment.

I dare to say that this interpretation or understanding is erroneous and misleading. Quoting Moses as we did last week, the one who puts a marriage asunder is the one whose "hardness of heart" makes continuous marital relationship untenable. Quoting Jesus, it is the one who engages in adultery that drives a dagger into the heart of marriage.

Quoting Apostle Paul, it is the one who bolts away from his/her marital home and responsibilities (1Timothy 5:8) that puts asunder what God joined together. Pastors, parents, friends, the society, etc. should stop nudging couples to continue in life-threatening marriages. So, stop feeling guilty: It is not pastors dissolving failed marriages to save lives and destinies that put asunder!

It is not for fun that Proverbs 4:7 says "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding" Hosea 4:6 adds: "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge&hellip;" So, then, if you fail to get wisdom, that is your fault. If you neglect to equip yourself with knowledge, you have yourself to blame. The ball, then, is in your court! NOW CONCLUDED!

By Bola Bolawole

turnpot@gmail.com 0807 552 5533

Load-Date: April 28, 2022

---

End of Document

Former Nigerian dictator seeks to block possible probe into journalist's slaying

Former Nigerian dictator seeks to block possible probe into journalist's slaying

Associated Press International

June 4, 2002 Tuesday

Copyright 2002 Associated Press All Rights Reserved

Section: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Length: 336 words

Byline: GILBERT DA COSTA; Associated Press Writer

Dateline: ABUJA, Nigeria

Body

---

One of Nigeria's former junta leaders is seeking to block further investigation of the 1986 assassination of a magazine editor, recommended by a judicial panel that probed abuses committed under military rule.

Gen. Ibrahim Babangida, who headed a brutal and corrupt 1985-93 junta, on Monday filed a federal court application to prevent implementation of recommendations related to him that were submitted to the government by the panel.

In its final report, the Human Rights Violation Investigation Commission asked police to reopen a probe into the death of Dele Giwa, editor of the Lagos-based Newswatch magazine. Giwa, who was highly critical of Babangida's government, was killed by a parcel bomb at his home.

The panel wants Babangida and his security chief, Gen. Haliru Akilu, "held accountable" for Giwa's killing, commission spokesman Mohammed Sharrif said.

Babangida denies any involvement in the killing, and a police investigation at the time of Giwa's death was inconclusive.

Babangida and Akilu ignored repeated summons to testify before the panel.

Babangida's attorney, Yahaya Mahmood, called the panel's actions a "well-orchestrated attempt by (President Olusegun) Obasanjo to humiliate northern former military rulers."

Sharrif said Babangida's legal challenge was premature, as the commission's recommendations have yet to be adopted by the government.

"This is a democracy, and anyone who feels he has been unjustly treated by the commission is free to pursue a legal action," Sharrif said.

Former Nigerian dictator seeks to block possible probe into journalist's slaying

"What I'm saying is that even though we had recommended the reopening of some issues, including the murder of Dele Giwa, the federal government may not necessarily adopt it."

The panel, which exposed military-sponsored corruption, torture and killings between 1966 and 1999, wrapped up two years of investigations in October and submitted a final report to Obasanjo last week.

Obasanjo's election in 1999 ended 15 years of military dictatorship, but the army still wields enormous influence in the West African country.

Load-Date: June 5, 2002

---

End of Document

The Journalist, Still An Endangered Specie!

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

October 26, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1229 words

Byline: Ayo Baje

Body

---

"Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again;

The eternal years of God are hers;

But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,

And dies among his worshippers"

-William Bryant

T

ruth is their first target. The next is the truth teller. The perpetrators of pure evil would go to great lengths to deploy all imaginable machinations, in a bid to arm twist, cover up or out rightly drown the truth in the vast ocean of grand deceit. But Truth is eternal, incontrovertible, beyond the devious manipulations of any mortal. If only the power monger, be he a tyrant, dictator or some desperado democrat knows. But he does not!

So, emboldened by the devilish desire to maintain a semblance of innocence, after some hideous crimes must have been committed, he strikes. And not a few patriotic journalists have fallen easy preys to their antics.

In the line of duty, to their nation and mankind, some journalists have become the voiceless victims to this set of people, drunk on the heady intoxicant called political power. Some have been beheaded by ISIS. Others languish in Syrian jails. Indeed, some have had their skulls broken, their faces lacerated and their limbs decapitated. Records abound of those brutally raped or bruised and battered to a state of coma. In fact, some victims still lucky to be alive have gory tales to tell. In this group are journalists suffering the trauma of persisting high blood pressure, lingering muscle pains, excruciating back ache and mind-bending insomnia.

Loading...

The Journalist, Still An Endangered Species!

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), noted in 2017 that at least 2,297 journalists have been killed since 1990. Amongst the deadliest countries listed in the statistics since 1992 are Iraq (184), Syria (111), the Philippines (78), Russia (58), Colombia (47) and India (41).

On its part, the International Federation of Journalists (IFJ) has recorded related deaths in targeted assassinations, cross fire incidents and bomb attacks, including 112 who lost their lives to violence in 2015, 93 who were killed in 2016 and 25 so far murdered in 2017. Sectorally, those covering politics took the highest figures at 48 per cent, followed by war (38%), human rights, (21%), corruption (20%) and crime (15%). Though the number is lower than previous years, the IFJ has warned against complacency and continued impunity. But why, you may ask? Justice has been served for only four percent of journalists killed worldwide!

But before you breathe easy, delighted that Nigeria is not amongst the deadliest countries so listed, think again. According to the media advocacy organisation CPJ, "Nigeria and Somalia are among the worst nations in the world in combating deadly anti-press violence, our 2013 Impunity Index has found. Five journalists have been killed with impunity in Nigeria since 2009. However, 13 Nigerian journalists were killed in 2012 alone in active service, making it the highest in the history of the country since independence in 1960".

Dear reader, what you have just read was my focus on the travails of journalists written back in 2017. That was then, but this is now. Only a few days ago concerned Nigerians condemned an alleged plot by security operatives to arrest investigative journalist, Fisayo Soyombo. But why?

The former editor of The Cable and a contributor to Al Jazeera, in his undercover stories exposed corruption in Nigerian police cells and prisons. He detailed how policemen "pervert the course of justice in their quest for ill-gotten money". In the second part published by The Cable, he exposed "how the courts shortchange the law and (how) the prisons are themselves a cesspool of the exact reasons for which they hold inmates." The final part of the report is yet to be published.

Before him, precisely on August 30, federal authorities in Cross River state charged Agba Jalingo, the publisher of the privately owned news website CrossRiverWatch, with disturbance of public peace and treason for his writings and social media posts about Cross River Governor, Benedict Ayade, according to CPJ and Attah Ochinke, the journalist's lawyer.

If found guilty, Jalingo could face up to three years in prison for the disturbance charge and up to life in prison for treason, according to the Nigerian criminal code.

In a similar vein, a report by Jonathan Rozen/CPJ Africa Research Associate on April 15, 2019 stated that: "Under Buhari's first elected term, CPJ documented detentions, assaults, and harassment of the press. In one particularly grave case, Jones Abiri, editor of the Weekly Source, was detained without charge in 2016 and denied contact with his family or a lawyer, for over two years.

But let us note that Buhari is not the first Nigerian president so accused of hounding journalists. We recall, with deep pains, the brutal murder of the two Nigerian journalists, Tayo Awotunsin and Krees Imobibie, who disappeared in August, 1991 in Monrovia, Liberia's capital, while reporting on the civil war. Also, more than thirty years after, patriots still agonize over the cruel and callous killing of Dele Giwa, the pioneer Managing Editor of Newswatch Magazine through a letter bomb on 19th October 1986 during the IBB era.

That of Bayo Ohu, a reporter with the Guardian Newspapers, on September 20, 2009 and Channels Television reporter, Enenche Akogwu shot on January 20, 2012 in Kano still remain as scary scars on the conscience of the nation. Are we done?

Not just yet! The operatives of the EFCC unleashed mayhem on workers at the Sun Newspapers as reported on September 21, 2017. A statement from the paper stated that: "For one grueling hour, EFCC operatives subjected our staff to crude intimidation, psychological and emotional trauma. The development had more to do with suffocating free press in Nigeria than law enforcement."

The Journalist, Still An Endangered Species!

In a similar vein, a score of soldiers on Operation Python Dance against members of the Indigenous People of Biafra, IPOB, stormed into the Nigerian Union of Journalists Press Centre in Umahia on 12 September, 2017. Some journalists were beaten up, with the seizure and smashing of their cameras, smart-phones, computers and other equipment containing newly-shot photos and videos.

Truth be told, we do not want to go back to the dark days of military dictatorship when seasoned journalists including the likes of Kunle Ajibade, Chris Anyanwu, Ben Charles-Obi, George M'bah, Onome Osifo-Whiskey and Babafemi Ojudu saw hell in Sani Abacha gulag.

The way forward is for journalists to be insured as being championed by the Nigerian Union of Journalists, NUJ. They should be trained in the areas of the laws of journalism, job security, journey management and how to ensure their mental health. Safety training for them should have in attendance their employers, to drive home the message of protection of their lives and provision of enabling environment to thrive.

Our political leaders should note that Freedom of Expression is clearly stated, specifically in Section 39 (1) and (2) of the 1999 constitution (as amended). It is in sync with the fundamental human right, enshrined in Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Leaders are mortals and vulnerable to making mistakes. They should therefore, note that if we must strengthen and sustain our democratic values, Truth should be their guiding credo. For, only a true friend would tell you the truth at the risk of losing your friendship.

Loading...

Load-Date: October 27, 2019

---

End of Document

The editors' editor

The Nation (Nigeria)

September 25, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1956 words

Body

---

I have had cause to celebrate The Punch at every of its major landmark ceremonies, including its 25th anniversary as well as during the opening of its magnificent headquarters, The Punch Place, sitting majestically and conspicuously at Magboro, Ogun State, on the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway. I know why.

But today, I want to join others in celebrating a man whose editorship of the popular tabloid would for long be remembered, especially by those of us who had cause to cross his path at The Punch. A man that many journalists regard as a thoroughbred, with a nose for news and a specialist in headline casting. I am talking about Alhaji Najeem Akanni Jimoh, who turned 70 on September 14.

It would be sheer ingratitude for someone like myself who was able to secure a job at The Punch in 1985 despite the fact that I did not know anybody there. I would explain. At the time, unemployment had started to rear its ugly head in the country; just that never in our wildest imaginations could we ever have thought it would become a monster that it has become today. No thanks to the curse of bad leadership.

I looked forward to what I can call the D-Day when I received the letter of interview. I remembered how the joy in our hearts knew no bounds when myself and a friend, Olumide Awogbemila, received the letters, with the intimidating logo of The Punch. It was a privilege. Awogbemila and I were then living at Ebute-Metta area of Lagos, indeed just about seven minutes trekking distance apart.

At last, the day of interview came. But what we were confronted with at The Punch was not just an interview; it was an examination. We arrived the company early in the morning and were there till late in the evening. Despite the irregular payment of salaries that hallmark the paper then, (I think) about 44 of us sat for the examination. I remember this because I know that those who did not succeed were asked to leave in batches of 10. Whenever the harbinger of what passed for both good and bad news then, Jide Kutelu, of blessed memory came to announce the result, our adrenalin naturally rose. It was good news for those of us who were able to make it finally but bad news for those who were dropped at every turn. That was the way it was on the three or four occasions that Kutelu came with the news.

The editors' editor

At the end of it all, only four of us were left in the room - Awogbemila, Ganiyu Aminu, Ganiyu Akogun and my humble self. We were all course mates at the Department of Mass Communication, University of Lagos (UNILAG). They then congratulated us and we congratulated ourselves. Now, why this long story when this piece is to eulogise Jimoh on his 70th birthday?

The answer is simple. I had the opportunity of knowing Jimoh because of his resolve and that of the other senior journalists who decided our fate in the examination to prioritise merit. He was then deputy editor of The Punch. But then, he had tremendous influence, especially as the then editor, Nurudeen Alade Balogun (Uncle NAT, for short), of blessed memory, was a liberal editor who allowed him such latitude. I remember the anxiety of those of us who knew nobody in the system when some of our colleagues that came for the examination went into the offices of these senior colleagues and emerged with either bottles of soft drink or table water. I remember how we wondered aloud that these people needed not have wasted our time by inviting us for interview when they already had their preferred candidates. But I was somewhat confident of making it even if I did not know what informed my confidence. One of the questions I answered was to critique Decree Four promulgated by the Babangida government in 1984. I tore the decree into shreds, using the then Dr Olatunji Dare's write-up on it in The Guardian as compass.

But if I was so sure of what I wrote, how would I have known that others did not do better? However, it eventually turned out that the four of us who were taken knew nobody at The Punch then.

This passes for something in a country where who you know determine what you get. And it partly explains why Nigeria is the way it is today. If The Punch is soaring, this is one of the secrets. It was this level-playing field that afforded me the opportunity of meeting Jimoh. And I cherish it a lot. I have never had any cause to regret the chance meeting.

Let me quickly say that the fact that some of our colleagues could not join the company at that time did not confer any special brilliance to those of us who were picked. Examination, as we know, is not always a true test of one's ability. As a matter of fact, some of them joined the newspaper later as the demand for more hands presented itself. Indeed, many of them too are doing well in their various endeavours today.

I must particularly be grateful to Jimoh for this wonderful opportunity because the 'eaglet' journalist that he employed as a sub-editor in 1985 eventually rose to become editor of the daily title of the newspaper, a lifelong ambition. He was in a position to influence decision otherwise. But he did not.

Working under Jimoh was exciting. Some other persons who passed through his tutelage, whether at The Punch or elsewhere - Lawal Ogienagbon, Reuben Abati, Azubuike Ishiekwene, Tunde Akanni, Mikail Adegoke Mumuni, Feyi Smith, and even a senior colleague, Tola Adeniyi, have all celebrated this easy going editor of all times, to mark his joining the septuagenarian club.

Working under the one that we all refer to simply as 'Alhaji' presented many fond memories. Many have talked about his humility, they have talked about his humanity, his dedication to journalism and to the people, his simplicity and other attributes.

As Lawal mentioned in his piece on September 14, those of us who worked in The Punch at the time we did can never forget '90 - 10'. So, what is '90 - 10'? It simply refers to the guguru and epa that was our regular snack in those days. As a matter of fact, hardly could any day pass without some of us placing orders for '90 - 10'; that is 90 kobo groundnuts and 10 kobo local popcorn. Yes, you heard me right, 90 KOTO groundnuts and 10 KOTO guguru! Today, our younger ones do not know that we once talked of our currency in terms of Naira and Kobo. Many do not even know what the kobo looked like because it has become extinct. Again, no thanks to bad governance. Whoever bought the '90 - 10' would place it on the table and anyone interested needed no special invitation to come to partake. It was a rallying factor of sort. Even as editor, Jimoh himself would join in not only packing The Punch ('Pack a Punch' was once upon a time the popular slogan of the paper) but also the '90 - 10! We ate it like a family. But what I cannot still explain is whether we were fond of the guguru and epa because of the peculiar financial predicament of the company at the time or because of our natural love for it. I guess however that the story would have changed by now not just because of the company's prosperity but also because of values that have changed in the country generally.

The editors' editor

Another incident I would not forget easily at The Punch was the day the four of us that were employed the same day decided to go on strike in protest against the delay in paying our salaries. We were all on the sub-desk, so, we did not have problems of logistics in executing the strike. We kept the plan close to our chests. On the appointed date, we edited the stories as they came, and pretended as if we were sending them down for further processing; so, it was difficult for anyone to suspect that we had something up our sleeves. It was very late in the day that it was realised we were not sending the stories to the compugraphic department (which was the computer of the time) for processing. To show how outdated compugraphic machines have now become, even my i-pad does not know 'compugraphic' as it kept on underlining it! I doubt if there is any newspaper that is still using compugraphic machine in the country today.

However, when it dawned on all that we were on work-to-rule, we were invited for talks. I remember the role Jimoh played. I think he had become editor then. How he tried to calm our frayed nerves, the sweet talks and all. But we had said nothing was going to change if our salaries were not paid and we stuck to our guns. Eventually, the accounts people were instructed to pay us and they brought our salaries in the usual brown envelopes for paying salaries in those days. Just the four of us.

At this point, it is necessary to explain our resolve to down tools because it is not all the time that such an opportunity presents itself. Of course we knew the company was in arrears of salaries before we joined. So, non-payment of salaries should not be sufficient cause to down tools. And we had been coping until then, anyway. Moreover, the four of us were still bachelors then, and so our needs were still relatively few.

But, we were blind to the leakages that were going on in the company when we were outside. However, now, as insiders, we were privileged to see some of the reasons things were tight for the company. We were later proved right. But, as usual with journalists, we hardly bothered about other things beyond headlines and deadlines.

I did not know whether our type of 'strike' had happened in the company before, but what I know was that some of our colleagues wondered what informed our audacity.

Perhaps more confounding was the fact that whatever some people (including the four of us who went on strike) thought would follow, never followed. This was due to the magnanimity of someone like Jimoh. Apparently his activism in his university days played a critical role in considering more the values that we were adding to the company at such hard times rather than the fresh-from-school radicalism that propelled our strike. Some editors in his shoes would have orchestrated our exit from the system before we 'polluted' others, whether immediately or in the near future. Although a newspaper like The Punch which rode to prominence on the crest of its clamour for a better society ought not have done such, that would have amounted to nothing in the eyes of editors who would be more anxious in pointing at the specks in the eyes of others, even when they have logs in theirs.

It is important to stress that the sky was the limit for journalists who worked under Jimoh. There was the latitude to explore and showcase your talent. If I cast good headlines today, Jimoh was involved in shaping me in this regard. No matter how knotty a headline appeared to be, he would crack the nut. Many of the stories which made the paper to fly in its days as a pure tabloid were headlined by Jimoh, some of which incurred the wrath of the then military rulers. One such headline that readily comes into mind was 'Dele Giwa bombed', when the frontline journalist, who was editor and founder of the then vibrant Newswatch Magazine was killed by a parcel bomb on October 19, 1986. That was what happened but the Federal Government was uncomfortable with the headline and the paper's courageous handling of the story. It therefore sued The Punch and the Late Chief Gani Fawehinmi for sedition (whatever is so called). One can go on and on.

All said, if both Christians and Muslims are celebrating Jimoh, it is for a reason. He is at home with everybody, irrespective of creed. He builds bridges across all divides. He has a way of keeping in touch with his friends. That is why till date, he is hardly alone. When he snaps his fingers, people respond. Such is his simplicity that even when he turned 70, he did not make noise. If Jimoh were a politician, the noise that would have attended his birthday on September 14 would still be reverberating.

Load-Date: September 26, 2022

---

End of Document

Tony Momoh: Each Man, His Time

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

February 4, 2021 Thursday

Copyright 2021 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1503 words

Byline: Temidayo Akinsuyi

Body

---

Prince Tony Momoh

LAGOS – The book, Each Man, His Time, subtitled, The Biography of an Era; was one of the numerous books written by the late elderstatesman and former Minister of Information and Culture, Prince Tony Momoh, the Yerima of Auchi kingdom who died on Monday February 1 at the age of 81.

Although the book is the chronicle of the life and times of Momoh Oshioigbele Idoah who was the Momoh the First of Auchi Kingdom (Tony Momoh's father), it basically admonishes readers that God has created each man for a purpose and it is best to make judicious use of the time allocated by God to each man to use on the planet.

Anyone who came in close contact with the late Momoh will testify to the fact that he had his time and he maximized it judiciously. Born on April 27 1939, Momoh who was looking forward to celebrating his 82 birthday few weeks away left an indelible marks in the sands of time and this was attested to by the flurry of tributes from eminent Nigerians who mourned his passage.

ABUJA DOCTOR REVEALS HOW MOST NIGERIA MEN ARE NOW OVERCOMING TERRIBLE BEDROOM PERFORMANCE DUE TO THIS BRILLIANT DISCOVERY. DON'T BE A VICTIM!

The 165th child of King Momoh I of Auchi, Tony was named Suleiman at birth but in 1955 after converting to Christianity, he changed his name to Tony which he took after Chief Anthony Enahoro, one of Nigeria's foremost anti-colonial and pro-democracy activists.

Momoh attended the Government School Auchi, a school founded by his father in 1922. He later moved to Anglican School Okpe, where he served as a pupil-teacher. He also served as headmaster of the Anglican School, Ubuneke, Ivbiano, Owan local government area of the state. Momoh attended the Provincial Teachers Training College, Abudu, Edo state and Government Teachers College, Abraka, Delta state. He proceeded to the University of Nigeria, Nsukka (UNN), University of Lagos and the Nigerian Law school. He possesses degrees in mass communication and law.

Tony Momoh: Each Man, His Time

He cut his teeth in journalism as a sub-editor at the Daily Times in October 1962, where he rose to become editor and deputy general manager in 1980.

Momoh had a reputation for standing firm in the face of intimidation and he was known for fighting for press freedom. Joseph Wayas, former senate president, once invited him to appear before the chamber over an "uncomplimentary" and "contemptuous" publication, asking him to disclose his source of information. Momoh sued the senate at the Lagos high court over what he described as an attempt to infringe on press freedom in the country.

In the legal battle that ensued, Momoh argued that a journalist has the constitutional obligation to hold the government accountable at all times. The court held that an individual had the right to refuse to disclose their source of information.

In its ruling, an appellate court, however, stated that the 1979 constitution did not shield a journalist from disclosing his source of information.

Later in his career, Momoh was appointed by Ibrahim Babangida, then military president, as minister of information and culture from September 1986 until 1990. When Dele Giwa, former editor of Newswatch magazine, was killed by a letter bomb, Momoh promised there would be a probe of his death. He later backtracked saying the probe would serve no useful purpose. In 1996, he became a director of Newswatch.

A founding member of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) he was director of the Alex Ekwueme presidential campaign organization in the 1999 presidential election . He later served as the chairman, media and publicity, of the All Nigeria Peoples Party (ANPP). Also, he was chairman of the political committee of the Muhammadu Buhari Organisation and national chairman of the defunct Congress for Progressive Change (CPC), one of the parties that merged to form the All Progressives Congress (APC).

He was also the first Chairman, Independent Newspapers Limited (INL), publisher of the Daily, Saturday and Sunday Independent titles.

Momoh had always emphasized that he never joined politics for acquisition of wealth or for position. In 2017, when President Buhari appointed him as Chairman of the Governing Council of the University of Jos, the defunct CPC members said they were not in agreement with the appointment, pointing out that the appointment was not befitting of the caliber of the former Minister.

In a statement made available to newsmen in Abuja on behalf of other defunct CPC members in 17 states of the southern region, National coordinator of Southern Mandate, Comrade Ikonomwan Francis said the appointment "does not befit our former National Chairman of CPC and therefore we reject it in totality."

The statement reads: "We, members of the defunct Congress for Progressive Change (CPC) in the seventeen states of the southern region in Nigeria under the auspices of southern mandate wish to express our dismay over the appointment given to Prince Tony Momoh as the chairman Governing Council of the University of Jos.

"We want to state categorically that the appointment does not befit our former National Chairman of CPC and therefore we reject it in totality. Prince Tony Momoh today in the ruling APC has gone far, over and above "for himself alone" he should be given an Office or position that can empower his teaming followers and supporters across the country.

Speaking with Daily Independent, Momoh however distanced himself from the protest and thanked President Buhari for giving him an appointment in the academic world.According to him, he had personally told the President not to give him appointment in any of the boards or ministries.

He said "Someone sent me a note last week and said Buhari has been ungrateful to me. I replied him by saying 'How do you know that? Are you me? Did I ever complain to you? We must have attitude to life, which is everything we do, we must do it to the glory of God. There are 15 million voters who gave Buhari the mandate in 2015, how many of them can he compensate with appointments? I don't share that view that Buhari is ungrateful and that he rewards good deeds with ingratitude at all".

Tony Momoh: Each Man, His Time

Momoh, a die-hard Buharist defended the President till he breathed his last. In his last interview with Daily Independent, published on January 25 2021, titled 'Buhari's Slowness Is A Strategy, Not Because Of Old Age', Momoh had pleaded with Nigerians to cooperate with President Buhari in delivering the gains of democracy to Nigerians.

He however said Nigerians should not hesitate to "stone the APC with votes" in 2023 if they failed to perform to expectation.

"Buhari's slowness has nothing to do with old age but strategy. If old age limits his performance doesn't mean that there will be no performance at all. It doesn't mean slowing down. Buhari is in control of his government and any meeting we attend, once it comes in, you know that someone in charge has come".

President Buhari in his tribute expressed grief at the passing of his longtime ally, friend, political loyalist, saying Prince Momoh stood with him through thick and thin, He said "His brand of loyalty is very rare in the politics of today. I will greatly miss him."

The President recalled that as chairman, Media and Publicity of the All Nigeria People's Party (ANPP) Campaign Organisation in the 2003 and 2007 elections as well as Chairman of the Congress for Progressive Change (CPC), the late Auchi Prince contributed in no small measure to the growth and strengthening of the organizations, leading to the eventual formation of the All Progressives Congress (APC).

On his part, Chief James Onanefe Ibori, a former governor of Delta state has said that with the passing of Prince Tony Momoh, Nigeria has lost a remarkable elder statesman.

According to him, the late Momoh was a renowned journalist, the first Chairman, Board of Directors of the Independent Newspapers Ltd (INL), an eminent public servant, a totally detribalised Nigerian, and a pillar of the All Progressives Congress (APC), who nevertheless, had a rewarding relationship with members of the other political parties.

Chief Ibori said: "Though Prince Tony Momoh and I were never in the same party all through, he was civilized enough to respect the boundaries of friendship".

Ibori recalled that he and the late Prince Momoh, who was Nigeria's Information Minister from 1986 to 1990, had a rewarding friendship that lasted for decades. This bond became stronger when Prince Momoh graciously served as the first Chairman, Board of Directors of the Independent Newspapers Ltd (INL).

He said that in that capacity, Tony Momoh's professionalism was on display as he reached into the great depths of his experience and journalism prowess to help give birth to an exciting newspaper stable which introduced many novel features into Nigerian journalism.

Chief Ibori condoled Tony Momoh's family and the Auchi Ruling House, Etsako West Local Government Area of Edo State, for this pronounced loss and prayed that God will give them the fortitude to bear this loss and grant Momoh's soul eternal rest.

Load-Date: February 4, 2021

Unbalanced chequered checks: Judiciary fumbles

The Sun (Nigeria)

April 11, 2019 Thursday

Copyright 2019 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1038 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Victor C. Ariole Time to reconstitute the entire NJC for failing in its duties by allowing the executive to meddle in its affairs out of negligence of duty. Montesquieu, a great French philosopher, knew that the expression: "l'état c'est moi"- "I am the state; I decide who stays alive or who must be executed". As seen [...]

The post Unbalanced chequered checks: Judiciary fumbles appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Victor C. Ariole

Time to reconstitute the entire NJC for failing in its duties by allowing the executive to meddle in its affairs out of negligence of duty.

Montesquieu, a great French philosopher, knew that the expression: "l'état c'est moi"- "I am the state; I decide who stays alive or who must be executed". As seen in the powerful King of France, was greatly abhorrent to humanity. Voltaire, Rousseau, Montesquieu and Diderot, et al, embarked on an enlightenment documentation of a new France with lots of paper works and pamphlets to acquaint the French people of what it means to be really free; viz: knowledge, education empowerment.

Documentation on checks and balances of power and separation of power became one of the magnum opus of their performance. Unlike what is happening to Nigeria, their Chief Justice (Président de Cour Suprême) very much in agreement with their Attorney General (and the keeper of the Seal, Ministre de la Justice et Garde Des Sceaux) do not allow their profession to be compromised or ridiculed; they must agree before the nation's seal is applied on any deal or bill.

The Chief Justice is the current day seer or judge of the then Jewish tradition of Samuel's time before, out of foolishness, they demanded for a king. When people say Igbo don't have king, they just failed to know that it is a revolved tradition and that Montesquieu thought of replacing in one powerful person what some members of free press see as the square and the sword. Equilateral, square or triangle, of power, joined by the press that must not falter if the wrath of the sword should be avoided. In effect the expected sword of the new dispensation is the press but they seem to be faltering also. "The pen is mightier than the sword" obliges. So, it calls for a stronger press as the fourth realm of the State; assurance coverage for press people by the State, even if it is one press person for every media house, is necessary; that means, the elected watchdog of watchdogs certified by the nation. That is how it works in France to the extent that the fear of a journalist is the beginning of a political wisdom.

Unbalanced chequered checks: Judiciary fumbles

They proved that to their ever greatest president yet to be surpassed; General Charles de Gaulle. Like said earlier, the Chief Justice is always supported by the Minister of Justice to an extent that a Muslim lady as Minister of Justice – Rachida – during Sarkozy presidency, stood by the constitution not minding what people of her faith said about her or what the presidency expected her to do when individual's or faith's interest clashes with the constitution.

That was, also, how General Charles de Gaulle was meant to resign to pave way for their current 5th Republic as they saw his humiliation as the total failure of what their 4th Republic's constitution represented. In effect, it was not De Gaulle per se but the constitution. He still remained vindicated till today as he was begged to take on the Presidency of their reconstituted 5th Republic.

The resignation of Nigeria's Chief Justice Ononghen is a "Jamais Vu" as per "Déjà Vu" of Heads of State in France or elsewhere. In effect, the entire NJC is to be disbanded. Three of France's presidents could not enter second term as judicial concerns were already raised before their attempt at it – Giscard d'Estaing, Nicholas Sarkozy, François Hollande. François Hollande's own was even made worse as journalists scooped with precision his sexual escapades even when it was not meant to be judicial issue because in France the private life of the President is entirely his affair as long as it does not conflict with his official duty.

In Nigeria, the legislature and the judiciary seem not to stand firm on their own grounds of protecting the minimum governance square. So, if the executive is the only side of the square that must stand firm, then the total square is unbalanced, chequered and inconsistent with what Montesquieu intended. Adjusted to Africa's circumstance, some elements of elderly statesmen pronouncement should be part also.

In effect, for Nigerian's constitution to stand the test of time, the press council must be presided by a person covered by immunity; the legislature must be presided by a security cleared leader, the press, and the judiciary; the judiciary, also, must have a leader cleared by the press, the bar and the bench.

As politics is not easily defined by ethics, the executive, in effect, becomes what other sides of the square are to monitor to avoid the derailment of the State like France did by not giving chances to Sarkozy, Giscard and Hollande for a second term. Note that a discreet François Mitterrand stayed on for 14 years – two terms, then, as against 10 years after him – notwithstanding his shielded bigamous private life. Nigerian Press, Nigerian Legislature, Nigerian Judiciary must be seen as the pillars that hold the upper side of the square that must be seen as stable so as to buttress Montesquieu stance and to avoid what French people see, today, as Voltaire's wrong stance of laicity or secularity, when their side of the press started faltering; that is, the press must be responsible and responsive as well as proactive to avoid weak prosecution or whistle blowing that make mockery of the State and its leaders.

When the press scoops, let it be provable beyond reasonable doubt and endorsed by State assured press person. Assurance cover is crucial here to avoid Dele Giwa's thankless devotion.

Resignation of the CJN, like that of the France's President in their 4th Republic, necessitates a constitutional review as well as the total resignation of all the members of Nigerian Judicial Council.

ARIOLE is a Professor of French and Francophone Studies University of Lagos.

The post Unbalanced chequered checks: Judiciary fumbles appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Unbalanced chequered checks: Judiciary fumbles

---

End of Document

27 Yrs After Parcel Bomb - I Could Have Been Killed Like Dele Giwa - Kayode Soyinka

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 20, 2013

Copyright 2013 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1861 words

Byline: Josephine Igbonovia

Body

---

Three years into his education at the Baptist Boys High School in Abeokuta, his father was retired from the Nigerian Tobacco Company and couldn't get another job because he had come of age since child-bearing didn't happen quickly for him. This was unfortunately when he needed to see his six children through school! The second child, Kayode Soyinka, therefore decided to sacrifice his university education for his elder brother and siblings, and this soon landed him in the world of print journalism as a reporter with the defunct Daily Sketch in Ibadan at age 18 in 1976.

Despite the agony of watching his stories dumped in the news editor and sub editors' waste baskets and never getting published for months, doggedness spurred him on as in two years, he transformed into a celebrity journalist. He was soon appointed the London Correspondent; a position he retained when he joined the defunct Concord Group at 22, working at the same time as its Bureau Chief.

Kayode also worked with the legendary editor Peter Enahoro and Dele Giwa until his mastery of the ropes culminated in the birth of Africa Today, a pan-African news magazine presently on international news stands in about 90 countries around the world. The author of 'Diplomatic Baggage: Mossad and Nigeria - The Dikko Story', a book used in many universities around the world, Kayode recounts his thirty-seven year romance with journalism just a day to his 30th wedding anniversary.

He was covering the magistrate court in Ibadan while his senior colleague and tutor, Kayode Muritala, covered the High Court. Frustration, however, engulfed him each morning when he opened the papers for his stories- none was published and even when any eventually was, it came without his by-line while Muritala's by-lines flooded the papers! This went on for months until 18-year-old Kayode could no longer swallow his anguish.

"One day, I left the newsroom and went into the sub-editors' room next door to explain my pains. I said: "Sir, please I want to know why my stories are not being published. I spend a whole day in court, write my stories, but do not see them in the papers the next day!" The Chief Sub-Editor stood-up, tapped my shoulders very nicely, and said, 'Kayode, the day you get the right story, you won't have to come to this room to ask that it be published. Just continue to do your work'."

Resolute on getting that 'right story' that would get his name on print, an opportunity knocked at his doorstep. He was resting at home one morning when he heard a bang in his neighbourhood. On sighting a motley crowd heading in a direction, he joined and soon discovered that a two-storey building had just collapsed in the middle of a naming ceremony, killing the baby, injuring family members but leaving festivity rams unharmed. He called a photojournalist from the office for a shot of the scene and thereafter visited the University College Hospital, Ibadan, where the victims had been hospitalised, for clarity.

27 Yrs After Parcel Bomb - I Could Have Been Killed Like Dele Giwa - Kayode Soyinka

"I couldn't believe my eyes when the next morning, July 8, 1977, that story was the front page lead of the Daily Sketch and the headline, 'Disaster at naming ceremony: FALLING WALL KILLS BABY - mother, 13 others seriously injured... but rams for festivity saved, looked so fascinating. For the first time ever, my by-line, 'BY KAYODE SOYINKA', was in print!", he recalled.

At that point, he made a personal commitment to always have his stories on either the front page, back page or, at worst, lead page three, which was the third most important page in the newspaper. He did not only maintain this but had his by-lines on almost each of these pages on certain days.

From covering Magistrate Court, Kayode soon began covering High Courts - a sort of promotion. Another assignment that launched him into journalistic stardom was the case of one prominent Chief Shodeinde who had been sentenced to two years imprisonment and had gone to the Federal Court of Appeal. Editors were the ones handling that case, but one day, Kayode's News Editor was not available and he was asked to go and cover the proceedings. There, he was the only teenager amongst editors from other media houses. The proceeding took a new twist, Kayode got a new inspiration and, by the following morning, he had the catchiest report and even the justice noted this during the next sitting.

"Throughout the days I covered court proceedings, none of my stories was indicted for contempt! That's why I say the best place to start, for a reporter who wants to do well, is the court", he added.

At age 20, he became the Sketch's Acting State Correspondent in the old Bendel State until he suddenly got a letter from the head office, sending him to London for an all-expense paid study at the College of Journalism on Fleet Street, the home of newspapers. While in London, he was appointed the paper's London Correspondent.

"I was at that job when the Concord Newspaper was established in 1980. There was a crisis in Sketch and some of our colleagues were moving to Concord. Though I didn't apply, Concord invited me to be their London Correspondent. At that time, I was destabilised for the first time in my journalism career because of the change that took place in 1979 in Daily Sketch, which brought in Chief Osoba as the Managing Director of the paper.

I therefore resigned from Sketch and joined Concord. By the time I became the London Correspondent for the Concord, I was already 22, and that appointment opened a floodgate of global journalism opportunities for me. The first time I met Chief Abiola in London was to collect money from him, to pay for our bureau which I had been given the mandate to set-up. I did that tastefully and was eventually appointed the Bureau Chief", he explained.

Always adventurous, four years later, Kayode left the Concord Group to work with Peter Enahoro who was the publisher of Africa Now, a leading pan-African news magazine, as General Editor.

"Working with Peter Enahoro was like going to college of journalism again because he regaled me with Nigeria's history. He writes better than the English man! When you look at Africa Today, it's like the old Africa Now! So, for me, it's a sort of pride that I have represented well the old journalists who tutored me. My career has always been one of opportunities given to me by people I will never forget", he narrated.

Few years later, he joined the Newswatch where he worked with Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed and Ray Ekpu, and was again appointed London Bureau Chief.

"It was while at the Newswatch the historic letter bomb was sent to us on October 19, 1986. Dele unfortunately did not make it; he died as a result of shock and fatal wounds that he suffered, being the one that had the parcel in his hand when he tried to open it. Miraculously, I survived. I did not have injury on my body apart from my eardrums which were badly affected and slight hair burns on my head.

27 Yrs After Parcel Bomb - I Could Have Been Killed Like Dele Giwa - Kayode Soyinka

There were some stains of blood on my night gown I was wearing which must have come from Dele's body. It's a shame Nigeria did not get those behind the bombing. It will be 27 years ago this October 19. I thank God for life. I am 56 years old this year, but when I remember my miraculous escape of the letter bomb, it's like I am 27 years old because I could have been killed like my best friend and colleague, Dele, on that day.

His success notwithstanding, Kayode did not rest on his oars though he had one of the best jobs in journalism-being a London Correspondent.

He went on: "As a London Correspondent, you are the representative of your newspaper on the global stage. I was not only covering the UK but was also covering the Commonwealth, OPEC, New York(United Nations) and South Africa, amongst others. All along, I, however, knew it would be advisable to have a university degree in readiness for the future.

I therefore did a part-time degree programme in international relations at the UK campus of the United States International University, San Diego, California, and a master's in international journalism at the City University College of Journalism, UK. I was going to withdraw from the master's programme because of work but the school's Senate decided to let me run it in two years instead of one year, on the grounds that they wanted me in the school. Perhaps Nigeria's Kayode was becoming famous!"

Now at 32, a real confirmation of his fame came when on the day he collected his certificate from the City University in 1989, a letter from the Cambridge University, England, invited him to Wolfson College as a Visiting Scholar! His stint at Cambridge in 1990 was paid for by the Commonwealth and his book, Diplomatic Baggage, was written while at Cambridge.

On leaving the Newswatch, after 10 remarkable years of service, Kayode decided to establish a news magazine that would report Africa, just like his former boss, Peter Enahoro.

"I had worked for 18 years as a foreign correspondent and did not want to waste that experience. My goal was to project Africa appropriately on the international scene, as against the projections we were getting from the western media, and, really, that's what we've done with Africa Today since 1995. I'm grateful to Nelson Mandela who granted us the first interview for our cover.

Institutions in the US and Canada subscribe to Africa Today, most western newspapers rely on Africa Today for writing their stories on Africa, and, as a matter of fact, they barrage us with telephone calls when they do not get copies. There's a famous UK news magazine that comes out with an annual report on Africa- which the Nigerian press re-reports. Actually, one of our in-house editors puts this together for them!", he revealed.

Kayode repeatedly attributed the progress of Africa Today, which has also produced two sector-specific news magazines, Africa Oil & Gas Today and Africa Telecom Today, to God who exposed him to even the business aspects of journalism at a young age. He would not forget in a hurry other great journalists like the former Daily Sketch's Managing Director , Mr. Felix Adenaike, his first editor at the Sketch, Dayo Duyile, his Managing Director at the Concord Prince Henry Odukomiaya, his editor at the Concord, Doyin Abiola, and senior colleagues in Newswatch: Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Yakubu Mohammed and Dan Agbese.

"Journalism could be very frustrating if you do not have the mind to give it a long haul. It's like running a marathon as far as I am concerned. Really, if I die tomorrow, apart from the stint I had recently in politics in Ogun State, I won't be known for anything else but as a newspaper reporter, both in Nigeria and internationally.

I've said it several times that what should be written on my tomb stone is 'Kayode Soyinka, Newspaper Reporter: 1957-' because journalism has given me everything I have in my life. Right from my days at Sketch, I've kept cuttings of my reports because, as far as I'm concerned, that's my own P.hD. I've been able to send my two children to the best schools in the world and they are doing very well today. I'm most grateful to my wife for being so supportive and for not throwing me out all these years because of my consistent trips", Kayode Soyinka remarked.

27 Yrs After Parcel Bomb - I Could Have Been Killed Like Dele Giwa - Kayode Soyinka

Load-Date: October 21, 2013

---

End of Document

I started doubting Buhari's smartness after our 1984 encounter – Oyelade

I started doubting Buhari's smartness after our 1984 encounter – Oyelade

The Punch

September 10, 2022 Saturday

Copyright 2022 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2322 words

Body

The Chairman of the Broadcasting Corporation of Oyo State, Dotun Oyelade, who clocked 70 years on Friday, tells OLUFEMI OLANIYI about his growing up, career and related issues

How was your growing up like?

I knew I was going to be a journalist as early as 1962 when I was 10 years old. My colleagues would gather round me, wanting to hear stories about exotic and strange places like Pakistan, Britain, Alaska and Iceland. I was an avid reader and read so many books; I was a constant feature at the only public library in Ogbomoso. My life was cut out for me very early and I pursued it vigorously.

In 1972 when I was 20 years old, I had an interview with a former Nigerian football captain, Sam Opone. He came to Ibadan then, he was getting to the twilight of his career. He came to the 2 Division Nigerian Army in Ibadan to lead their football team and that was when I had the opportunity to interview him. After I cobbled the story together, a gentleman, Jide Orimogunje, who was the Sports Editor of the Daily Sketch, was so surprised that a young man of my age could write with such graceful eloquence. That was the word he used and that kindled my self-confidence.

Were you already working as a journalist then?

No, I wasn't. However, when I was in my last year in secondary school, I wrote essays and pasted them on the board for pupils to admire.

Which school was that?

I attended Ogbomoso High School. One day, our English language teacher, Mrs Dahunsi, of blessed memory, took a look at one of my essays and wrote on it, 'superfluous'. That was the first time I came across that word and I checked it up in the dictionary. Under the circumstance, it wasn't complimentary but I took it in my stride and I moved forward. That was how I got into journalism and I later chose broadcast journalism as my forte.

Did you work for Daily Sketch?

I started doubting Buhari's smartness after our 1984 encounter – Oyelade

No, I was just a freelancer from outside. I joined NTA Ibadan in 1977 and after that I was sent to the BBC College and while there, I won the star prize in News Scripting and Television Documentary. There is this popular park in London called the Hyde Park. I did a report on the stream there and named it ‘The Serpentine’ because it is curvy like a snake. That report fetched me the prize.

I had no doubt in my mind that if I was going to write a book that has to do with myself, it would not be a book about where I come from but about my ability and experience as a journalist. That is why the book I just authored, ‘Dotun Oyelade Reporting’ is so unique because I cited verifiable personal experiences since 1972 when I first wrote the story on Sam Opone and all the experiences I had during my illustrious career in the book.

Daily Sketch was very interesting then; the newspaper was what they called the broadsheet. It was double the size of The PUNCH now. In the book, I concentrated mainly on my enterprise as a broadcast journalist. I came across so many personalities like General Olusegun Obasanjo; General Yakubu Gowon; Odimegwu Ojukwu, my good friend, and others. I was one of the first journalists to reach Lagos and get to the scene in Dele Giwa’s living room on the day (he was killed by a parcel bomb) in spite of the fact that I was working with the Television Service of Oyo State. When I got there with my cameraman, I saw vividly what happened. I saw fresh blood already clotting, I saw the mangled typewriter, mangled furniture and human flesh and my cameraman recorded it. For a week after the incident, I was reporting blow-by-blow account of how he died, why possibly he was killed, his family members and so on.

Also, when Papa (Obafemi) Awolowo died, some of the things that people never knew, which no newspaper has ever scooped, are in my book because I was in his bathroom.

I met so many personalities and even Lawrence Anini ( notorious armed robber) became my friend during his trial. The police had to warn me to stop hobnobbing with him. Anini was always calling me ‘Baba Ibadan’;

Was Anini sober during his trial?

He was not sober at all. There was a time he refused to let anybody take his photograph and he vowed that if he ever got out of detention, he would kill a particular reporter. But he never got out; he was executed with others. I was the only one he allowed to cover him generously. The other guy also, Monday Osunbor, allowed me. At that time, many newspapers would quote what we reported at TSOS and used them as their headline. That was what was happening and that shows how good TSOS was.

How did you feel the first time you read the news?

I was a broadcast reporter, I never read the news. I would have been a disaster if I tried that. I know my area of strength and I focused on it. In the book, I described my early days at NTA Ibadan. I started there in August 1977. The late Chief Bola Ige established TSOS to counter the NTA, a federal establishment that was one-sided politically. The station was established around March 1982 and it flourished.

Will you say journalism has been rewarding to you?

I don’t have to think twice before answering capital yes. Without journalism, there is nothing in this world that I could have done that would have been very interesting to me. It has been very rewarding to me. Spiritually, physically and economically, it has been rewarding to me. I have served under three governors in Oyo State. I served Uncle Lam Adesina; I was not only his private secretary and private adviser, I also wrote all his public statements and addresses throughout his four-year office term. I also wrote his acceptance speech in May 1999. I served the late Otunba Adebayo Alao-Akala, who was my schoolmate in primary and secondary schools way back in Ogbomoso.

Related News

Buhari approves FG's takeover of Gombe airport

I started doubting Buhari's smartness after our 1984 encounter – Oyelade

Military will tackle security challenges, Buhari assures Nigerians
Nigerian story not complete without Queen Elizabeth - Buhari

Were you and Alao-Akala classmates?

He was a year my senior in primary school before he went to Ghana but we became classmates in secondary school. We attended Osupa Baptist Day School. So, when he became the governor, I served him as Special Adviser on Public Communications, which is journalism-related. With Engr. Seyi Makinde now, I was his first nominee to lead his media campaign. That was in January 2018 and I worked in that office until he won the election the following year. He appointed me as the Chairman of the Broadcasting Corporation of Oyo State. He believed I would be very useful to his administration and to the people of Oyo State in this area. Uncle Lam Adesina thought so too. As his private secretary, he made me to double as the executive officer of the same BCOS. They recognised me as a broadcast manager.

How would you describe Alao-Akala since you were his classmate at some point?

He was one of the most extroverted persons I have met in my life. He had a lot of people around him and he was a very generous person; he loved life and he enjoyed life. He was successful as a governor mainly because of his love to see people happy. In certain regards, we are direct opposite of each other. While I am a little bit reticent, he was the very opposite. A very nice man.

You said he was nice and generous and he loved to see people happy. What will you say was responsible for his electoral defeat in 2011?

If you read my book, I stated reasons why I would not dabble into politics now. I will do that at the fullness of time. I believe that regurgitating my professional experience will be far more useful to the younger ones than anything else. At 70, I want to be a mentor, a professional mentor, a family mentor and I believe strongly in the sanctity of marriage. I am not going to talk about those governors I served now. The time is not ripe for that because I am still in government.

What do you think about the way social media has disrupted the old way of journalism practice?

It's awesome; it's enormous and it could be used for 'black', just as it could be used for 'white'. When deployed positively, it can assist journalism in a very effective way. It is so efficient in getting views of the people out there. Although some people use it for nefarious activities, I am an advocate of its existence and establishment and it can only help in the end, just as it is helping now. However, the dark areas have to be addressed.

How do you suggest those areas be addressed?

By providing stiff penalties for those who spread deliberate falsehood to justify their interests; stiff penalties must be applied to anyone who violates the laws there. It is the bane of a great country like Nigeria; things are upside down because people are not made to answer for their actions. I hate citing the so-called developed societies because we know their inadequacies too. But if we start from a simple thing like punishing anybody who throws out a pet bottle or paper on the road or while driving, there will be a great change. If they are put in jail or fined, such things will stop; and if those involved in lesser offences are not spared, those involved in criminal activities will know that there is no place to hide.

Cast your mind back to 1984/85 when Muhammadu Buhari and Tunde Idiagbon came to power with all their garbage, they showed us an idea of toughness and people were apprehended and punished for little offences. This made people to sit up and you could see Nigerians in queues at bus stops and there was orderliness during their short stay in power. That is not to say they were angels, they were not. I have always told people that General Buhari does not possess a quarter of the attributes that people falsely and conveniently attributed to him. No, he doesn't.

Why do you say that?

I started doubting Buhari's smartness after our 1984 encounter – Oyelade

I was one of the few journalists, who, in January 1984, immediately after they came to power, asked him questions at what they called a 'World Press Conference' at the Dodan Barracks in Lagos. That was a week after they sacked the administration of President Shehu Shagari from power. Shagari's government was sacked via a coup on December 31, 1983. We had the privilege of asking him the first set of questions. I remember Tunde Thompson was there, Chris Okorie, Nduka Irabor and some other journalists were there. I asked him: 'Now that you have taken over from a democratically elected civil administration, do you feel any sense of remorse?' General Buhari could not utter a word. It was Tunde Idiagbon, who was by his side, that brushed aside my question. That day, I began to wonder if Buhari was as smart as he was said to be. Here we are today; I don't want to dabble in politics, I want to continue my life as an author and a biographer. I have written 10 books and one of my recent books is a book on Air Chief Marshal Alex Badeh, one of the past Chiefs of Defence Staff. I was playing golf and a call came in and the caller introduced himself to me and we started talking. I told him that I would complete his biography in one year and I did. He loved it, his family members and others love it,

What do you do now?

I do contract publishing and I am not doing badly. That is aside my job as the Chairman of BCOS.

The media has been blamed for the growing immoralities and crimes like Internet fraud and ritual killings. What is your take on this?

The media has nothing to do with these and should not take the blame for those criminal activities. The media is just performing its roles. Ritual killing is a grandchild of government neglect of its duties. Anytime a government neglects its core duties, the peasants and the commoners are the ones that will be directly hit first. Yahoo Yahoo is a reflection of the abject poverty and utter frustration in which the youth have found themselves. As I talk to you today, many youths are unemployed and many are unemployable. Many of them are now engaging in criminal activities as a result of this. When General Obasanjo said Nigeria was sitting on a keg of gun powder with the huge unemployment among the youth, he was not saying anything new but was just saying the obvious. As they say in law, it is trite. We are in the midst of this problem now.

Some university graduates now are unemployable, even many lawyers can't speak good English because their teachers are flawed in the area of brilliance due to what they were exposed to. Also, many lecturers are not as good as what we had about 40 or 50 years ago. They fall far short of educational and academic depth expected of university lecturers. We are in trouble and whoever takes over from this administration can only try his best; and there are certain areas that must change first. Security situation, in which we find ourselves as a nation, is one that must change. Insecurity now is an unnecessary distraction for an already impoverished nation.

The NTA is Nigeria's first TV station. Why has not been able to rank among the very best in the world?

There is none of these broadcast stations that can rank among the best because of fundamental constraints. In this part of the world, anything that is owned by government will be bogged down by bureaucracy and with that, it cannot work. It will be bureaucratic in editorial content and bureaucratic in procurement of facilities that will jazz up the system. So, there is no way such will rank among the best in the world. I was in the US in 1985 when the CNN started. The owner of the station was the butt of jokes of everybody. Nobody believed that his ambitious idea and focus were possible but look at it today now, it is one of the most reliable sources of information around the world, if not the best. See what happened in Nigeria also, Channels, AIT are ahead, they are bound to shoot ahead of government-owned stations because they have the wherewithal to move forward without encumbrances that are the bane of government-owned institutions.

Load-Date: September 11, 2022

Murdered Journalist: Union Demands Justice

PM News

April 30, 2017 Sunday

Copyright 2017 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 207 words

Body

---

The Nigeria Union of Journalist (NUJ) has urged the Inspector General of Police, Idris Abubakar, to ensure the arrest and prosecution of the killers of Mr Famou Giobara, a broadcast journalist in Bayelsa. The union made the request in a communique issued Sunday at the end of the NUJ National Executive Council (NEC) meeting, held in Gombe.

The communique was signed by the NUJ National Secretary, Malam Shuaibu Leman. The union is also demanding that the case files of all slain journalists be re-opened, including those of late Dele Giwa and Bagauda Kaltho.

The communique further condemned in strong terms, the withdrawal of a Punch reporter, Olalekan Adedayo, from the State House and urged Presidency to reprimand the Chief Security Officer responsible for the act. The union challenged the Federal Government to sanction state governments that failed to properly utilise the first batch of the Paris Club refund.

The communique further commended the anti-corruption war of the present administration and also called on the National Assembly to ensure quick passage of the Petroleum Industry Bill, to stabilise the sector. The NUJ commended the Gombe State Government and the State Council of the union for the successful hosting of the NEC meeting.

Load-Date: May 1, 2017

---

End of Document

Magazine Disavows Lawyer's Move Against Security Chiefs

The Associated Press

November 5, 1986, Wednesday, AM cycle

Copyright 1986 Associated Press All Rights Reserved

Section: International News

Length: 436 words

Dateline: LAGOS, Nigeria

Body

---

The directors of Newswatch magazine have disavowed a lawyer's attempt to bring murder charges against security officials in connection with the letter-bomb killing of the journal's editor.

The lawyer, Chief Fani Fawehinmi, filed a complaint Monday with the Justice Ministry alleging that security officials were responsible for the death of Dele Giwa, a highly regarded journalist in the West African nation. Giwa was killed by the letter-bomb on Oct. 19, two days after being questioned by intelligence agents.

The Newswatch directors said in a statement Tuesday night: "We wish to state categorically that Chief Fawehinmi does not have our authority or that of the family of Dele Giwa to proceed on what they consider to be a hasty and ill-timed legal action." "We wish to put the burial behind us. We also wish to give the police the chance to complete their investigations," they said.

The magazine earlier had called for an independent investigation of the slaying, and the detention and suspension of security officials who questioned Giwa.

Labor leaders, the Nigerian Bar Association, journalists, newspapers and other prominent Nigerians supported the call. The government said police would handle the investigation.

Lawyers in Lagos said Fawehinmi's action was unprecedented, and probably had no legal standing.

Fawehinmi, one of the more flamboyant lawyers in the Nigerian capital, said Wednesday he was Giwa's personal lawyer, not the magazine's.

"I am convinced that the government has infiltrated Newswatch," he told a reporter. "Everyone of those who spoke at the news briefing was protecting his interest." Hours after Giwa's death, Fawehinmi told reporters his client had been interrogated several times the previous week by the State Security Service and military intelligence. He was questioned about allegations he was involved with groups seeking to destabilize the military government.

Fawehinmi disclosed he had asked Information Minister Prince Tony Momoh to intercede with authorities on Giwa's behalf. Momoh confirmed he had asked the chief of the general staff to stop the questioning, and Rear Admiral Augustu Aikhomu complied.

Magazine Disavows Lawyer's Move Against Security Chiefs

Both Col. Halidu Akilu, director of military intelligence, and Lt. Col. A.K. Togun said the questioning had cleared Giwa. Akilu said he told Giwa in a telephone call on Oct. 19, about 45 minutes before the letter bomb arrived, that the case was closed.

Fawehinmi, in filing the complaint, said there was enough circumstantial evidence against Akilu and Togun to warrant prosecution. He cited Akilu's phone call to Giwa's wife the day before the killing asking for Giwa's address.

---

End of Document

Tinubu's ministerial gyrations fail to inspire

The Punch

July 31, 2023 Monday

Copyright 2023 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1076 words

Body

---

AFTER keeping the country in suspense for two months, President Bola Tinubu's unveiling of 28 ministerial nominees on Thursday failed to reignite hopes of radical change in Nigeria's governance trajectory. While some new faces are on the list, the return of four ex-governors and some others with unflattering political baggage immediately drew reactions ranging from disappointment to disgust. In the end, since the list offered no surprises, its lateness and incompleteness reinforce a rising conviction that though Tinubu prepared, worked hard, and strategised to win power, alas, he has not prepared adequately for the arduous task of governance.

For a country facing multiple crises: political, economic, security, and social, including existential threats, this is troubling. Moreover, after eight years of ruinous, indecisive superintendence under Muhammadu Buhari; Nigeria desperately needs a sure-footed leader at the helm.

Since his inauguration on May 29, Tinubu has sent mixed signals. Presenting an image of decisiveness and courage to take bold decisions to rescue the economy, he immediately stopped the petrol subsidy a month ahead of schedule and followed this up with nudging the Central Bank of Nigeria to unify the official and parallel market naira exchange rates.

This 'boldness' has however frayed as the two measures have devastated businesses, pushed many more people into poverty, and by its responses, exposed the unpreparedness of the administration.

Indecision has also manifested in the delayed appointment of a cabinet. It took Buhari six months to name ministers in his first term, and two months in his second. Tinubu has continued on that slippery path.

His image of a decisive political actor is crumbling. Whereas an amendment to the 1999 Constitution requires the President to send the names of ministerial nominees to the Senate within 60 days after his inauguration, he dallied till the last minute. Besides, he fulfilled the law only halfway by presenting 28 names, while the constitution requires him to nominate at least one minister from each of the 36 states.

He was announced winner of the presidential election on March 1, a clear three months before inauguration. In effect, it has taken him five whole months to name just part of his cabinet, an embarrassing reminder of the Buhari era.

Tinubu's ministerial gyrations fail to inspire

Additionally, his promise to run a cabinet of mostly technocrats appears to be folding in favour of settling his political IOUs. He also fell short of his campaign promise of having at least 35 per cent women.

Many commentators are upset at his recycling of some politicians, especially the ex-governors. They find little to recommend them. Along with others, on their watch, Nigeria transited from a 52 per cent poverty rate in 1999 to become the world's poverty capital in 2018, only returning the title to India in 2021. It had 133 million poor in 2022, joined by another 7.1 million this year, according to the World Bank.

Two ex-governors, Nasir el-Rufai (Kaduna), and Nyesom Wike (Rivers), have been ministers of the FCT and of Education respectively during the Fourth Republic. Both are divisive figures. El-Rufai's eight-year rule saw Kaduna descend into a hellish killing field and hotbed of ethnic and sectarian divisions. The murder of five persons and kidnapping of another 50 farmers in Giwa Local Government Area at the weekend reflects a daily fare. Wike left Rivers no better.

Another ex-governor, Badaru Abubakar, for eight years presided over Jigawa that has the country's highest percentage of multi-dimensionally poor children with 73.9 per cent, and an illiteracy rate of 75.8 per cent. With David Umahi of Ebonyi as the fourth, many Nigerians wonder why Tinubu cannot find new hands to drive his "renewed hope" slogan.

Other nominees such as Ahmed Dangienda, and Stella Okotete, have been hit with allegations of wrongdoing, while Sani Danladi, a former governorship aspirant in Taraba State, was enmeshed in a fake certificate allegation.

Two ruling party presidential aspirants who stepped down for Tinubu made the list. Indeed, while the law presumes accused persons innocent unless otherwise pronounced by the courts, and it is universal practice to reward political interests with appointments, Nigerians who yearned for more non-political actors were disappointed.

There are some silver linings. Unlike Buhari, the list reflects Nigeria's diversities. At 38, Okotete is a refreshing departure from the creeping gerontocracy of the major parties; Hanatu Musawa, 43, Bunmi Tunji-Ojo, 41, and Betta Edu, 36, are also relatively young.

A few other technocrats also made it: Mohammed Pate, a one-time minister of state for health, is a well-regarded international health professional; Dele Alake, a long time Tinubu acolyte, is a leading journalist; and Doris Uzoka, a banker; and Lateef Fagbemi, a respected Senior Advocate of Nigeria.

Tinubu has faltered, but still has a chance to define a strong character for his administration, inspire public confidence and halt the country's slide into state failure. The next batch of nominees should be top-heavy with technocrats. He should avoid the politicians who collectively have thoroughly misgoverned Nigeria.

Governance is different from politicking; settling with politicians across the aisle does not unite Nigerians. He needs a team to rescue the economy, stamp out crime, bridge the infrastructure gap, and fix the education and health sectors.

The country is tottering. The naira exchanged at N870 to $1 at the weekend at the unofficial market, while blue chips, Nigerian Breweries, Guinness Nigeria, and others announced huge losses on the back of forex volatility; terrorists continued killing and kidnapping across the country, and international agencies announced higher poverty and hunger figures in the land. Industrial strikes are on the horizon.

Politics should therefore take a back seat. Tinubu should quickly name his full cabinet this week; assemble a very strong economic management team, and appoint a very capable professional as defence minister. His next batch of ministers should inspire hope.

The Senate should do a thorough screening and insist on portfolios being attached to each nominee. Nigeria's outlandish democracy features senators questioning nominees for unspecified positions! This Senate has a chance to drop the charade. It should reject any unfit person.

Having wasted two months, Tinubu should roll up his sleeves and go to work.

Tinubu's ministerial gyrations fail to inspire

Load-Date: July 31, 2023

---

End of Document

Omatsola's Rhythmic eyes, watching and telling

Weekly Trust

July 11, 2015 Saturday

Copyright 2015 Media Trust Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 435 words

Byline: Nathaniel Bivan

Body

---

Poems are not very easy to review. In fact, literature is not. There are rules in poetry, and then there is poetic licence. But beyond this licence, this author's veto to meander in a sea of words leads him to history and politics and an elegy to Dele Giwa, a journalist killed in 1986 during the reign of military president General Ibrahim Babangida. The poem 'Elegy to Dele Giwa' reads in part:

Excellent a golden name in the pen annals

Alas. Corpuscles run for us in canals

Sure indelible the sacred name becomes

When with the black ribbon we cry; the spirit returns

Yearning to visit the Robots in Brutaldom

And your blood singing sonorously from martyrdom

And of course, where there is politics lurks dictatorship in a country like Nigeria - although remembered as past, there is always the reminder when a democratically elected leader rears his horns. In 'The Rhythmic eyes,' someone is always watching, telling the story the way it is, starting from the beginning when Nigeria fell into the hands of crafty leaders - the fate of Moshood Abiola and the memory of June 12, 1993. Hints are dropped here and there and it is clear the culprit is the dictator, when there is one wearing goggles and giving orders.

One would wish the editing of this work were perfect because a word like playwright is spelt 'playright' on the back cover page. This is not a good sign for such poetry that reads like a history book. Here, there is success in the play with words, poetry's greatest weapon manipulated to hold attention and win the reader's love. The love poem, 'Woman Power' is an example:

Her balls like magnet

And voice Nectar

And lips hypnotic

Omatsola's Rhythmic eyes, watching and telling

I argue and grumble

The battle I lost.

Some of Omatsola's poems are lengthy and run into many verses, others short and in single verses. In all these, he treats matters bothering Nigeria, from hope to misery and violence. The poem 'Stray Bullet' reads in part:

The cloud darkens the face of the sun palefully

There is a rumbling among the cosmic forces

The sun indicts the cloud but the cloud becomes darker

And the celestial

Bodies are hungry

The sky grumbles and tells the cloud to relieve him of the heavy burden

Suddenly, people are running where to? Followed by clattering

Followed by bang! Bang!

The poet leaves nothing out. He trashes the evil of social vices in the poem 'Gossips.'

Cross-legged they sit,

Under moonlight and sunlight

They are always

And problem abound.

Some write to entertain, others perhaps to test their skills with words. This poet succeeds in educating, informing, as well as correcting the ills in the society. From one page to the next flow the issues of life.

Load-Date: July 11, 2015

---

End of Document

Only restructuring can save Nigeria –Eze Ogbonnaya

The Sun (Nigeria)

April 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1258 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

Dickson Okafor

His Royal Majesty, Eze (Dr.) Cletus Uwadiiegwu Ogbonnaya, the traditional ruler of Umuanisi Autonomous Community in Uturu, Abia State has called on Igbo to drop agitation for Biafra, but to unite and push for President of Igbo extraction in 2023.

The veteran journalist, historian and university lecturer turned traditional ruler relived his civil war experience and the lessons of the three years hostility that too many lives.

The monarch called for restructure of Nigeria, adding that with the way things are going, Nigeria may collapse.

He speaks about other issues.

From pen pushing to royalty, what has it being so far?

It has been eventful, exciting and demanding. It has not been easy. I was in journalism for 23 years having started with NTA Abia in 1989 during my Youth Service. I later moved to Concord Newspaper. I was a former member, Nigerian Guild of Editors. In fact, it was the late Dele Giwa, Alhaji Ashiru and others from the Concord Newspaper who came to interview us in Port Harcourt in January 1980. I was barely six months in NTA when I joined Concord Newspaper at inception as the pioneer Chief Correspondent in the old Imo State comprising Abia and half of Ebonyi State and by the grace of God, I had been the traditional ruler of Umuanisi Autonomous Community in Uturu, Abia State since April 2001. Uturu is ancient town and today it is the host community of the Abia State University and Gregory University.

Only restructuring can save Nigeria –Eze Ogbonnaya

In 1983, Governor Sam Mbakwe appointed me Zonal Secretary, Educational Board and I could have gone to the federal House in 1987 if not for the coup that brought President Muhammadu Buhari to power. Therefore, because of the love and passion I have for journalism, I went back to Concord after the coup and I was one of the five Editors appointed in 1986. In 1989, I became the Deputy News Editor and in 1990, I rose to the position of Assistant Editor in charge of defence.

Many are of the view that traditional rulers in Igbo land don't command the level of respect and honour their counterparts in other parts of the country earn from their subjects, what are the challenges you face as a monarch?

Yes, those with such view are right. The traditional stool in Igbo land is not as developed as that of other tribes and ethnic groups. For instance, you see retired generals in the North going back home to become traditional rulers. The Sultan of Sokoto was a colonel in the Nigerian army, and also there is Gen. Hassan Yakubu of Kogi State. The same thing applies in the South West, Middle Belt and some parts of the South South geo political zones. Unfortunately, in Igbo land, traditional rulers are not accorded the kind of respect, regard and reward their counterparts in the other zones are accorded.

January 15, 2020 made it 50 years Nigeria/Biafra civil war ended; can you share your experience?

I joined the Biafra Army when I was in primary three at the age of 16 years and 4 months. Incidentally, my first training was at my Alma-Ata, Aquinas Secondary School, Osu, Isiala Mbano LGA where I started school in 1965. No person who saw the event of 1966 to 1970 will want to witness it again. We saw how everything happened and its consequences. It was the adventure of Major Nzeogwu and co who staged a coup and they could not take charge and the coup failed. Gen. Aguiyi Ironsi who never planned coup took over and it was the British lecturers at Ahmadu Bello University that interpreted the 1966 coup as Igbo coup. On July 29, 1966 when Ironsi was on tour of the Western Region at Ibadan, a counter coup happened. In fact, the people who staged the coup were Major Martin Adamu, Major Murtala Mohammed and T. Y. Danjuma. The only Igbo officer who died in Nzeogwu coup was Brigadier Arthur Unaegbu. So, the counter coup by the Northern army officers was more bloody. It was T. Y Danjuma who kidnapped Ironsi and handed him over to Major Williams Wabe who later became A.D.C to Gen Yakubu Gowon and they finished Ironsi at Moore Plantation in Ibadan. Col. Chukwuemeka Odumegwu Ojukwu rose up to the challenge and he gave Igbo the leadership we needed to survive the unfortunate incident. So, if Gowon had implemented the Aburi Accord, the war wouldn't have broken out on July 6, 1967. It were agreed that Nigeria should confederate yet, it was not adhered to. It was the students of the University of Nigeria, Nsukka that asked Ojukwu to declare war.

To you, was that declaration a mistake?

It was not a mistake even though we were not prepared for war because the whole military formations in Nigeria with the exception of the 7th battalion of the Nigerian army in Enugu, were all in the North. Our people were chased away from all parts of Nigeria. What do you expect us to do? In fact, I look at Biafra army as a resistance army because we resisted attack on us by the Nigerian army.

Many will say you are not fair to the North considering the fact that only Northern leaders were killed in the Nzeogwu coup; wasn't that an injustice against the North?

What happened was that Zik was already out of the country on health grounds. Col. David Ejor who was the battalion commander when the coup happened would have moved to the Government House, Enugu and picked M. I. Okpara, but unfortunately or fortunately, the then President of Cyprus Archbishop Macarius was on a state visit in Nigeria and was in the Eastern State and it would have looked odd to pick Okpara in the presence of a visiting Head of state even at the airport. The five majors were idealist in their perception of Nigeria not knowing ethnicity is stronger than whatever they thought of. There was a journal I read in my final year in the University of Nigeria, Nsukka which says, looking at the whole world, ethnicity is stronger than religion and that even nationalism is stronger than religion.

Which can guarantee peace and unity in the country?

Only restructuring can save Nigeria –Eze Ogbonnaya

The answer is restructuring. The way things are going, if the country is not restructured, I'm afraid Nigeria may collapse one day. Those who are holding Nigeria at the jugular don't want Nigeria restructured. Restructuring is all about state governors using the resources in their regions to develop their states. That was how Nigeria was structured before 1966. It was the unitary system of government introduced by the army that resulted to concentration of too much power in the centre.

What would you say are the lessons we should learn from the civil war?

Like I told you, I enlisted into the Biafran army on February 12, 1968. I saw action both as Infantry and Radiance personnel as well as a ranger. So, January 15, 2020 made it exactly 50 years that Biafra surrendered and was handed over to the then Head of state, General Yakubu Gowon at the Dodan Barracks by Major Gen. Philip Effiong, the Biafra Second-in-Command. Therefore, one has to thank God that one is alive witnessing 50 years of the end of the Nigerian civil war. Unfortunately, Nigeria doesn't seem to have utilized or learned any lesson from the war. Take for instance, every brigade in Biafra had a mini refinery. What you call illegal refinery today. Why can't Nigeria harness them? If Biafra could build three airports within the two and half years of the war apart from having Enugu, Port Harcourt and Calabar ports, why can't Nigeria replicate and utilize these opportunity? During the war, Biafra built an airport here in Uturu after the fall of Enugu at Onuaku where you have Masters Energy Industrial City.

The post Only restructuring can save Nigeria –Eze Ogbonnaya appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

Load-Date: April 20, 2020

---

End of Document

Omatsola's Rhythmic Eyes, Watching and Telling [book review]

Daily Trust (Abuja)

July 11, 2015

Copyright 2015 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 450 words

Byline: Nathaniel Bivan

Body

---

Title: The Rhythmic Eyes

Author: Daniel Omatsola

Publisher: University of Abuja Press

Pages: 91

Poems are not very easy to review. In fact, literature is not. There are rules in poetry, and then there is poetic licence. But beyond this licence, this author's veto to meander in a sea of words leads him to history and politics and an elegy to Dele Giwa, a journalist killed in 1986 during the reign of military president General Ibrahim Babangida. The poem 'Elegy to Dele Giwa' reads in part:

Excellent a golden name in the pen annals

Alas. Corpuscles run for us in canals

Sure indelible the sacred name becomes

When with the black ribbon we cry; the spirit returns

Yearning to visit the Robots in Brutaldom

And your blood singing sonorously from martyrdom

And of course, where there is politics lurks dictatorship in a country like Nigeria - although remembered as past, there is always the reminder when a democratically elected leader rears his horns. In 'The Rhythmic eyes,' someone is always watching, telling the story the way it is, starting from the beginning when Nigeria fell into the hands of crafty leaders - the fate of Moshood Abiola and the memory of June 12, 1993. Hints are dropped here and there and it is clear the culprit is the dictator, when there is one wearing goggles and giving orders.

One would wish the editing of this work were perfect because a word like playwright is spelt 'playright' on the back cover page. This is not a good sign for such poetry that reads like a history book. Here, there is success in the play with words, poetry's greatest weapon manipulated to hold attention and win the reader's love. The love poem, 'Woman Power' is an example:

Omatsola's Rhythmic Eyes, Watching and Telling [book review]

Her balls like magnet

And voice Nectar

And lips hypnotic

I argue and grumble

The battle I lost.

Some of Omatsola's poems are lengthy and run into many verses, others short and in single verses. In all these, he treats matters bothering Nigeria, from hope to misery and violence. The poem 'Stray Bullet' reads in part:

The cloud darkens the face of the sun palefully

There is a rumbling among the cosmic forces

The sun indicts the cloud but the cloud becomes darker

And the celestial

Bodies are hungry

The sky grumbles and tells the cloud to relieve him of the heavy burden

Suddenly, people are running where to? Followed by clattering

Followed by bang! Bang!

The poet leaves nothing out. He trashes the evil of social vices in the poem 'Gossips.'

Cross-legged they sit,

Under moonlight and sunlight

They are always

And problem abound.

Some write to entertain, others perhaps to test their skills with words. This poet succeeds in educating, informing, as well as correcting the ills in the society. From one page to the next flow the issues of life.

Load-Date: July 13, 2015

Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be

The Will (Nigeria)

March 1, 2021 Monday

Copyright 2021 The Will Newspaper All Rights Reserved

Length: 4365 words

Body

---

Kingsley Osadolor BEVERLY HILLS, March 01, (THEWILL) Just when you think he should be contemplating his years in retirement, of putting his feet on a puff, sipping warm milk, I-pad, I-phone, newspapers, magazines and books handy, bifocals in place the better for long reads, one or two excited grandchildren romping around in his sitting room, Kingsley Osayande Osadolor, former Deputy Managing Director of The Guardian, media consultant and lawyer, hopes to take up teaching as a next career. If he were in the civil service (which he once was as commissioner in Edo state) he would have retired compulsorily when he turned sixty on August 15 2020. But he spent a greater part of his career as a journalist from when he joined The African Guardian in 1985. Before then, Osadolor had contributed to The Nigerian Observer in Benin, Nigerian Tribune, The Herald and Satellite newspapers, mostly on and about sports.

During his youth service after graduating with a First Class Honours from Department of Mass Communication University of Nigeria Nsukka (an unsurpassed record since inception of the school in 1960) he sent op-ed pieces to The Guardian, some of which were promptly published. His NYSC was coming to an end when Osadolor responded to recruitment of editorial staff for a soon-to-be-set-up weekly, The African Guardian, modelled after popular international magazines such as TIME and Newsweek in America, African Concord and Newswatch in Nigeria.

He seemed perfect for the job. Why not? With his previous contributions to some Nigerian newspapers, a superb result from UNN, it would have been unthinkable for any editor to pass him by.

Thus was he employed, making Osadolor one of the first two editorial staff, the other being Fred Owhawha. When the maiden edition of The African Guardian hit the newsstands in January 1986, Osadolor was posted to Harare as a correspondent covering the entire East and Southern Africa.

He was recalled to Lagos in 1990 and appointed Deputy Editor of The Guardian daily. From then, in his words, "subsequent appointments followed," and rapid rise in the newsroom, making it as high as Deputy Managing Director.

In between his journalistic duties, he went on to read Law at the University of Lagos, topping it with an LLM in the same institution. He passed out of Law School with distinction.

Almost four decades after, Osadolor has indicated his interest in teaching. With his formidable resume, it is hard to imagine any of the federal, state or private universities denying him a place to mentor their students.

Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be

Transiting from the newsroom to the lecture room isn't such a novelty in some parts of the world. In the US, for instance, it is commonplace for big-foot journalists to take up professorial positions in universities, some of them finding their way to respectable institutions such as Columbia School of Journalism.

Here in Nigeria, it is almost rare to find an individual who has had a most successful run in journalism aspiring to teach or even making it to the classroom. No one remembers any of the following media gurus in Nigeria dead or alive doing time in Mass Communication or related departments in universities post-journalism: Sam Amuka, Chidi Amuta, Mamman Daura, Ray Ekpu, Dele Giwa, Abubakar Imam, Stanley Macebuh, Tony Mommoh, Alade Odunewu, Yemi Ogunbiyi, Sonala Olumhense, Segun Osoba, etc.

Instead, one or two of them left the academia to work in the media. Macebuh, for example, quit his teaching job in an American university and relocated to Nigeria as pioneer MD of The Guardian.

Also, Ogunbiyi left University of Ife (Obafemi Awolowo University) to the corporate head office of The Guardian Rutam House, Lagos. If Osadolor's ambition ever comes true, he will join the ranks of Dr.

Bisi Olawunmi, former NAN New York Correspondent, who now teaches in a private university in Nigeria. In an interview published on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday last August, Osadolor mused to Funke Olaode of THISDAY that he will most likely take up teaching from now on.

Having spent much of the last three decades and half as a distinguished journalist, media consultant, special assistant, commissioner and lawyer, he hopes to crown it all as a teacher. "I equally look forward to returning to teaching," Osadolor told the journalist.

"The greater motivation for me is to be a catalyst for change through the instrumentality of my profession," insisting that as human beings, particularly on his diamond jubilee, "one continues to aspire. I give thanks to Almighty to have enabled me to record my modest accomplishments.

I look forward to acquiring more knowledge and also contributing to the body of knowledge." Osadolor had his mentorship right from home under his parents long before he decided to study Mass Communication at UNN.

As he recalled, "my parents were disciplinarians with high ethical values. They believed in and invested in our education.

There was no question about going to school without uniforms or books. When my elder brothers and I were in elementary school, it was mandatory for us to attend after-school extramural classes, called 'Lessons,' for which fees were paid in addition to school fees.

" As a youngster, he was fascinated with medicine, which he hoped to read in university. But the sight of blood dissuaded him.

What convinced Osadolor to study Mass Communication in the end was, according to him, the "PR prowess" of his parents. "It was a combination of my father and my mother's PR prowess.

I was struggling to read the papers with him. There was also a re-diffusion box in the quadrangle.

That fascinated me and stoked my interest in radio broadcasts. "Re-diffusion, by the way, was a subscription cable radio service that was the precursor of transistors.

Re-diffusion was fixed, while transistor radio is portable, easily movable, and requires only an antenna and no cable connection." Apart from his parent's mentorship in gravitating towards journalism, writers in the international magazines also inspired/ influenced the young Osadolor.

Though not physically around like his mother and father, they were something of absentee mentors far away in New York: he could feel their palpable presence on the pages of the magazines he read as a university hopeful in his father's house in Benin City, Lance Morrow particularly. Like some of his peers across Nigeria from the seventies onwards who could hardly resist the seductive prose of writers like Morrow, George J Church, Otto Friedrich, Nancy Gibbs, Paul Gray, Walter Isaacson, Pico Iyer, Hugh Sidey, John Skow, Strobe Talbot, to name a few, it was another significant step towards Osadolor's career in journalism.

Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be

So, you could say that his deep appreciation and admiration for writers in the weekly publications rubbed off on him positively such that by the time he joined African Guardian, he seemed, again, a natural fit, as he himself told the same journalist from THISDAY. "I was thrilled by the prospects of a weekly magazine because that would, I thought, give me the opportunity to follow in the footsteps of the inimitable Lance Morrow and TIME magazine which had made lasting impressions on me," Osadolor said to Olaode.

"So, I told Tommy Odemwingie (who, by the way, is an uncle to former Super Eagles striker, Osaze Odemwingie) to pass my papers for the forthcoming magazine." All of that would have gone up in a puff of smoke if Osadolor had followed his initial professional preference.

Today, judging from his career trajectory, it is impossible not to rate him among the top ten media men of his generation. There are two or so unforgettable moments journalists hold dear to heart: their first day in the newsroom and their very first publication.

Granted, Osadolor may not make much of his first published piece as a correspondent with The African Guardian because he had been published before then. But, as he has said in an interview, his first day at Rutam House was as memorable as it was historic.

"Sometime in April 1985, before my NYSC ended," Osadolor recounted, "I came to Lagos to submit my application at The Guardian. I met the Features Editor, Tommy Odemwingie.

It was the weekend after Marvin Hagler blasted Tommy Hearns with a third-round knockout in a middleweight title fight. The newsroom was abuzz with chats about the fight.

Odemwingie hinted that The Guardian was planning on starting a weekly magazine, like Concord Weekly, Newswatch, Newsweek and TIME." Continuing, he says: "Immediately after my youth service, I came back to Rutam House.

The African Guardian magazine hired Fred Ohwahwa and me as its first editorial staff, other than a handful who were redeployed from the newspaper. We were, therefore, involved in the incubation and delivery of the weekly news magazine which hit the newsstands in January 1986." In a telling intro to Olaode's tribute on Osadolor's sixtieth, "accomplished, astounding, avid, adventurous," are some of the adjectives she dressed the subject with, going further to describe him as "a Nigerian journalist of many firsts in his exciting careerBarrister Kingsley Osadolor excels with panache as a journalist, communication expert, broadcaster and scholar.

Pragmatic and passionate, his life in the last 60 years illustrates the need to be focused and inventive. From journalism to law, Osadolor has not stopped learning and is following knowledge like a 'sinking star.'

" Even more excitedly than her female counterpart, another journalist and public commentator Adeniyi, writing on Osadolor's sixtieth in The Guardian, described him as "confident, calm, and contemplative, Osadolor bears the image of the cognitive, portraying an intuitive knowledge of the world around him, spiced with experiential pedagogy, and seeking opportunities to display the samehe was prodigious, revealing his erudition in not only wise, witty, and elevated prose, but in the management of talented writers." Osadolor has also managed his family life reasonably well, raising four children, a son who is a mechanical engineer, daughter who is an economist with a bias for fashion, another studying law and the last in school.

"They are all avid consumers of media products," he reminisced, "but none has shown any interest in becoming a journalist." There were times when wards routinely followed in their parent's professional footsteps.

Thus, if Joseph the Elder is an accountant, for instance, you will reasonably expect Joseph the Younger to take up accounting in school. These days, it is different, especially with liberal guardians like Osadolor who allowed his children to follow their career preference instead of dictating to them like an overbearing parent.

Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be

But as one who has been in the profession for decades, Osadolor knows one or two things about professionalism, about what makes a successful journalist. Hear him: "The successful practitioner should have, on the one hand, general knowledge, and on the other, specialized knowledge.

General knowledge enables you to navigate the gamut of issues while specialized knowledge makes you an expert in given fields of journalistic coverage." Above all, you can't achieve much as a professional if you are stripped of your integrity.

"Another very important quality is integrity coupled with fairness," Osadolor insists. "There is a limit to which a scoundrel can blackmail anyone.

There is also a limit to which a partisan can ply his trade because the audience is very discerning and judgmental, and if a segment of the audience rejects you, then you have lost your influence over that segment. "Perhaps nothing does more damage to a journalist and his product than reputational harm arising from integrity deficit.

If media manipulators believe that you have a price, you are worthless no matter the price tag. Nothing challenges or rattles a media manipulator than the realization that you are not his errand boy.

" To be sure, journalism in Nigeria today is unlike what it was during Osadolor's time in the halcyon days of The Guardian with great minds like Macebuh, Eddie Iroh, Onwuchekwa Jemie, Odunewu, Ogunbiyi, Olumhense and a number of intellectuals from universities either as members of the Editorial Board or regular contributors. Looking back at those glorious times and what he still thinks about the profession today, you tend to believe Osadolor when he declared in one recent interview that "journalism is a sacred calling," locating those in it "as prime actors in the broad media function of informing, educating, and entertaining.

" More than any other person, he would have long heard the age-long belief that journalism is history written in a hurry. He sure knows, pointedly insisting that "as drafters or chroniclers of history, journalists owe a sacred duty to present and future generations.

To appreciate what I am saying is to recognize the true worth of quality journalism of which scrupulous gatekeeping is an essential feature. To be a good journalist, therefore, I would say that a keen interest in public affairs, which translates to a desire for a better society, is the single most important aptitude.

"Just when you think he should be contemplating his years in retirement, of putting his feet on a puff, sipping warm milk, I-pad, I-phone, newspapers, magazines and books handy, bifocals in place the better for long reads, one or two excited grandchildren romping around in his sitting room, Kingsley Osayande Osadolor, former Deputy Managing Director of The Guardian, media consultant and lawyer, hopes to take up teaching as a next career. If he were in the civil service (which he once was as commissioner in Edo state) he would have retired compulsorily when he turned sixty on August 15 2020. But he spent a greater part of his career as a journalist from when he joined The African Guardian in 1985. Before then, Osadolor had contributed to The Nigerian Observer in Benin, Nigerian Tribune, The Herald and Satellite newspapers, mostly on and about sports.

During his youth service after graduating with a First Class Honours from Department of Mass Communication University of Nigeria Nsukka (an unsurpassed record since inception of the school in 1960) he sent op-ed pieces to The Guardian, some of which were promptly published. His NYSC was coming to an end when Osadolor responded to recruitment of editorial staff for a soon-to-be-set-up weekly, The African Guardian, modelled after popular international magazines such as TIME and Newsweek in America, African Concord and Newswatch in Nigeria.

He seemed perfect for the job. Why not? With his previous contributions to some Nigerian newspapers, a superb result from UNN, it would have been unthinkable for any editor to pass him by.

Thus was he employed, making Osadolor one of the first two editorial staff, the other being Fred Owhawha. When the maiden edition of The African Guardian hit the newsstands in January 1986, Osadolor was posted to Harare as a correspondent covering the entire East and Southern Africa.

Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be

He was recalled to Lagos in 1990 and appointed Deputy Editor of The Guardian daily. From then, in his words, "subsequent appointments followed," and rapid rise in the newsroom, making it as high as Deputy Managing Director.

In between his journalistic duties, he went on to read Law at the University of Lagos, topping it with an LLM in the same institution. He passed out of Law School with distinction.

Almost four decades after, Osadolor has indicated his interest in teaching. With his formidable resume, it is hard to imagine any of the federal, state or private universities denying him a place to mentor their students.

Transiting from the newsroom to the lecture room isn't such a novelty in some parts of the world. In the US, for instance, it is commonplace for big-foot journalists to take up professorial positions in universities, some of them finding their way to respectable institutions such as Columbia School of Journalism.

Here in Nigeria, it is almost rare to find an individual who has had a most successful run in journalism aspiring to teach or even making it to the classroom. No one remembers any of the following media gurus in Nigeria dead or alive doing time in Mass Communication or related departments in universities post-journalism: Sam Amuka, Chidi Amuta, Mamman Daura, Ray Ekpu, Dele Giwa, Abubakar Imam, Stanley Macebuh, Tony Momoh, Alade Odunewu, Yemi Ogunbiyi, Sonala Olumhense, Segun Osoba, etc.

Instead, one or two of them left the academia to work in the media. Macebuh, for example, quit his teaching job in an American university and relocated to Nigeria as pioneer MD of The Guardian.

Also, Ogunbiyi left University of Ife (Obafemi Awolowo University) to the corporate head office of The Guardian Rutam House, Lagos. If Osadolor's ambition ever comes true, he will join the ranks of Dr.

Bisi Olawunmi, former NAN New York Correspondent, who now teaches in a private university in Nigeria. In an interview published on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday last August, Osadolor mused to Funke Olaode of THISDAY that he will most likely take up teaching from now on.

Having spent much of the last three decades and half as a distinguished journalist, media consultant, special assistant, commissioner and lawyer, he hopes to crown it all as a teacher. "I equally look forward to returning to teaching," Osadolor told the journalist.

"The greater motivation for me is to be a catalyst for change through the instrumentality of my profession," insisting that as human beings, particularly on his diamond jubilee, "one continues to aspire. I give thanks to Almighty to have enabled me to record my modest accomplishments.

I look forward to acquiring more knowledge and also contributing to the body of knowledge." Osadolor had his mentorship right from home under his parents long before he decided to study Mass Communication at UNN.

As he recalled, "my parents were disciplinarians with high ethical values. They believed in and invested in our education.

There was no question about going to school without uniforms or books. When my elder brothers and I were in elementary school, it was mandatory for us to attend after-school extramural classes, called 'Lessons,' for which fees were paid in addition to school fees.

" As a youngster, he was fascinated with medicine, which he hoped to read in university. But the sight of blood dissuaded him.

What convinced Osadolor to study Mass Communication in the end was, according to him, the "PR prowess" of his parents. "It was a combination of my father and my mother's PR prowess.

I was struggling to read the papers with him. There was also a re-diffusion box in the quadrangle.

Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be

That fascinated me and stoked my interest in radio broadcasts. "Re-diffusion, by the way, was a subscription cable radio service that was the precursor of transistors.

Re-diffusion was fixed, while transistor radio is portable, easily movable, and requires only an antenna and no cable connection." Apart from his parent's mentorship in gravitating towards journalism, writers in the international magazines also inspired/ influenced the young Osadolor.

Though not physically around like his mother and father, they were something of absentee mentors far away in New York: he could feel their palpable presence on the pages of the magazines he read as a university hopeful in his father's house in Benin City, Lance Morrow particularly. Like some of his peers across Nigeria from the seventies onwards who could hardly resist the seductive prose of writers like Morrow, George J Church, Otto Friedrich, Nancy Gibbs, Paul Gray, Walter Isaacson, Pico Iyer, Hugh Sidey, John Skow, Strobe Talbot, to name a few, it was another significant step towards Osadolor's career in journalism.

So, you could say that his deep appreciation and admiration for writers in the weekly publications rubbed off on him positively such that by the time he joined African Guardian, he seemed, again, a natural fit, as he himself told the same journalist from THISDAY. "I was thrilled by the prospects of a weekly magazine because that would, I thought, give me the opportunity to follow in the footsteps of the inimitable Lance Morrow and TIME magazine which had made lasting impressions on me," Osadolor said to Olaode.

"So, I told Tommy Odemwingie (who, by the way, is an uncle to former Super Eagles striker, Osaze Odemwingie) to pass my papers for the forthcoming magazine." All of that would have gone up in a puff of smoke if Osadolor had followed his initial professional preference.

Today, judging from his career trajectory, it is impossible not to rate him among the top ten media men of his generation. There are two or so unforgettable moments journalists hold dear to heart: their first day in the newsroom and their very first publication.

Granted, Osadolor may not make much of his first published piece as a correspondent with The African Guardian because he had been published before then. But, as he has said in an interview, his first day at Rutam House was as memorable as it was historic.

"Sometime in April 1985, before my NYSC ended," Osadolor recounted, "I came to Lagos to submit my application at The Guardian. I met the Features Editor, Tommy Odemwingie.

It was the weekend after Marvin Hagler blasted Tommy Hearns with a third-round knockout in a middleweight title fight. The newsroom was abuzz with chats about the fight.

Odemwingie hinted that The Guardian was planning on starting a weekly magazine, like Concord Weekly, Newswatch, Newsweek and TIME." Continuing, he says: "Immediately after my youth service, I came back to Rutam House.

The African Guardian magazine hired Fred Ohwahwa and me as its first editorial staff, other than a handful who were redeployed from the newspaper. We were, therefore, involved in the incubation and delivery of the weekly news magazine which hit the newsstands in January 1986." In a telling intro to Olaode's tribute on Osadolor's sixtieth, "accomplished, astounding, avid, adventurous," are some of the adjectives she dressed the subject with, going further to describe him as "a Nigerian journalist of many firsts in his exciting careerBarrister Kingsley Osadolor excels with panache as a journalist, communication expert, broadcaster and scholar.

Pragmatic and passionate, his life in the last 60 years illustrates the need to be focused and inventive. From journalism to law, Osadolor has not stopped learning and is following knowledge like a 'sinking star.'

" Even more excitedly than her female counterpart, another journalist and public commentator Adeniyi, writing on Osadolor's sixtieth in The Guardian, described him as "confident, calm, and contemplative, Osadolor bears the image of the cognitive, portraying an intuitive knowledge of the world around him, spiced with experiential pedagogy, and seeking opportunities to display the samehe was prodigious, revealing his erudition in not only wise,

Kingsley Osadolor: Quintessential Media Man Teacher-to-be

witty, and elevated prose, but in the management of talented writers." Osadolor has also managed his family life reasonably well, raising four children, a son who is a mechanical engineer, daughter who is an economist with a bias for fashion, another studying law and the last in school.

"They are all avid consumers of media products," he reminisced, "but none has shown any interest in becoming a journalist." There were times when wards routinely followed in their parent's professional footsteps.

Thus, if Joseph the Elder is an accountant, for instance, you will reasonably expect Joseph the Younger to take up accounting in school. These days, it is different, especially with liberal guardians like Osadolor who allowed his children to follow their career preference instead of dictating to them like an overbearing parent.

But as one who has been in the profession for decades, Osadolor knows one or two things about professionalism, about what makes a successful journalist. Hear him: "The successful practitioner should have, on the one hand, general knowledge, and on the other, specialized knowledge.

General knowledge enables you to navigate the gamut of issues while specialized knowledge makes you an expert in given fields of journalistic coverage." Above all, you can't achieve much as a professional if you are stripped of your integrity.

"Another very important quality is integrity coupled with fairness," Osadolor insists. "There is a limit to which a scoundrel can blackmail anyone.

There is also a limit to which a partisan can ply his trade because the audience is very discerning and judgmental, and if a segment of the audience rejects you, then you have lost your influence over that segment. "Perhaps nothing does more damage to a journalist and his product than reputational harm arising from integrity deficit.

If media manipulators believe that you have a price, you are worthless no matter the price tag. Nothing challenges or rattles a media manipulator than the realization that you are not his errand boy.

" To be sure, journalism in Nigeria today is unlike what it was during Osadolor's time in the halcyon days of The Guardian with great minds like Macebuh, Eddie Iroh, Onwuchekwa Jemie, Odunewu, Ogunbiyi, Olumhense and a number of intellectuals from universities either as members of the Editorial Board or regular contributors. Looking back at those glorious times and what he still thinks about the profession today, you tend to believe Osadolor when he declared in one recent interview that "journalism is a sacred calling," locating those in it "as prime actors in the broad media function of informing, educating, and entertaining.

" More than any other person, he would have long heard the age-long belief that journalism is history written in a hurry. He sure knows, pointedly insisting that "as drafters or chroniclers of history, journalists owe a sacred duty to present and future generations.

To appreciate what I am saying is to recognize the true worth of quality journalism of which scrupulous gatekeeping is an essential feature. To be a good journalist, therefore, I would say that a keen interest in public affairs, which translates to a desire for a better society, is the single most important aptitude.

"

Load-Date: March 2, 2021

Fact-Checking Technology, Key To Combating Fake News – Olupohunda

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

July 25, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1463 words

Byline: Tomi Falade

Body

---

In this digital age, being a member of the media does not hold as much importance as it used to, especially with the influx of partly trained and untrained journalists muddying the waters of quality reporting and documentation of history. This does not, however, erase the presence of real media professionals thoroughly dedicated to their duties as the fourth estate of the realm. Bayo Olupohunda, editor-in-chief of Opera News, numbers among this class of erudites. Prior to his role at Opera, Olupohunda had been the editor of leading Nigerian online platform, Legit. With decades of experience across both online and print media, his writings have earned him both local and international awards and nominations. In this exclusive interview with TOMI FALADE, the 2014 CNN African Journalist Awards finalist speaks on his first love, journalism, and his emergence as an author with his book, 'Are You Not A Nigerian?'

Did you always see yourself pursuing a career in media?

Let's start from my teenage years at college. Even before then, I have always had a thing for the written word. In the early days, my parents would send me on errands to the vendors to buy newspapers. I always looked forward to those mornings because I enjoyed reading those newspapers. I devoured everything. And yes, I love the Op-ed pages, the opinions, editorials are my favourites. It was always a battle of who would read first in the house. In secondary school, my best subjects were English and Literature. I was bad at Mathematics but I led the whole school in English. I became a member of the Press Club where I wrote stories and had role models in the late Dele Giwa. I read Newswatch like a Bible.

ABUJA DOCTOR REVEALS HOW OVER 2,000 NIGERIAN MEN ARE NOW NATURALLY OVERCOMING TERRIBLE BEDROOM PERFORMANCE DUE TO THIS BRILLIANT DISCOVERY. DON'T BE A VICTIM!

Later, during the years when the military ruled Nigeria with an iron fist, I fell in love with The News, Tempo, The Guardian and other publications that wrote stinging criticisms of the military. In my second year in the university, I enrolled as an intern with The Guardian and that was how my journalism career took off. So yes, I have always seen myself pursuing a career in the media and my dream in the early days was to be a famous writer.

What would you say contributed to your emerging as editor of two different major online platforms in Nigeria?

ALSO READ

Let me say consistency and my willingness to adapt to changes in journalism practices driven by technology. I contributed to Guardian as a freelancer. I did a lot of stories back then and after a scholarship from the Goethe Institut, I moved to contribute to NEXT Newspaper and then later transitioned as a columnist for Punch where I was nominated for two major awards. In between, I was contributing to several online media in Nigeria and internationally. Many times I don't even get paid for those articles. I take personal development seriously and I read a lot of publications about new directions in journalism. I was quick to understand how technology will impact the practice and future of journalism. I think this understanding helped me to understand the intersection of digital media and journalism as we know it. I didn't always jump to become an editor. Like I said, I had several years writing for many traditional papers and online. My first managerial role began as head of desk at Legit (formerly Naij) where my role included experimenting with developing content for a Lagos tourism guide for international and local tourists. Some years later I rose to become editor-in-chief. I think the major reason is adaptation and flexibility. This is something lacking in many journalists who have practised in traditional journalism. The willingness and flexibility to accept the changing world of journalism and readiness to embrace it.

You are a scholar, published author, and a newsmaker. How do you marry all these roles in a way that one does not infringe on the other?

I want to be a media scholar, I'm not yet a full-blown scholar even though I have publications in journals. Yes, I am a published author. I don't know about being a newsmaker. One needs a lot of discipline to sit down to write. It really does not take a lot to manage. Focusing on your goals can help you achieve a lot and you can always manage your time. For example, when I enrolled for Masters in Media and Communications at the Pan Atlantic University, I was by then an editor and though it was tough, I still managed to see the programme through.

Your last book, 'Are You Not A Nigerian?' comprises your thoughts on diverse issues that are key to Nigeria's nationhood. Did the publication ever cause you problems?

No, why should they? Everybody knows the fundamental issues wrong with Nigeria. What I did in the book is to advance my thoughts on the socio-political issues that have dominated discourse in the country. And these are diverse issues about how our diversity has rather than being a source of strength and development has caused a lot of developmental challenges. So what I did in my book is to highlight these issues. And beyond highlighting them, it is also a way to document and preserve my writing.

Fake news and sensational content seem to be the order of the day, and untrained news readers fall prey to this every other day. As the editor-in-chief of one of the largest news portals in Africa, what do you think can be done to combat this, and who do you think should be responsible for the solution?

Fake news has always been with us. But we cannot deny the fact the emergence of social media has contributed to amplifying it. Digital penetration has also ensured more people see these content. But the good thing is that major online platforms understand and acknowledge the danger of fake news to human interaction and national security. Online media organisations are cooperating with fact-checking outlets to ensure fake news don't make it into their publications. Fact-checking is important in the effort to combat fake news. So responsible media has a duty to develop safe practices to reduce and stamp out fake news. I also think newsrooms must develop processes using technology to spot fake news. They must also develop red flags to identify fake content during sourcing. Education is important. But what I see as a challenge in an effort to combat fake news is how to convince a highly illiterate population to identify fake news. Remember those who peddle fake news do it for a purpose-either to make money or push an agenda and people tend to believe conspiracy theories based on their bias, which could be religious or ethnic. So really, the media has to be responsible and understand how fake news impacts society.

With the COVID-19 pandemic ravaging all around the world, what would you say is the future of traditional media employment in Nigeria?

COVID-19 will come and go depending on how soon a vaccine is found. But yes, at present, the future of traditional media jobs have been greatly impacted and it will take a while for this. But let me emphasise that COVID-19 is not the reason why media jobs are being eroded. The emergence of digital media is the reason why the practice of newsprints has been impacted. There is an ongoing debate about how newspapers will disappear with the dominance of digital media. I don't think this will happen in a traditional society like Nigeria where a generation of news consumers and advertisers still consider traditional media a major source of news. I think both will exist side by side.

Fact-Checking Technology, Key To Combating Fake News – Olupohunda

What's the biggest challenge you've faced as an editor of an online platform?

I think the major challenge for me will be the threat of fake news. But like I explained earlier, we are fighting fake news with technology and of course with internal checks by educating writers and making them see the consequences. At Opera News, for example, we have strict rules and internal guidelines which we share with the writers. Repeated violations of our platform, rules and regulations can lead to a ban from the Opera News.

What next can we expect from Bayo Olupohunda, what's the next for you?

I want to write more. There is a lot of gap in the media which needs to be filled. I think there has been too much focus on political reporting at the expense of social issues. With the failure of many institutions in Nigeria, the public expects the media to be their voice especially that of the disadvantaged groups. I hope I can also complete another book and eventually teach media to young journalists in future.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/72/159565336946.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/76/159565336948.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/61/159565336949.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/37/159565336954.jpeg>

Load-Date: July 25, 2020

---

End of Document

Uneven Steps: Journey of nightmares

The Nation (Nigeria)

October 27, 2021 Wednesday

Copyright 2021 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1978 words

Body

---

It is not often that you have a book review begin with the author; but the fact remains that the content of a book is as good as the writer. The author transfers his knowledge and personage onto the package. The integrity of the author gives impetus to the book and believability to the content.

The author of Uneven Steps: The story of the Nigerian Guild of Editors (NGE), Mr Lanre Idowu, can be described as a tested combatant and a Field Marshall in journalism. He is a frontline participant in its affairs and a first class traveller in the journey of the Guild of Nigerian Editors (NGE). So writing about the journey of the guild, for him, is like reliving an experience.

The main title of the book, Uneven Steps summarises the story of the guild. It signposts a travel episode of a giant who toddles along on a necessary trip harassed by headwinds: climbing hills and descending valleys with pain and stress; yet clinging on to the hope that along the way it will encounter a benevolent spirit that will confer on it the kind of status commensurate with public expectations of its members.

A giant that is always apprehensive of the verdict of history, going by the original intentions of the founding fathers; and the realities of modern times, particularly as it affects the practice and the status of the body of practitioners. A journey full of nightmares: some imagined, some imposed; but largely self-inflicted.

The book narrates how sometimes the guild moves closer to attainment of its ideals; but as hope rises, the factors that hold all of us and the country hostage sneak in, and the light dims and the concert goes awry. When it happens, the editors and the guild walk the scene with uneven steps. Editors are not alien to sour grapes, they encounter them in their search for what makes them what they are; in the process they eat some, and the experience often has never been palatable.

So, going through the book, it looks obvious that the state of the NGE, which is just about a year younger than the country itself, is not different from the story of the country - audacious but not firmly established, moving but unstable. At some stage the steps would be firm but along the line they would wobble and then become uneven. In fact, a giant with feet of clay!

Uneven Steps: Journey of nightmares

The guild was given birth to by great minds and 'ancestors' of the journalism profession, eminently acknowledged in Chapter Three. It was produced in the factory of rebellion, to avert annihilation by capitalists who saw the media as the vehicle to drive and sustain their ambitions. It was also to stave off discrimination in the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ). It was, therefore, a child of circumstance.

Idowu says it was, in part, the product of reverse discrimination in the NUJ. The editor was a hired hand who could be directed and fired at will. But editors are not agberos whose major pre-occupation is to load vehicles with no qualms as to capacity and safety considerations. The agbero's interest is to load the vehicle and get his commission - whether or not the vehicle gets to its destination safely, is none of his business. Editors are not cast in that mold.

The pioneers wanted protection and relevance; they needed to do their jobs professionally, and with integrity. They formed the guild. They started the journey well, but the vagaries of weather and the harshness of the geopolitical tendencies coupled with the whims of the economic climate affected the smoothness of the journey, leading to tiredness, stress, despondency and ultimately uneven steps.

Notwithstanding tha Idowu himself is a high priest in the congregation, he never pulled his punches where the sacrament went sour. He never also failed to beam the shining lights where appropriate. He is not one who allows sentiments to interfere with his conclusions. Wherever he saw a spade, he called it by its real name.

The book is done in a 6x9 inches format with 214 pages, including 20 pages of front matter (Dedication, Abbreviations, Tables, Foreword, Preface and acknowledgements) and 45 pages of back matter (References, Appendixes and Indexes). There are 16 pages of images of past officials and events of the Guild. It is a catalogue of the triumphs and travails of the Guild in its sixty years. It is dedicated to the continued search for meaning and responsibility in the media and its promotion as a strong pillar of democracy and an agent of national development.

The main section starts with abbreviations of regular organs and institutions mentioned in the book; then tables of laws and cases, followed by the Foreword written by a revered 'ancestor' of the profession, the late Prince Tony Momoh. The author wrote the Preface covering almost three and half pages. Acknowledgements and the Content pages follow before the first chapter.

The main story is set in 17 chapters. The first chapter talks about the birth of the guild - In the beginning; followed by The Press and Independence; The Guilds founding fathers; The Guild under military rule (1966-79); the Guild in the Second Republic (1979 - 1983); In search of the Guild (1983 - 1988); Resuscitation of the Guild (1988); Between Resurgence and Grovelling (1988-1992) and the Guild and Military Repression (19933 - 1998), in that order.

Other chapters include: A more assertive Guild; Constitutional Crises in the Guild; The Guild's fellowship Award; Who is an Editor; The Editor in the Digital Age; The Associate Membership Conundrum; Who funds the Guild and The future of the Guild.

The book paints the Guild as a not too healthy child: a child with a fainting spirit; a body that is often missing in action during critical times - it disappears and returns limp; often brought back to life through a resuscitation process. For instance, in Chapter Six: In search of the Guild (1983 -1988), Idowu wrote that during the turbulent years of Decree No. 4 of 1984 when 'the law was in no mood for journalistic adventurism' and when media houses were haunted at will, including the proscription of Newswatch magazine (Proscription from Circulation, Decree No.6 of 1987), the guild was in limbo.

He put it this way: 'While the NPAN and NUJ were in touch with the government to cut short the ban of Newswatch, the editors were missing in action. Since the fallout of the Minna Convention of 1982, there had been no professional body of editors to engage government'. It took some kind of Necodemus moves, using some editors in government-owned media as medics, to bring the ailing Guild back to life. Idowu saw the move as part of the grand design by 'government to woo the press, construct a semblance of amity and empanel a professional association for periodic engagement'.

Uneven Steps: Journey of nightmares

Pages 56 to 63 covering two chapters unveiled the helpless and seemingly escapist nature of the Guild at some point, even in the face of threats, torments, torture and emasculation of its members and the media. For instance on page 57, veteran journalist Chris Okolie was quoted (1988) as telling an executive member: 'During the murder of Dele Giwa your executive kept mute. So, too, was your executive helpless when Ray Ekpu was charged with murder and arson. The executive did nothing when Daily Sketch and Tribune editors were put under pressure. Likewise the same executive looked the other way when Newswatch was proscribed for publishing the Politbureau report'.

The Guild was still recuperating when new viruses were introduced into its system - the regular trademark of our woes as a political entity - Region and Religion. Coupled with the non- categorical definition of who an editor is in the electronic media, these became the underlying ailments that further crippled the Guild, a disability it is still struggling with till this day.

It was at the Minna Convention of 1982 that the infection occurred. In spite of the quality of practitioners then, the fumes of politics and the rascality in some quarters choked the Guild and it was placed on a ventilator until the Babangida regime in 1988 applied pressure on its chest; and was subsequently revived by proxy editors from government-owned organisations. Chapters Six and Seven deal with those issues.

So, did the Guild get well soon? Chapters Seven to Nine did not seem to discharge the patient, as the record shows that the status was between resurgence and groveling, especially as members came under another round of military repression between 1993 and 1998. It was not until 1998 that the Guild was on its feet and became more assertive; but the excitement of recovery after being bedridden for a long period and the zeal to fortify its ranks against another epidemic of the Minna dimension led to a constitutional crisis that almost returned the Guild to the casualty ward (Chapter 11).

One nagging symptom that is yet to find appropriate prescription and remedy is the editor himself. Who is the Editor and who should be a member of the NGE? If an ailment is not properly defined and diagnosed, prescription and treatment become difficult. And that's a major challenge of the Guild. From the presentation, this seems to have become a problem since the Minna Convention, as indicated in Chapter Five.

In Chapter 13, Idowu states that the original intention of the Guild was to have a club of de jure and de facto editors who, in law and in fact, determine what goes into publications. This, it is stated, made it easier for the founding fathers to agree on who a newspaper editor or deputy was. 'It was also not controversial to determine who qualified as an associate member'.

Throughout the book, the issue of professionalism and ethics rings loud. The desirability or otherwise of a Press Council can also be found in chapter 4. In fact in Chapter 8, the book quotes one of the Guild's past presidents, Alhaji Waida Maida as having told his colleagues in 1991 that 'the media are gradually losing believability and we must do something to arrest this trend. We ought to appreciate the weight of our responsibility in the sustenance of democratic rule once the military hands over to the civilians'. Whether that has been achieved, the answer blows in the wind.

It's not all gloom. Apart from indications in about three preceding chapters, the concluding chapter on the Future of the Guild states clearly that there is a lot to commend the body for, if assessed by its stated objectives. For one, the search for a code of ethics has been successfully completed and periodic enlivening of its provisions, especially at periods of general elections, is ongoing.

The author displays a monumental power of recall and a professional grasp of perspectives. He made about 74 citations from key players to back up his narrative on particular subject matters. The book is a befitting trophy for the Guild at 60. It is one book that every journalist, journalism teacher, journalism school and those interested in the growth of journalism practice, should have. In fact, it should find space in every library. It is both a reference book and a history book.

The writer has done his bit in chronicling the journey of the Guild in the last 60 years of its existence. Although the founding fathers championed a course that was meant to give impetus to the practice and the profession, lack of trust and leadership incongruities threatened the concord that existed in the fold at the beginning, a development that has persisted till this day.

Uneven Steps: Journey of nightmares

There is, therefore, the need for members to arise, like the tribune of old, and form a vanguard to protect and pilot the affairs of the body. We must channel all our efforts towards building a strong independent body that can, in one accord, deliver a sucker punch when challenged. We must resolve at all times to remain steadfast to the ideals of the profession and the nurturing of a galaxy of stars. We should be an inspiration to other professional bodies, God being our guardian.

Load-Date: October 28, 2021

---

End of Document

EBONY, and Ebonygate revisited

The Nation (Nigeria)

August 13, 2019 Tuesday

Copyright 2019 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1392 words

Body

---

WITH the recent sale by public auction of its archives of more than four million black-and-white photographs, some of them prize-winning and some never published before, the monthly lifestyle magazine EBONY which defined and captured the black experience in America like no other for two generations has finally gone out of business.

Priced at $46 million, the archives were sold for $30 million. The proceeds will be used to offset part of the debts of the Johnson Publishing Company, owners of the magazine. The company filed for bankruptcy liquidation, some three years ago, unable to arrange financing or a sale.

Fears were rife that EBONY's iconic pictures would fall into the hands of a private-equity firm that may choose to dispose of them as it pleases. In the event, they were purchased by a consortium of four leading private foundations, which will donate them to the National Museum of African American History and Culture at the Smithsonian Institution and the Getty Research Institute.

This arrangement guarantees the archives will be preserved for posterity and made accessible to the public

EBONY was launched in 1945, in Chicago, by John H. Johnson, a visionary entrepreneur concerned 'to show the Negroes (as African Americans were then called) but also white people that Negroes also got married, held beauty contests, gave parties, ran successful businesses, and did all the other normal things of life.'

Johnson's daughter, who succeeded him as publisher, said the mission was to make EBONY the 'curator of the African-American experience, past, present, and future.' It fulfilled the first two parts of its mission admirably. But its future now lies behind it, sadly, after a run of 71 years.

Within a few years of its debut, EBONY became a habit. There was hardly any black home in the United States where you would not find a copy. It was read and passed along, to be read and passed along until every member of the household had savoured its contents. Those who could not read were rewarded with its white-and-black pictures that captured arrestingly all aspects of black culture, from the ghetto to the executive suite, and the Boardroom, and ultimately to the Presidency.

It was a lifestyle magazine with a difference. It depicted African American entertainers, athletes and movie actors and performing artistes all right. But it also showcased black scientists, lawyers, diplomats, legislators, community leaders, inventors, engineers, astronauts, corporate executives, commanding officers in the armed services and, generally, achievers in every sphere of American life.

EBONY, and Ebonygate revisited

Its tone was optimistic, upbeat. But you could never accuse EBONY of puffery, for the stories were substantive, well researched, and very well written. The photo-essay it published from time to time was a model of story conception and execution.

Its stablemate Jet, published in a much smaller format, debuted in 1951 as 'the weekly Negro news magazine.' Together, EBONY and Jet captured the essence of black life in America like no other journals. Their challenge was to define or redefine for America black Americans, who were for the most part presented with mutilated images of themselves by the dominant media.

The field was not entirely bereft of black journals. There were, for example, the Chicago Defender, the Baltimore Afro-American and Amsterdam News based in Harlem, New York. These were important voices and vehicles in their communities, but their circulation and impact were modest.

At the launch of EBONY, many newspapers in the American South, did not publish pictures of blacks as a matter of policy. Large sections of the print media did not report the stirrings that culminated in the civil rights movement, the sit-ins and protests that challenged Jim Crow laws and caused them to be abolished. It was only in the late 1990s that a newspaper in Jackson, Miss, sought to atone for this denial by omission and published supplements chronicling important news stories of the civil rights it had not reported.

Television was just as complicit.

EBONY changed all that. Black people, many of them for the first time, could see black people like themselves as leading achievers and key public figures, in positions they did not know black people could hold and performing roles they never thought black people could play; they saw Africans in their colourful native attires on the world stage as kings and presidents and prime ministers and statesmen.

It fostered black pride. It promoted Black role models and fired black aspirations. Its yearly issue profiling the 100 Most Influential Blacks in America was a parade of excellent role models for aspiring African Americans. And if you wanted to reach the attentive black audience EBONY was the medium that gave you the best value for your advertisement budget.

The coming of the Internet opened the era of free content. Television generally, and cable television in particular, offered round-the-clock programming that gravely undermined newspaper and magazine readership. Advertisers shifted to digital platforms and television even as newspaper production costs soared, forcing such venerable publications like TIME and NEWSWEEK to abandon the business model that had served them so profitably for decades.

EBONY's fortunes contracted in this altered environment. Debts mounted. Operations became unsustainable. Unable to arrange financing or find a buyer, it filed for bankruptcy liquidation three years ago. The sale last month of its photography assets closed what will go down as one of the most eventful chapters in the history of American journalism and black culture.

Unfortunately, generations of Nigerians will probably remember EBONY in an entirely different context

Despite its iconic status in the African American experience, the magazine had no market presence in Nigeria or anywhere outside the United States. Many Nigerians were acquainted with it only by its reputation. Some had read pass-along copies at infrequent intervals, courtesy of Nigerians living in or returning from the United States. You certainly could not pick up a copy at the newsstand as you could TIME and Newsweek.

Still, in 1990, EBONY magazine figured in Nigerian politics the way few foreign journals had done before or since. In the process, it bequeathed the term Ebonygate to the nation's vocabulary of sleaze.

Military president Ibrahim Babangida's benighted Structural Adjustment Programme (SAP) had sapped the economy, turning basic needs into luxuries and eviscerating the middle class. Hunger stalked the countryside, and many Nigerians were reduced to rummaging through dustbins for food scraps.

EBONY, and Ebonygate revisited

Anti-SAP demonstrations, which turned violent in many cities, broke out across the country, fuelled by rumours that Babangida had stashed away some $3 billion from the national treasury in foreign banks, and that he and his wife owned, among other properties, a diamond watch factory in France.

The organizers cited EBONY magazine as their source.

Conspicuous among the teeming protesters in Lagos was the respected educator and founder of Mayflower School, Ikenne, Dr Tai Solarin, in his trademark floppy hat, khaki shirt and shorts. In an interview he had made some reference to Babangida's rumoured offshore wealth - a key grievance of the demonstrators.

The claim that the story came out of EBONY was implausible through and through. It was not EBONY's fare. But no matter.

State security officials seized Solarin and subjected him to a brutal inquisition on live national television, conducted by Col. Kunle Togun, who had been living under a cloud of suspicion of complicity in the 1985 parcel-bomb murder of the crusading journalist, Dele Giwa

What was Solarin's source? Did he verify it? As an educator and an influential citizen, was he unaware that he had an obligation to verify the information so as not to lend his authority to subversive rumours?

Official desperation did not end there. The authorities dispatched a team to Chicago to urge EBONY publisher Johnson to state categorically, for the public record, that at no time had the magazine carried the story attributed to it. Johnson refused the strange demand.

And to this day in Nigeria, Ebonygate carries the resonance of rumour, gossip, or falsehood, a slur on the reputation of the foremost journal of the African American experience that was.

Load-Date: August 16, 2019

---

End of Document

Why Nigerian government should kill NBC

PM News

August 21, 2022 Sunday

Copyright 2022 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2580 words

Body

---

The hypothesis which states that words, either written or spoken, are the worst enemy of despots and totalitarian regimes has been tested overtime. Words are lethal, superior to mortars and armaments of war and penetrate deeper than bullets. Words are equally known to eventually precipitate the collapse of despotic regimes. It then stands to reason that dictators must wage war on words.

Merve Buyuksarac found out the above when it was almost too late. Crowned Miss Turkey in 2006, Merve's brush with the imperial power of Recep Tayyip Erdogan began like a joke. On her Instagram page, assuming that poetic license shawled her from the biting proboscis of imperial power, she poured scum at what she referred to as high level corruption and sleaze in Turkey. Couching this in very inviting poetic lines, Merve located Erdogan as the kingpin and epicenter of the rot. Pronto, as the Americans say, she was arrested and on May 31, given a suspended prison sentence of 14 months. Turkey frowns at such impudence of insulting the imperial office of the president. Such affront could net its violator up to four years imprisonment. More than 1800 people have run afoul of this law.

Like Erdogan, Tunisian President from 1987 to 2011, Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, widely known as Ben Ali, was ruthless and diffident of the possibilities of free speech. He was dictatorial, repressive and his 23-year rule of Tunisia was signposted by manacles and barbs. Amnesty International, Freedom House and other international human rights group voted Ali's regime as terror personified and his regime authoritarian because he muzzled free speech. Under his watch, Tunisia became a police state and ranked 144th out of 173 countries of the world in repression of free speech.

Ben Ali abridged fundamental freedoms in the bid to sustain his authority. He did this by limiting the spread of information and suppressing citizens who wanted to speak out against his government's multiplicity of violations of human rights. If you dared oppose Ali in the media, you were due for harsh consequences, the least being imprisonment. Apart from arbitrary jailing, he also generously deployed arbitrary disappearance of activists and journalists who had the temerity to speak against his demonic rule. The way he censured and censored free speech was through the control of information that could be channeled past the Tunisian borders. Smuggling books into Tunisia was the only way out for anyone who craved information. But you had to pay the very corrupt Tunisian police heavy bribe. If, for any reason, the police failed to play ball and you were caught, the smuggler was liable to a long jail sentence.

Why Nigerian government should kill NBC

When foreign censure was becoming boring and jangling to him, Ben Ali decided that privatization of the Tunisian media would do the magic for his censorship of free speech. This was unbeknown to the rest of the world. The world then gave him unmerited applauses. The claps had not abated by the time he bared his fangs. He ensured that his daughter, Cyrine Ben-Ali, secured ownership of the only internet provider available in Tunisia. Of course, a welter of critical journalism outfits sprung up to take their destinies in their hands. One of such was Kalima. Kalima was a media group that published an online magazine and also had a radio outfit. In 2009, Ali shut Kalima down for being too critical of his government and family. In Tunisia, not only did journalists face heavy censure, Emperor Ali also foisted a regime of heavy police harassment on news disseminators. The ones unlucky to get arrested by his goons were often mercilessly tortured.

On January 14, 2011 however, Ben Ali's cup ran over. Like the proverbial offspring of a cobra that ensures its death, the Arab Spring revolution suddenly erupted, with Tunisia as its test case. On December 17, 2010, Mohamed Bouazizi, the later-to-be-famous street vendor, suddenly set himself on fire and his self-immolation became a catalyst for the Tunisian Revolution, christened Arab Spring, ultimately setting alight the whole of the Arab enclave. It became a vote of no confidence on autocratic leaders. Bouazizi's wares had been confiscated, as well as being humiliated and harassed by a Tunisian municipal official and her aides. In the midst of this month-long protest, sensing that his time was up, Ali and his wife, Leila and their three children, fled to Saudi Arabia. He subsequently died on September 19, 2019 in exile.

Despots and totalitarian governments all over the world, including those who shawl themselves with veneers of democracy, cannot stand free speech. Their modern day variant dictators are smart enough to know that a war on freedom of speech is a war against their existential survival.

It is why despots' first priority in government is to impose restrictions on freedom of speech. This was what the Russian Bolsheviks did in 1917. The very day after the coup d'etat that ushered the regime into power, its first assignment was limiting freedom of speech by proclaiming the 'Decree on the Press,' through which newspapers considered to be 'sowing discord by libelous distortion of facts' were shut down. It was same way that, a few months after its entry into power in 1933, the German National Socialist Government began attacks on books and acquisition of knowledge. It burnt books in their millions, followed by an introduction of knee-jerk censorship by its Ministry of Propaganda. If you check the ratings of press freedom by international organizations as Freedom House, communist states like Vietnam, Cuba, China, North Korea and harsh despotic governments like those of Syria, Iran, Belarus, Sudan and Turkmenistan lead from the rear. To ensure their survival, totalitarian states pad themselves up with very strong propaganda machine with which they shore up an obvious dearth of free speech and credible information, all geared towards the manipulation of the people's minds.

Asked what his disposition would be to free speech when he forcefully took over power from Shehu Shagari at the twilight of 1983, a dour General Muhammadu Buhari unapologetically proclaimed, like a tiger about to tear flesh off an animal's bones, that he would, with his bloodthirsty military Decree incisors, peel off the flesh of free speech. He said this in an interview with the trio of Dele Giwa, Yakubu Mohammed and Ray Ekpu on February 6, 1984. For Nigerians to now expect a man who had such untainted disdain for free speech in 1984 to have purged himself of his self-constitutive baying for blood of press freedom would be expecting a tiger to morph out of its bone-crushing tigritude.

Military despots like General Buhari knew that the Nigerian press has a very rich history, indeed, that the Nigerian press is older than and predates the Nigerian state. With the installation of the first printing press in 1846 by the Presbyterian Church in Calabar and the founding, eight years after, precisely in 1854, of the Iwe Irohin by the Reverend Henry Townsend of the Church Missionary Society, (CSM) the Nigeria which came out of the 1914 amalgamation was younger in historical antecedents than what is today the Nigerian press.

Since 1846, the press has been a formidable influence in the growth of Nigeria. Nnamdi Azikiwe, one of the patrons of the Nigerian press, who published the ubiquitous West African Pilot newspaper, while eulogizing the history of pioneers of Nigerian press, said their activities were 'identical with the intellectual and material developments of Nigeria', while also submitting that Nigeria produced a 'galaxy of immortal journalists!' who played a unique part 'in this corner of the earth in the great crusade for human freedom.'

Why Nigerian government should kill NBC

. Thereafter, for 35 years, the Nigerian press moved with Nigeria in its travails under the emergent military rule. Since 1999 when full-blown democracy returned to Nigeria, the press has had a wider horizon. There are more modern equipment and even multiplicity of platforms for mass communication. The radio is no longer strictly controlled by the Federal Government as the Radio Nigeria, a federally owned organization, nor is television strictly owned by government. Social media has widened the space and made information dissemination available on the web of the wide world. The radio has today grown to become a very powerful octopus of the Nigerian media, with the multiplicity of radio ownership.

As said earlier, to run a regime which unpretentiously simulates the totalitarian government in China or Turkmenistan, in a 21st century world that has total aversion for despots, Buhari needed a character like Lai Mohammed. Adolf Hitler also needed Lai's professional ancestor, German Nazi politician and Gauleiter of Berlin, Paul Joseph Goebbels. Goebbels had turned the spleen of the world in his official assignment as chief propagandist for the Nazi Party, as well as Reich Minister of Propaganda from 1933 to 1934. To be able to clone Goebbels effectively, Lai must have mopped up all essays on this unexampled propaganda warlord. Buhari must have been fascinated by Lai's very mercurial showing as ACN and APC propaganda terror machine. Today, Lai has had an exemplary mastery of the game of divisiveness, crass governmental lies and artful manipulations.

The first thing Lai did upon being announced minister of information was to do a generational circum-guessing of what Goebbels would do if he were to be nominated by an Adolf in a 21st century Nigeria. Unlike Europe or Germany of the 1930s, the print media has lost its savour massively. The hugely pillaged Nigerian economy and the unfavourable global economic climate have largely affected the purchasing power of readers. Newsprint has risen to somewhere close to the stratosphere where only a few hands could reach. While the Nigerian print press recorded over a century of pervasive influence, respect and contributions to communication, there is no doubting the fact that its influence is waning. Some extremist views even submit that newspaper press is nearing its extinction.

The advent of the social media and internet usage has relegated hardcopy news to a secondary role, prompting a navigation of the print press online and de-emphasis of printing. The internet then became breeding ground for billions of citizens of the world and a borderless ground of opportunity to share opinions freely without let. It also became a floor for exchange of personal and group communication. Like the biblical account of the devil that is roaring, seeking who to devour, despots also moved with citizens to the internet. It became a hunting ground for tyrants whose disdain for freedom of expression is as rotund as a bed bug that has amply sucked its victim's blood.

All dictators needed to do was to transit from their old tactics of silencing dissidents and journalists into a new tactic of muzzling authors of tweets and posts that affront their quest to continue to luster in their imperial fiefdom. The road to repression by totalitarians today is paved with bile and hatred for Facebook, Twitter and Instagram aficionados. However, the pestilence of dwindling believability of news received from the internet, through the orgy of fake news, has cast a huge pall on cyber information. For totalitarians and despots, the only alternative left is for them to activate their terror on the broadcast media of radio and television.

Broadcasting is unique and is growing in leaps and bounds as means of mass communication. While its effect is instantaneous and possesses tremendous power to penetrate a multiplicity of locales in a matter of minutes, this power is rivaled only by social media as means of communication. The power of the broadcast media is also in that, voices, videos and pictures can be transmitted to a large number of listeners and viewers who reside in thousands of kilometers distance.

Broadcast media's pervasive influence is a threat to despots and budding Haitian Papa and Baby Doc regimes like Buhari's. So when, towards the twilight of last week, through its puppet, the National Broadcasting Commission, (NBC) the Buhari government revoked the licenses of 52 broadcast media houses, it merely thought out of its despotic box. It was same thing Tunisian Ben Ali did by appointing his daughter as sole licensee of internet broadcast.

Why Nigerian government should kill NBC

Like all modern day despots who fashion novel methods of abridging free speech, Buhari chose an innocuous, economic weapon to deal with press freedom and free speech. This tactic falls in line with what the Southeast Asian country of Myanmar did to poet Maung Saungkha in Burma. Writing on his Facebook post that he had a tattoo of Myint Swe, Acting President of Myabnmar, on his penis, Saungkha was arrested, tried and found guilty for defamation. He was then sentenced to a six-month jail term. It later turned out that the poet lied - he actually possessed no such tattoo! To the Swe puppet and the puppeteers however, the mere fact that Saungkha made reference to such 'heinous' issue in an off-color poem courted the imperial wrath of the state.

NBC's ostensible grouse with the broadcast outfits was that 'they failed to renew their licenses as required by law.' Saddled with the role of regulating the broadcast industry, NBC has acted more as a cudgel in the hands of Buhari's Goebbels in its arbitrary imposition of fines on TV and radio stations over programmes that questioned the legitimacy of the Buhari government. After paying a huge sum for licence, the NBC again arbitrarily demands a 2.5% to be paid by these broadcast houses for every year of their operation. This is in an era where electricity supply is near zero and where diesel is sold for about N850 a litre. Nigerians have also queried the quixotic addition of the line, 'in view of this development, the continued operation of the debtor stations is illegal and constitutes a threat to national security,' to reasons why the NBC had to revoke the licences of the outfits.

Unknown to it, by shrinking the space against credible sources of information as represented by the 52 broadcast outfits which operated under the radar of the NBC, the Buhari government gave vent to a goblin it had repelled from mutating in the Nigerian space - multiplicity of fake news. As opposed to its manual of operation as broadcast regulator in its advisory capacity to the federal government, the NBC has become the Rottweiler of the Buhari government. It is neither autonomous, independent nor does it shun interference. The over-politicization of the commission and how the so-called regulator has morphed into Lai Mohammed's attack dog is a miserable mutation. By hacking those 52 broadcast media with its sledgehammer, Buhari has rendered many Nigerians jobless.

When you look at the Nigerian governmental firmament to find out where the repressive weapon of the Buhari government against free speech is hung, look no further: It is in NBC! The government does not want to hound individuals into prison as it did with Tunde Thompson and Nduka Irabor, via draconian Decree 4 of 1983 in its first coming. This has the tendency of attracting unnecessary attention and international odium. Its target now is institutional repression. That is why Nigerians must not take this arbitrary despotism cloaked in the shawl of economic generation for the Federal Government lying low. Our ultimate must be to see the end of NBC.

*Festus Adedayo, journalist, lawyer and public affairs analyst, writes from Ibadan

Load-Date: August 22, 2022

Tony Momoh: A Statesman

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

April 23, 2019 Tuesday

Copyright 2019 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1719 words

Byline: Our Correspondents

Body

---

Prince Tony Momoh, the 165th child of King Momoh I of Auchi is 80 years old. I have known him for 42 years now. As a young reporter in the Nigerian Chronicle in Calabar I was one of the ambitious young men who wanted to sit on the editorial chair when it fell vacant. Six other people had the same ambition. So our General Manager, Chief Effiong Essien, an ex-staff of the Daily Times, thought it was a good idea to bring a respected journalist from a respected newspaper to come and do the needful. For Essien who was a stickler for excellence it was a nice way of keeping ethnic titans at bay if the decision as to who should edit the two titles in the Corporation was done by a prominent Editor as Tony Momoh, who was at the time the Editor of Daily Times. In the 70s, if you sent a young person to buy you a newspaper you didn't need to tell him the name of the paper. He knew that it was the Daily Times. That is the level of reverence with which the Daily Times was held at the time. That reverence was shared by any man who sat on the chair as its Editor. He was seen among journalists at the time as the primus inter pares.

Momoh was brought into Calabar to conduct a written, practical test for the seven of us who wanted the job of the Daily and Sunday Editors. I applied for the post of the Sunday Editor but we all took the same examination. The next day we all went to the Public Service Commission for an interview. Momoh was there too. When my turn to be interviewed came I was told "you came first in the written exam." I said I didn't know. And they asked why I did not apply for the post of Editor of the Daily paper. I told them we were informed that the Ministry of Information had its preferred candidate for that office. They said there was no such thing, that they would take their decision based on the written exam and the interview. They asked me the difference between a daily and Sunday newspaper. I told them. They asked me "can you edit a daily newspaper?" I replied in the affirmative. The job – a job I did not apply for – was given to me much to the dismay of the ethnic jingoists who were pushing for their candidates. I was told that Prince Momoh told the interviewing panel that since they bothered to bring him to come and conduct a written test it was better to stick to the result of the test. Those were the days when merit was a cherished asset in Nigeria's public service. But on assumption of duty as the Editor of the Nigerian Chronicle I realised that my problems were just beginning. I had won the battle but not the war. The fellows in the production department who were largely from the tribe that wanted their son to be the editor gave me hell. I had to report them to the General Manager, Chief Effiong Essien, who called them to order.

Tony Momoh: A Statesman

Tony Momoh had been almost everything there was to be in the journalism business, editor, a trainer, a manager and a member of the Press Council under the venerable Alade Odunewu.

When he was appointed Minister of Information by President Ibrahim Babangida he had a rough time from his colleagues who thought that he was the mastermind behind the enactment of a Press Council decree that was the equivalent of a censorship code. They frustrated the functioning of the Press Council decree until it was reviewed. The day the revised version was to be launched I asked Alade Odunewu whether he had read it, he answered in the negative. I was worried that we had all assembled to validate a Press Council whose content we were not aware of. Alade Odunewu said to me that Momoh had assured him that there was nothing to worry about. That was the level of trust that Momoh was able to extract from his colleagues even on an issue that was crucial to the survival of their industry. The press Council issue resurfaced during the Administration of General Abdulsalam Abubakar. At that time Malam Ismaila Isa was the President of the NPAN and I was the General Secretary. We labored to panel-beat the Press Council decree into a tolerable shape but the officials thought they knew better. They injected all kinds of obnoxious clauses that made nonsense of our efforts at reaching an acceptable decision. It was a big surprise that the 8th National Assembly had a brain wave and dusted up the idea in quite a draconian form at a time that the revolution in digital journalism has made the Press Council idea an anathema.

When the Head of State, Sani Abacha, came up with the idea of the National Mass Media Commission and Press Court in the 1995 Draft Constitution it was Momoh, who we called upon to look at the fine prints and tell us the unseen implications. We held series of meetings which led to the publication of the position of the Nigerian Press Organisation. It was a testy period for the Nigerian press. On one occasion, Uncle Sam Amuka, publisher of the Vanguard and Life Patron of the NPAN, said to me: "Ray, you have to draft the communique for these meetings at home and bring so that we do not waste too much time at these meetings. If we spend too much time discussing, we may all be rounded up and put in prison." His advice made me a proactive Secretary of the group.

When Momoh was the Minister of Information he did something that I cannot forget. He called me to come and see him in his office in Lagos. When I got there he told me that President Babangida was planning to go to France in a month's time. He needed a document published in English and French for the trip. His officials in the Ministry told him they would need three months to produce it. And he did not have three months to spare. So he said to himself, I know a group of people who can do it within two weeks, the Newswatch Boys. That is why I sent for you, he said. I waited in his office while he arranged for the funds for the execution of the job which had a two-week deadline. I collected the money and the materials and told him he could go to bed, that we would deliver on schedule. I came back to the office and told my people it was an emergency and that if the Minister thought we had the magic we needed to let him know that indeed we had it. We delivered the job to Momoh's house within five days – on a Sunday. He trusted us and we delivered nine days before the deadline. When I called him on that Sunday to say I wanted to come and see him he said "I hope there is no problem." I said, "There is a problem. That's why I want to come and see you." When I got to his house he was in panic. He asked "what is the problem?" I said, "the problem is that I have come to deliver the job." We both laughed. He was eminently relieved.

Dele Giwa, the first Editor in Chief of Newswatch was from Edo State, the Auchi area from which Momoh comes. Both of them had worked in the Daily Times. Both of them admired each other's professionalism and dedication to duty and got close. When we started Newswatch, Momoh was the Minister of Information and Dele related to him well. When Dele was killed in the parcel bomb incident Momoh was saddened by it and promised, without knowing who might have done the deed, that the government would investigate the assassination. As events unfolded and we pointed accusing fingers at some government officials Momoh backtracked. He said that a "special probe would serve no useful purpose." I was sorry for him because he was in a difficult situation, the equivalent of being between the rock and the hard place. I knew there was nothing he could do. He could not set up a commission of inquiry on the matter by himself nor could he compel his bosses to do so. I am sure it was a sad moment for him too. He lost a man who was like his brother in such circumstance and he could do nothing to get to the bottom of the matter. The next challenge for him was on the burial of Dele. The family had decided that we could bury him in Lagos. Momoh stepped into the issue and wrote a letter to me saying that by their custom eminent persons are never buried in a foreign land. I told him it wasn't his decision but that of Dele's family. Eventually the corpse was taken to Ugbekpe Ekperi, Dele's village, for burial because several people appealed to the family not to create a situation where there would be a riot in Lagos if they insisted on burying him in Lagos.

Tony Momoh: A Statesman

Momoh has fought many battles in his illustrious life. He challenged the Senate under the leadership of Dr. Joseph Wayas on the issue of disclosing information received in confidence. The Senate had summoned him when he was Editor of Daily Times to appear before it. Rather than subject himself to the possible harassment that awaited him he took the Senate to Court asking the court to declare that a journalist had the right to withhold information that he acquired in confidence.

Momoh, on one occasion, had challenged an armed robber who attacked him. Momoh disarmed him and took the rifle to the police. If you needed the evidence of his courage, there it is.

His foray into politics apparently surprised many of his friends and admirers because he doesn't look like the political type. How could the crookery in Nigeria politics have any drawing power for him? Apparently, he went into it because of his belief in the Buhari mystique or the faith in his touted saintliness. He was Chairman of the Congress for Progressive Change, Buhari's party which did not make any significant electoral impact. With the merger of some parties into the APC Momoh also went along, staying by Buhari's side all the way. He made a famous statement to the effect that if President Buhari does not perform they should be stoned. The jury is still out. Even though the government has not performed wonderfully, no one has stoned them apparently because, as civilised people, we do not want the Taliban punishment formula in our country. So Momoh and co have escaped the stoning that he asked for but we have been stoning them with our tongues.

Something that has to be said about Momoh's foray into politics is that he has conducted himself decently, leaving the established rabble rousers in his party to do their dirty business. I think everything considered Prince Tony Momoh, journalist, lawyer and politician deserves, by his public and private conduct, to be recognised as a statesman.

The post Tony Momoh: A Statesman appeared first on Independent Newspapers Nigeria.

Load-Date: April 23, 2019

---

End of Document

We need selfless, incorruptible leaders —Cleric

Nigerian Tribune

September 24, 2017 Sunday

Copyright 2017 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 601 words

Body

---

The Archbishop of Ecclesiastical Province of Lagos, His Grace, Dr Michael Olusina Fape, on Sunday, said that Nigeria needs selfless leaders to bring back its lost glory.

Just as he added that the blood of innocent Nigerians gruesomely murdered in the likes of the former Attorney General and Minister of Justice, Chief Bola Ige, wife of the late acclaimed winner of June 12 1993 Presidential election, Chief MKO Abiola, Kudirat and veteran journalist, Dele Giwa, Pa Alfred Rewane are crying for justice.

He stated this in his sermon in his sermon to mark the 57th Independence anniversary of the country held at the Cathedral of St. Peters', Ake, Abeokuta, the nation's leaders, both past and present, should be held responsible for the woes of the country.

He described them as 'corrupt' and 'clueless' leaders, while expressing regrets that the country had been slowed down because of bad welfare packages for retirees, poor educational sector, bad infrastructure and poor health sector.

The cleric noted, 'We have been seeking the face of God, but have not turned from our wickedness. We have shed bloods of many innocent souls in this nation. From Dele Giwa to Bola Ige to Alfred Rewane to Funsho Williams to our Kudirat Abiola and many more. You can still count on. And the blood of these innocent ones are crying for vengeance.'

'Should we continue in sins and ask for forgiveness, absolutely no.'

He said that for the country to have survived the civil war, coups and counter coups and 17 years of uninterrupted democracy calls for celebration.

The cleric urged Nigerians to seek and pray for forgiveness.

'Many nations went into civil war but never came out successfully. We went through it and by grace of God, here we are today. There have been military coups and counter coups. And eventually, we have come to the period of democratic dispensation. For 17 years unbroken and beyond, our democracy has been intact by grace of God, Halleluyah. Someone says the worst democracy is better than best military rule. There have been accusations and counter accusations, but in spite of all the Lord has kept us together.'

We need selfless, incorruptible leaders —Cleric

'As we are celebrating 57 years of our existence as an independent nation, I want to tell you my brothers and sisters, Nigeria is sick. There is no doubt about that. Then, when can we actually say a nation is sick and it is in need of healing? A nation is sick when it is confused on which path is to tread giving the enormity of the challenges that are bedeviling it because of the clueless leaders at the helms of affairs whether past or present governments.

'Brethren, can't we say a nation is sick when the leaders know what to do but because of arrogance and selfish interest they have put those they are ruling perpetually under their feet to be trampled upon because of the power they exercise? Someone says nothing makes armed robbers different from ordinary person rather than the gun they are using.

'When is a nation sick? Is it a time like this when there are agitations for restructuring right from the South West? Is it a time like this when there is agitation for Republic of Biafra in the South East? Is it a time like this when there is environmental degradation in the South-South?

'Is it a time like this when the minority Christians in the North are not able to exercise their religious rights? Brethren, I want to say Nigeria is sick but God will heal us.'

The state deputy governor, Mrs Yetunde Onanuga, shared the same opinion with Fape that all is not well with Nigeria.

She, therefore, cautioned that against any form of violence act and sued for peace among Nigerians.

Load-Date: September 25, 2017

---

End of Document

50 Moon years and Soyinka

The Sun (Nigeria)

July 20, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1431 words

Byline: Rapheal

Body

---

One man sat comfortably on his airplane seat. Another man came and commanded the old man to stand up because that seat was his. He brought out a partly torn boarding pass "certificate of occupancy" to prove ownership of the disputed seat, his little land, his temporary kingdom in the plane. The old man whose [...]

The post 50 Moon years and Soyinka appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

One man sat comfortably on his airplane seat. Another man came and commanded the old man to stand up because that seat was his. He brought out a partly torn boarding pass "certificate of occupancy" to prove ownership of the disputed seat, his little land, his temporary kingdom in the plane. The old man whose whole life has been a life of drama—literally and metaphorically—finds himself in another drama of the absurd. Knowing that the young man is right, he complies and drags up his 85-year-old body to take another seat in this combined error of comedy and tragedy called tragicomedy.

Another man watching the surreal drama tries to take it all in but he finds it difficult to understand, wondering: How can young men of today behave like this to an old man? Doesn't this guy know Prof. Wole Soyinka, Africa's first Nobel Literature Prizewinner and Nigeria's most famous brand? The man watching is the son of a journalist. He has learnt enough from his father to know that absurdity is the real definition of news—what the eyes cannot believe. Surreptitiously, he takes a picture of the incident and posts it on social media in an age where everyone with a mobile phone is automatically a crack reporter and an ace photographer. In a twinkling of an eye, the picture of Soyinka sitting, reading, next to the recalcitrant young man had gone viral, triggering, a national debate about right and wrong. Kudos to Tonye Cole, son of an eminent journalist Dr. Patrick Dele Cole, the man who discovered my late editor and mentor Dele Giwa and brought him back home from America where he was working with the New York Times as a news assistant to join the Daily Times. For his scoop, I will nominate Tonye Cole for a journalism prize. I will also offer him a copy of my 50 WORLD EDITORS, a book of conversations with newspaper editors and news media gurus around the world—editors from prestigious newspapers like the New York Times, Washington Post, Chicago Tribune, New York Daily News, The Times of London, CNN, the Financial Times plus news media icons in Nigeria including Segun Osoba, John Momoh of Channels TV and Nduka Obaigbena who was 60 on Sunday, all sharing their stories of adventures in journalism. I had earlier interviewed Tonye Cole, an oil magnate from the Sahara Group and featured him in my new book 50 NIGERIA'S BOARDROOM LEADERS—Lessons On Corporate Governance and Strategy where he shared his interesting boardroom learning curve in a chapter titled: From Atlas Mara to Sahara With Boardroom Wisdom. But this is a story for another day.

50 Moon years and Soyinka

Today, I have two things on my mind: 50th anniversary of man on the moon and Soyinka at 85. It all started with a visionary American President John F. Kennedy's decision to be the first to launch his nation into "landing a man on the moon and returning him safely to the earth" thereby beating the Soviets who were ahead in the space race. He made his moon speech on May 25, 1961. And on 16 July 1969, Apollo II took off from earth and landed on the moon on July 20, 1969 with that famous speech by Neil Armstrong: "One small step for man, one giant leap for mankind." Today is exactly the 50th anniversary of the day man first stepped on the moon and broke the virginity of the Luna goddess and all the myths of the moon as ancient as time.

In the book Moon Sense—you can Google it—another Soyinka by name Soyinka Ogunbusola (no relation of Wole Soyinka) takes us back to the era before moon landing when from time immemorial the moon influenced the affairs of man and life on earth in general. Soyinka Ogunbusola wrote in Moon Sense: "Man, mineral, plant, bodies of water; the moon has her undeniable affect over it. In West Africa our ancestors the Fon people of Togo knew when to plant seeds in the earth by considering the moon phases, the ancient Yoruba of Nigeria knew when to perform certain initiations according to the phases of the moon. Those seafaring ancestors in Mali knew the strength of the tides varied greatly with the lunar phases."

As at the time of the moon landing, our literary giant Wole Soyinka was a young radical of 35 and a prisoner of conscience accused of collaborating with the Biafrans by travelling secretly to meet with Gen. Ojukwu in the bid to stop the spilling of blood. An act that should have won him a Nobel Peace Prize long, long ago. But they kept him in prison, in solitude. "Solitary confinement is not a very pleasant experience, especially prolonged solitary confinement," Soyinka says in a conversation with Christopher Bigsby. "I stayed in a little hut, in a little compound, all by myself, with depersonalized guards looking in from time to time, who were scared they would be shot if they were caught talking to me, because the war was still on and I was supposed to be a dangerous war criminal. So it was a little bit rough. But I evolved certain mental exercises, to which I adhered religiously. I did physical exercises and set myself problems. I tried to reinvent mathematics, for instance. That was fun, great fun. I loathed mathematics in school, loathed it, but now I became fascinated by many problems. I think I even discovered the law of combinations all on my own in that prison."

In prison, it was Soyinka's ex-wife Laide who first broke the news of the moon landing to him. "Wole was being held in solitary confinement," she told us in the debut story that launched Weekend Concord, the first paper I edited in 1989—some thirty good years ago. "He got the directorship of the School of Drama in Ibadan and so we moved to Ibadan in 1967. That was when the Gowon incident happened. I think by August he was already being looked for. He therefore wasn't able to take over fully at the School of Drama. He was in custody, being transferred from prison to prison. I was able to see him in Lagos. I remember the fuss of the security personnel who took me to him, how the man was going round and round to confuse me so that I wouldn't know the way. I saw him once again when he was in Kaduna. I told him the Americans had made it to the moon. He was so excited. It was quite a worrying time for us. Since I grew up as a radical myself, I could appreciate what he was doing: these are the people who really change the society for the better. Wole's detention was very destabilizing for the family. As lovers it would have been okay, but with the kids, the family needed some stability. I then had to play both father and mother at the formative period of the kids and I also had to attend to my job. Somebody had to warm the home front.

"I remember writing an article at the time to deny Tony Enahoro's claim (as the mouthpiece of government) that Wole had tried to escape. It was that time they transferred him to Kaduna. I said this might be a ruse to try and eliminate him. The papers were afraid to publish my rejoinder, especially the Daily Times and Morning Post. They were attacking Wole on all sides to destroy his reputation with people, since he was so popular. It was surprisingly the New Nigerian that was able to carry almost full length my open letter to Gowon. It was unexpected of a northern paper. I was very surprised.

50 Moon years and Soyinka

"Radio Biafra carried it at a time that Wole was dead in prison custody. Achebe was said to have read the obituary on Radio Biafra. I didn't hear it but people said that they heard it and they were worried because they said if Achebe could read that kind of obituary, Wole must have died. I insisted on seeing him. He was able to smuggle out messages now and again from prison."

All this happened 50 years ago and I needed to recapture these stories to remind some of our youths today who never knew Soyinka and what he stood for. And to Soyinka, let me end with a quote from I Samuel 20 v 5: "Tomorrow is the new moon." May your seat not be empty, sir. And like Moses who was a hundred and twenty years, may your eyes not dim. Nigeria still needs you. Happy birthday Prof! Wishing you more years ahead in good health.

The post 50 Moon years and Soyinka appeared first on The Sun Nigeria.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/71/156406019069.jpg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/96/156670242633.jpeg>

Load-Date: September 19, 2019

---

End of Document

The black monk (3)

Business Day

April 1, 2019 Monday

Copyright 2019 Business Day All Rights Reserved

Length: 1277 words

Body

---

What was hilarious was how when the coup that toppled President Shehu Shagari on 31st December 1983 was being planned, one of the ring-leaders Major-General Ibrahim Babangida was despatched to go and brief the Chief of Army Staff, Lt-General Mohammed Inuwa Wushishi who was his kinsman.

Babangida informed Wushishi that a coup d'état was imminent but he would come to no harm and that he would become the new Head of State. Little did Wushishi realise that he was being sold a dummy. As soon as the coup was successfully executed, Lt-General Wushishi was dumped and replaced by none other than Major-General Ibrahim Badamosi Babangida.

The military have a long history of mysterious deaths - from friendly fire to air crashes. Till today, the C130 air crash which occurred on 26 September 1992 remains a mystery although there is no shortage of wild speculation. In one fell swoop an entire cadre of top military officers were wiped out.

As for the ADC crash which claimed the lives of the former principal (Headmaster) of King's College, Lagos, Mr. Ajumogobia and one of the most distinguished old boys of the college, Professor Claude Ake who was a fierce and unrelenting critic of the military, the rumour mill went into overdrive that it was the handiwork of the military.

As for the bombing of journalist Dele Giwa who was one of the founders of the formidable 'Newswatch' magazine, the film went to great lengths to dwell on both the circumstantial and substantive evidence of the military getting its own back - a reversal of the long-standing dictum that the pen is mightier than the sword. Obviously, whoever came up with that conclusion did not reckon with prevailing circumstances and the availability of lethal weapons ranging from AK47s to bombs as well as an arsenal of non-detectable poisons and toxins.

Another remarkable aspect of the film is the menu of several accounts of the assassination of General Murtala Mohammed on Friday 13th February 1976.

Here are a few samples:

'How General Murtala Muhammed was assassinated on Friday, February 13, 1976'

By - Tunde Ososanya

The black monk (3)

On the fateful day that life was snuffed out of the head of state and his ADC, Lt Akintunde Akinterinwa, they had left Murtala's personal house in Ikoyi for Dodan barracks, the seat of government, when the coup plotters attacked them.

According to the lone survivor and orderly to the head of state, Staff Sergeant Michael Otuwu, who recalled the event of that day in an interview with The Authority Daily, the head of state was seated beside his ADC, Lt Akinterinwa, and he (Otuwu) was directly seated in the front passenger's seat, while Sergeant Adamu Michika was behind the wheels.

In the interview, the orderly disclosed that their vehicle stopped before a row of cars at a junction, adding that there was a man in traditional attire (who would later be identified as Dimka) who approached the vehicle, removed his robe and pulled out an AK 47 rifle, shooting the driver in the head.

The vehicle had automatically been disabled after the driver was killed, then other soldiers dressed the same way as Dimka, ran toward the car sprayed bullets on it.

The orderly said: 'The Head of State, his ADC and I all ducked while the shooting lasted.'

He said he heard the gunmen running towards the Radio House, adding that a few minutes later he noticed that the injured ADC opened his door, apparently to come to the aid of the equally injured Commander-in-Chief.

It was the opened door, the orderly said, that alerted the assailants that the people in the vehicle were not dead. So, they returned and opened fire on the car to finish the job.

The orderly said that Generals TY Danjuma and Olusegun Obasanjo were lucky because they were also targets but escaped because they did not leave for their offices as early as Murtala, adding that they heard the radio announcement which may have altered their movement plans.

Otuwu added: 'I was his orderly throughout to his last day during the Dimka coup. I was inside the car with him when he was killed. On the morning of that February 13, we were going to the office. Sergeant Adamu Michika was the driver; Lt. Akintunde Akinterinwa, his ADC, sat behind the driver. As an orderly, I was in front with the driver. While the head of state sat behind me - I was the one who opens the door for him. That fateful day I came up in the morning to carry him to the office in Dodan barracks.

We got to the former secretariat, now at Ikoyi, which was under construction. Before the place they call Alagbon junction, near the labour office. The official car was a Mercedes Benz 600. It is still at the national museum. There were about four or five vehicles in front of us. You know at that junction there was traffic. We didn't go with sirens. During his time, we didn't go with escorts with the accompanying out-riders, road-closed signs and all that.

So, when we got to the Alagbon junction, the traffic warden stopped the vehicle and we were in the queue. We were the fifth or sixth vehicle behind the forward vehicles that were stopped. That secretariat was under construction. They put zincks around the compound behind that secretariat. Then some soldiers came in Agbada carrying AK-47 rifles.

They wore uniforms but covered them with Agbada. They had their Kalashnikovs with Agbada cover-up in form of camouflage. We never knew they were even waiting for us. Then one soldier from Golf Road shot and got our driver, Sergeant Michika. Our motor was neutralized. Between me and the driver was an arm-rest. On that arm-rest was Oga's brief case. In this brief case he puts civil dress he could use as needed. When he wants to go to Mosque, he does not like going back to Ikoyi to change.

Then some other soldiers converged on us. I can't recall their number. They began to spray us from the back. All of us took cover. I fell on top of the driver; the blood of the driver covered my head. They thought the bullet got my head.

After the first shooting and without return of fire they must have assumed that we were all dead. The shooting was actually in two phases. They ran to the NBC to announce the assassination. They shared themselves into three.

The black monk (3)

There was a group waiting for Obasanjo when he was about to go to the office. Also another group was waiting for T.Y. Danjuma at Bourdillon - our own was at Ikoyi Road. It happened we were the first target that moved early from the house to the office.

Before Obasanjo and T.Y. Danjuma moved to their offices they have already heard the radio announcement. By the time of the first shooting, we being the target and their running to NBC to go and announce that they have already finished their assignment, the ADC who was still alive, thinking they were gone, opened the door of the Benz.

In the first spraying of the car, except the driver who was killed, the three of us were injured but not dead. On observing the car door opening, one of the attackers, still within range, a major, called to the others: 'he never die, he never die'. He was calling his group to return.

This time around when they came back they finished their entire magazines. That was what happened. They carried everybody to the mortuary at Igbozere hospital, not far from Kam Salem police headquarters. Because of the extreme cold of the mortuary, my left hand started shaking and one of the attendants saw it and called the nurses or doctors and said somebody was still alive.

From there they checked and confirmed that I was still breathing. So, they had to look for a vehicle to carry me to Dodan barracks. From Dodan barracks they looked for an ambulance and carried me to a hospital, Awolowo road hospital, a military hospital.'

Load-Date: April 2, 2019

---

End of Document

My Journey: A Personal Story by Kingsley Moghalu

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

July 26, 2021 Monday

Copyright 2021 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1770 words

Body

---

104 views | Kingsley Chiedu Moghalu | July 26, 2021

As a young man out of the University of Nigeria, Nsukka (Enugu Campus) in the mid-80s, I consciously sought and acquired experience that would position me for leadership on the world stage and in my country. First I did my National Youth Service Corps (NYSC) assignment as a Legal Officer at Shell Nigeria HQ in Lagos.

First class global multinational. Dominant in Nigeria's petroleum industry. I worked hard as a "Corper" and was kept very professionally busy by my supervisors Dr. V.O. Achimu the Company Secretary and Head of Legal, and Mrs. Efe Omole, a senior corporate lawyer in Shell. Then I joined Newswatch, founded by Nigeria's most influential journalists of that era, the quartet Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese, and Yakubu Mohammed, as its general counsel. In media, 'twas THE PLACE.

To further internationalize my CV, and doubling as a lawyer/journalist, I became a special correspondent for influential foreign newspapers and magazines of the era such as South magazine, Christian Science Monitor, and Africa News (today's AllAfrica Global Media). But I wanted, as I put it on my CV as my goal, "a career of distinction in international affairs". Possibly in the Nigerian Foreign Service, following the footsteps of my now-deceased dad, but preferably in an international organization like the United Nations, Commonwealth Secretariat, or in the Organization of African Unity (now African Union). That meant, at the very least, getting a master's degree. From where? I thought it through, and had been advised by my own research and by mentors that one of the best moves for such a career was to obtain a master's from the prestigious Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University in Massachusetts, USA.

I applied while working at Newswatch. I was admitted in 1990, but could not afford the $25,000 tuition fee. But I was determined. I deferred the admission by one year, and started looking for money. All the rich businessmen I approached turned me down.

Frustrated, I wrote to Prof. Bolaji Akinyemi, immediate past Foreign Minister of Nigeria in the Ibrahim Babangida government. Akinyemi was an alumnus of The Fletcher School, having obtained his master's degree there in 1966 and then gone on to Oxford University for his Ph.D.

My Journey: A Personal Story by Kingsley Moghalu

He replied and gave me an appointment to see him (no email then, everything was by snail mail! so all this took several days!). I met him in his office then on Victoria Island, introduced myself and submitted my CV. He read it with interest, and was impressed.

"Well, young man", he said, "I don't have the kind of money that will enable me pay your fees, but I'm impressed you were admitted to The Fletcher School. I will write to the school and recommend you for some sort of support and let's see how they respond". I was relieved.

This "Big Man" did not know the struggling young man from Adam, but had given me audience and was actually trying to help. "God, I am in your hands" I prayed silently. He asked me to come back & take a copy of the letter he wrote. I did. In two short, powerfully constructed paragraphs of his letter addressed to Professor Jeswald Salacuse, Dean of The Fletcher School at the time, Akinyemi introduced me as "a future leader in Africa", and said my impressive CV at the young age of 27 was an indicator of this assessment in his view. He then asked the school to consider me for financial support to enrol.

Two months later I received a letter from Fletcher awarding me the Joan Gillespie Fellowship for identified future leaders from India, Nigeria and Algeria. Now to get a visa and leave, Ray Ekpu, my boss at Newswatch, and Dr. Yemi Ogunbiyi, Managing Director of The Guardian at the time, introduced me to the United States Embassy in Nigeria. The American Embassy was impressed with my admission to The Fletcher School , a training ground for many American and world leaders in diplomacy, politics, business, military and security affairs. The embassy asked me to send over my passport but not bother to come physically to their office in Victoria Island, Lagos. They stamped my student visa and on top of it, awarded me a travel grant that covered my air travel ticket to the US!

When I arrived at Tufts University, the world opened up. I worked hard to excel academically and survive financially, serving two professors as their research assistant and somewhat envious of the American students from wealthy homes who had credit cards given them by their parents and did not need to work.

From The Fletcher School I joined the UN, my dream career. I started as a junior Associate Officer and rose to the rank of Director and later served on a special assignment at the political rank of Under-Secretary-General. From conflict resolution and nation building assignments in Cambodia, at UN Headquarters in New York on the Angola, Rwanda and Somalia Desks under the supervision of Kofi Annan, back to the field in Croatia and later as Legal Adviser and Spokesman of the International Tribunal for Rwanda in Arusha, Tanzania, and then to the World Health Organization (WHO) in Geneva, Switzerland as Head of the Global Partnerships and Resource Mobilization Team at the $20 billion Global Fund in which I also played risk management roles, it was a versatile, satisfying and successful career.

In 2006 while I was based in Geneva with WHO, Secretary-General Kofi Annan appointed me a member of the high-level Redesign Panel on the UN Internal Justice System. Working at UN HQ in New York for six months with Mary Gaudron , our chairperson and an Australian Supreme Court Justice, Louise Otis, Canadian Appeals Court Judge, eminent Egyptian international lawyer Professor Ahmed El-Kosheri, and Diego Garcia Sayan, former Foreign Minister of Peru, we overhauled the internal dispute resolution (between staff and management), accountability and transparency framework governing the world body's 60,000 staff around the world as a core component of management reform. The UN General Assembly ratified our recommendations and voted them into UN administrative law. It was a watershed moment in the history of internal UN governance.

While in Geneva, I enrolled in January 2004 as a part-time PH.D. candidate in International Relations at the London School of Economics (LSE). I wrote my 500-page doctoral dissertation in 12 months, shattering all previous records at the university, and graduated in October 2005 with a doctoral degree. In December 2008 I resigned from the UN after nearly 17 years and founded Sogato Strategies, a risk management consultancy in Geneva serving global multinationals seeking business opportunities in Africa.

This enjoyable experience of self-employment was suspended when I was appointed Deputy Governor of the Central Bank of Nigeria by President Umaru Yar'Adua of blessed memory, on the recommendation of then Governor Sanusi Lamido Sanusi, and confirmed by the Senate. The CBN was, and is a very powerful and consequential institution. This development, however, was a disruption of my earlier plans. But it was, I came to believe later,

My Journey: A Personal Story by Kingsley Moghalu

divinely ordered for reasons only God knows fully. It came out of a seemingly "by-chance" encounter with Sanusi at the World Economic Forum meeting in Cape Town, South Africa, where he proposed the idea, entirely of his own volition and unsolicited, of my returning home to Nigeria to serve as his deputy and head the CBN's Financial System Stability (FSS) Directorate that would implement the extensive reform in the banking sector that he had in mind. (Sanusi was just roughly a week into his confirmation by the Senate as the CBN Governor at this time). He later ran his decision to recommend me to Yar'Adua by Dr. Ngozi Okonjo-Iweala, then Managing Director of the World Bank, and she gave her strong agreement with it.

When I reported for duty at the CBN on November 6, 2009 after the Senate confirmed my appointment a week earlier on October 27 (my appointment had been announced in August by Segun Adeniyi, Spokesman for President Yar'Adua) I found several letters of congratulation waiting for me. One of the ones that meant the most to me was one from Prof. Akinyemi. "Dear Deputy Governor", he wrote, "Need I say anything more? Congratulations". That was it. Two sentences, harking back to our meeting and his intervention 19 years earlier in 1990.

I am proud to have served my country in such an important leadership role where I made contributions that reformed our financial sector and payments system, including the development and introduction of the Bank Verification Number (BVN). In the CBN Monetary Policy Committee, we progressively brought inflation down to a single-digit 8% by 2014.

After a five year tenure at the CBN, I was appointed a Professor on the faculty of The Fletcher School and taught the course Emerging Africa in the World Economy for two academic years. This was by courtesy of another helping hand: Admiral (Dr.) James Stavridis (Rtd), Dean of The Fletcher School and former Supreme Allied Commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), the military alliance of the Great Powers of the western world, who himself is also a Fletcher alum. It was an honor to have gone to school there; to be appointed a professor at this top global graduate school of international affairs was a double honor.

But while teaching at Tufts University from 2015-2017, my mind turned to the increasing poverty and insecurity at home in Nigeria. I began asking myself why I was in Boston developing the human capital of citizens of the United States, Japan, France, Canada, Ghana, Switzerland, etc when my country was clearly adrift. I made the decision to return home to run for President in 2019. The rest is recent history.

The morale of this story for young people is this: think beyond mere success to impact and consequence in whatever you do. Work hard, and be very strategic. I always aimed for the best of institutions in my career and did not settle for less. I know, the world today is very different, but it offers even more opportunities, and success has become more democratized with the age of the internet, globalization, and high technology. But the same principles apply.

All of this, and much else, are what I bring to my current aspiration: I want to help build a nation that will give our youth great opportunities in the 21st century. We are all God's children too, entitled to a place in the sun. Africa, and Nigeria, will truly rise one day! It's always darkest before dawn. #Ends

Ifekaego Nnewi

July 24, 2021

Bolaji Akinyemi CBN Fletcher School Geneva Kingsley Moghalu UN

Load-Date: July 26, 2021

OF KARMA, CAMA, THE CHURCH, AND MUSHROOMING CHURCHES (1)

Nigerian Tribune

August 23, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1778 words

Body

---

Karma or the Law of Karma is an expression usually used - though not exactly appropriately - to mean comeuppance or reward for an evil that someone has done. According to Wikipedia, Karma means 'the result of a person's actions as well as the actions' themselves. It is a term about the cycle of cause and effect. According to the 'theory of Karma', what happens to a person happens because they caused it with their actions'

'The 'theory of Karma' can be thought to be an extension to Newton's third law of action and reaction where every action of any kind, including words, thoughts, feelings (and) the totality of our existence have a reaction, same type of energy coming back to the one that caused it.

'In terms of spiritual development, Karma is about all that a person has done, is doing, and will do. Karma is not about punishment or reward. It makes a person responsible for their own life, and how they treat other people.

'(In) The 'theory of Karma'...All living creatures are responsible for their karma - their actions and the effects of their actions'

The popular understanding of Karma differs from Wikipedia's in that karma is generally seen as 'punishment' or 'reward' Thus, Karma is seen as a REWARDER of good and evil that cannot be escaped from by anyone, no matter how smart or well-connected that person might be. In popular consciousness, Karma has to do with retributive justice dispensed with certainty by an incorruptible judge or arbiter.

Unlike what former president Olusegun Obasanjo alluded to in his recent controversial 'condolence' letter on the late ex-Senator Kashamu Buruji, death is not the only inescapable and incorruptible REWARDER that people zero their mind on when they speak of Karma. A lot of people are deemed to have been cornered and upended by Karma without their kicking the bucket.

Usually in popular consciousness, therefore, Karma speaks of the evil that men do which not only lives after them like Antonio posits in William Shakespeare's Julius Caesar but which perpetually haunts like the ghost of Banquo in Shakespeare's Macbeth. Like the assassinated inimitable Nigerian journalist, Dele Giwa, said, man's injustice to man will not go unpunished but will 'be rewarded, if not now, then, certainly later; if not by man, then, certainly by God...'

Giwa's description, thus, better approximates the popular notion of Karma than Wikipedia's. Scripture says whatsoever a man soweth, that he shall also reap (Galatians 6: 7 - 9). The recently departed crooner, Majek

OF KARMA, CAMA, THE CHURCH, AND MUSHROOMING CHURCHES (1)

Fashek, said no one plants cassava and reaps cocoyam. And God is no respecter of persons. I feel like suggesting that Karma could be one of the many tools or vessels at God's disposal.

CAMA sounds like Karma but there is a world of difference between both. The Companies and Allied Matters Act (CAMA) 2020 was, on August 7, 2020 signed into law by Gen. Muhammadu Buhari (retired) and it immediately drew the ire - and rightly so - of the Presiding Bishop of the Living Faith Church Worldwide, David Oyedepo. Oyedepo's angst was against a section of the law which purports to give government officials the power to remove the board of trustees and even close the bank accounts of any church without recourse to the courts.

Bellowed Oyedepo: 'In the document, they said the Registrar-General can remove the trustees (of the church) without recourse to the court. Don't try it! This must be from somebody who woke up from the wrong side of the bed after dreaming...' Not so, Bishop; no one woke up from the wrong side of any bed. This is well thought out; it is pure and simple creeping fascism. Full-blown dictatorship has started to bare its fangs. Wealthy and influential church leaders who command the attention of millions of followers not only in Nigeria but also all over the world are seen as critical opinion moulders who must be silenced way ahead of 2023 so that the cabals dictating the pace of things in Nigeria can have it smooth sailing from now on.

Another critical section of the society they are bent on caging is the media, especially social media. That is the import of their hate speech law and the whopping N5million they are imposing as fine. Remember, they once mulled even the death penalty as punishment for so-called hate speech while Boko Haram murderers are gifted with rehabilitation! The so-called hate speech law is a reincarnation of the obnoxious and draconian Buhari's Decree Number 4 of 1984. Witness how they tried to rubbish Obadiah Mailafia just like the self-proclaimed evil genius, Ibrahim Babangida, did to Tai Solarin, and how they slapped a fine of humongous sum on the medium that published Mailafia's interview!

Freedom of speech is under attack; freedom of religious worship, no less! The positive provisions of CAMA 2020, such as the promotion of the ease of doing business, are mere camouflage and detour; those are not their goal or real intention or else, they would have stopped at that; gagging churches is the target, particularly the outspoken ones like Oyedepo and the others that speak against the many atrocities of the Buhari/APC regime.

Oyedepo's hot words on this matter was vintage Oyedepo. We have heard him roar over issues that touch his soul again and again. But the Government's response - that Oyedepo obey or get himself another country - is most reckless and patently irresponsible. No government properly so-called talks to its citizens that way. Only an army of occupation behaves like that! But I did not get the riposte I expected from the Bishop! Oh yes, a new country is on the way; a brand new country of the free born is in the offing! A country that we can truly call ours; not this contraption that the sage, Chief Obafemi Awolowo, described as a mere geographical expression and which has bluntly refused to come of age!

Recall that CAMA is not the first attempt to cage churches under this administration. In late 2016/early 2017, the Financial Regulations Council, waving the Financial Reporting Council of Nigeria Act No. 6 of 2011, had announced a maximum period of 20 years for the head of all registered churches, mosques, and civil society organisations. Implemented, that regulation would have swept off all the notable church leaders in the country but public uproar forced the government to beat a quick retreat.

That law is cooling its heels on the shelf. Now, it has been joined by CAMA 2020. Even if 'they' calm down on their implementation for now, don't be too sure they will not flag them at an opportune time in future. I am sure you know who the 'they' are! The churches, thus, stand on slippery grounds, if I may use that term. But where were the church leaders when the CAMA bill, for instance, was making its rounds in the National Assembly? How many representations did they make to the legislators? Are there no Christians in the NASS? Is there any notable church leader who does not have members in the NASS? What efforts did they make to kill the bill before it became law? Is this not the same country where the Vice President is not just a Christian but also a senior pastor?

How many times did the church leaders picket the National Assembly on account of these obnoxious laws and regulations? What advocacies did they embark upon? How many press conferences did they address on the issue? Where were the CAN, PFN and such other leaders of Christendom? What is their relevance if they cannot undertake the simple task of defending their own interest? Will someone who shirks the responsibility of defending his own interests be minded to defend someone else's? That must be why Christians all over the country - the North especially - have been as the prophet Micaiah described them in 1 Kings 22: 17 - as sheep scattered upon the hills that have not a shepherd!

OF KARMA, CAMA, THE CHURCH, AND MUSHROOMING CHURCHES (1)

I wish I could speak in harsher terms to Nigeria's church leaders! In my secondary school days, not only did we skip reading the Book of Job, we expunged it completely from our Bible, in the erroneous belief that the 'curses' contained therein were grievous and might rub off on us! In like manner, I wonder these days whether some church leaders have not expunged from their own bible the Book of Nehemiah and the valiant deeds of Elijah!

Otherwise, where are the Nehemias of this generation? Nehemiah 4: 14 - 18 says: 'And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters, your wives, and your houses... And it came to pass from that time forth, that the half of my servants wrought in the work, and the other half of them held both the spears, the shield, and the bows, and the habergeons...They which builded on the wall, and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, everyone with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. For the builders, everyone had his sword girded by his side, and so builded...'

Where are church leaders like Elijah? 1 Kings 17: 17 - 19 says: 'And it came to pass, when (king) Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel? And he answered, I have not troubled Israel; but thou, and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and has followed Baalim'

Where are Christian youths like the three Hebrew sons? Daniel 3: 13 - 18 says: 'Nebuchadnezzar spake and said unto them, Is it true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, do not ye serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?...Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up'

Oh, Lord God: In these days of great trials and tribulations that try the soul of Your people; in these days of famine, darkness and the sword; when the hirelings parading as shepherds abandon Your flock to look after their own selfish interests:

Oh, that these were the days of Elijah/Declaring the word of the Lord without equivocation/Sending down fire from heaven! Oh, that these were the days of Your servant Moses/When righteousness exalts a nation! Oh, that these were the days of Ezekiel/So that the dead, dry bones of many a church leader may rise again! (Donnie McClurkin paraphrased).

But who stole the thunder of today's church leaders? What quenched their fire and dulled the edge of their sword?

Load-Date: September 26, 2020

New book blames Odili for political violence in Rivers, Amaechi, Wike for profiting from it

New book blames Odili for political violence in Rivers, Amaechi, Wike for profiting from it

Business Day

November 14, 2018 Wednesday

Copyright 2018 Business Day All Rights Reserved

Length: 667 words

Body

---

A new book unveiled in Port Harcourt at the weekend traced the introduction of violent politics in Rivers State to former governor, Peter Odili, and blamed former governor Chibuike Amaechi and the incumbent, Nyesom Wike, for continuing to benefit from it.

The revelation is contained in volumes one and two of the series titled, 'Footprints of Nkpo Sibara, Dele Giwa and Ken Saro-Wiwa,' written by Patrick Naagbandon, a travel journalist and author.

The books are broken into chapters and are mainly a collection of articles initially published in the writer's column (The Town Crier) - starting from 2005 - in several local and national newspapers like Port Harcourt Telegraph, National Network, The Guardian, National Concord, Sahara Reporters, The Neighbourhood, Daily Sun, Vanguard, The Humanity, and The Beacon.

In the 297-paged volume one, for example, Naagbandon said Odili celebrated his 60th birthday in Abuja because Port Harcourt was unsafe due to the activities of armed youths, most of whom took their career in the period Odili was governor. He wondered how Odili is touted as a man who governed well when he can no longer live in the state.

Pressed during an interview with newsmen, Naagbandon said unequivocally that Odili laid the foundation of what was happening today. For cultism, he empowered criminal gangs, which he used for election purposes during his time as governor between 1999 and 2007.

The author of The Last Militant and The Fury of a Fisher Woman also said the guns-empowered youths were now running rampage, making Port Harcourt and Rivers State, at large, unsafe.

He also indicted immediate past Governor Rotimi Amaechi and the current Governor Nyesom Wike for building on and benefiting from Odili's creation of insecurity, instead of nipping the evil at the bud. 'He (Odili) laid the foundation for arms struggling and gun struggle in this place. These are issues highlighted and I am not just saying it because I want to make any cheap point out of that.'

While the books also explore the life and events - good or bad - of many popular characters like Dele Giwa, Ken Saro-Wiwa and former Enugu governor, Chimaroke Nnamani; Naagbandon said his reason for highlighting Odili's unknown past was because he had no other home except Port Harcourt. I stand by every word contained in the book, he said.

New book blames Odili for political violence in Rivers, Amaechi, Wike for profiting from it

'I am saying it because I am angry; because, some of us, we do not have any other home. This is our home. Nigeria is our home and if this society eventually collapses, where are we going to run to? That is why we must fight to rescue this society out of that (evil). That is why this book was published.'

Rivers State has in recent times been a reference point when it comes to conflict and violence, especially those traceable to cultism.

It has been the case since the reign of Peter Odili, with the situation hitting high heavens during election seasons when several deaths are usually recorded.

For example, several communities in Ogbia/Egbema/Ndoni, Ahoada West and East local government areas were run and ransacked by rival cultist groups, leading to economic crippling and displacement of hundreds of natives in such communities as Egi.

Between 2015 and 2016 when the general and rerun elections were conducted in the state, not less than 20 persons were reportedly killed.

Former Governor Rotimi Amaechi and current Governor Nyesom Wike have since 2013 been at loggerheads, each accusing the other of sponsoring violence and insecurity in the state.

Given that Amaechi and Wike worked under Odili as speaker and chairman, respectively, Naagbandon's indictment could be read to mean that all three - Odili, Amaechi and Wike - are familiar with the insecurity situation in the state but all failed - as governors - to initiate a policy framework that would tackle insecurity and plan to sustained peace.

Amaechi, however, declared militants as criminals and took the war to cultists. The effort was disrupted by the political crisis that came in 2012 and remained to this day.

Load-Date: November 15, 2018

---

End of Document

NUJ demands arrest, prosecution of killers of Bayelsa journalist

Nigerian Tribune

May 1, 2017 Monday

Copyright 2017 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 267 words

Body

---

THE Nigeria Union of Journalist (NUJ) has urged the Inspector General of Police, Idris Abubakar, to ensure the arrest and prosecution of the killers of Mr Famou Giobaro, a broadcast journalist in Bayelsa.

The union made the request in a communique issued Sunday at the end of the NUJ National Executive Council (NEC) meeting, held in Gombe.

The communique was signed by the NUJ National Secretary, Malam Shuaibu Leman.

News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) recalls that on April 16, some unidentified gunmen had killed Giobaro, a staff of Bayelsa-owned Glory FM 97.1, in his residence at INEC Road, Kpasia in Yenagoa, the state capital.

The attackers neither stole anything, nor attacked other occupants of the house, triggering speculations the killing could have been premeditated.

The union is also demanding that the case files of all slain journalists be re-opened, including those of late Dele Giwa and Bagauda Kaltho.

The communique further condemned in strong terms, the withdrawal of a Punch reporter, Olalekan Adedayo, from the State House and urged Presidency to reprimand the Chief Security Officer responsible for the act.

The union challenged the Federal Government to sanction state governments that failed to properly utilise the first batch of the Paris Club refund.

The communique further commended the anti-corruption war of the present administration and also called on the National Assembly to ensure quick passage of the Petroleum Industry Bill, to stabilise the sector.

The NUJ commended the Gombe State Government and the State Council of the union for the successful hosting of the NEC meeting.

Load-Date: May 2, 2017

NIGERIA SEEKS THE SLAYERS OF AN EDITOR

NIGERIA SEEKS THE SLAYERS OF AN EDITOR

The New York Times

December 29, 1986, Monday, Late City Final Edition

Copyright 1986 The New York Times Company

Section: Section A; Page 5, Column 1; Foreign Desk

Length: 868 words

Byline: By JAMES BROOKE, Special to the New York Times

Dateline: LAGOS, Nigeria

Body

---

"Hello," starts one note penned by a 15-year-old schoolgirl. "Elephant fails and cannot stand up. Dele Giwa, good-bye."

Another, typed by a college student, contains an ode to "Giwa, the Honest and Patriotic Son of the African soil."

Mourning a man they never met, these letter writers are two of thousands of Nigerians who recently have flooded the offices of Newswatch, Nigeria's largest news magazine.

On Oct. 19, Dele Giwa, the magazine's 39-year-old editor, was killed by a powerful package bomb sent to his home. In a nation generally regarded to have Africa's freest and most diverse press, the killing has grown into a major political liability for Nigeria's President, Gen. Ibrahim Babangida.

A Blot on Rights Record

Overseas, the incident has cast a shadow over Nigeria's generally clean human rights image. "The Government has got to get this monkey off their back," one diplomat said.

It is evident that Mr. Giwa's combative style of journalism, learned in eight years spent in New York, proved too peppery for someone in this third world society. But with no suspects in jail and the police working in secrecy, the average Nigerian has become a sleuth in a national whodunit.

Some suspect Nigeria's military intelligence agency, the State Security Service. Two days before his death, Mr. Giwa was called in by the intelligence agency for the fourth time in a year to answer questions about his coverage of sensitive political topics.

Others point to Mr. Giwa's exposes of corrupt Nigerian businessmen and drug dealers who have turned Lagos into a minor transit point for heroin to the United States.

NIGERIA SEEKS THE SLAYERS OF AN EDITOR

And others, noting that this is the first letter-bomb killing in memory here, look with suspicion on a group of Israeli security experts who train and advise Nigeria's presidential guard.

Unified Public Response

Although Mr. Giwa's killing remains unsolved, it is clear that Nigeria has suffered a trauma deep enough to cross the tribal and geographic divisions of this fractious nation of 100 million.

"The entire country was stunned; we are getting thousands of letters from all over Nigeria," Ray Ekpu, the new editor in chief, said as he sat in the office he inherited from Mr. Giwa. The nation's political elite, including the President, sent condolences, and Nigerian businessmen donated services for the funeral.

Wole Soyinka, the Nigerian playwright who won this year's Nobel Prize for literature, set up a national reward fund to try to find the culprits.

On Nov. 8, the day of the funeral, all Nigerian newspapers came out with black mastheads. It was the first such tribute since 1976, when the President, Gen. Murtala Ramat Muhammed, was assassinated.

Raised in Poverty

Nigeria's grief over Mr. Giwa seems spurred in part by the average man's identification with the editor. Mr. Giwa's father was a laundryman who paid his son's school fees by washing the clothes of teachers at Oduduwa College in Ife, about 140 miles northeast of Lagos, where the younger Giwa was editor of the school newspaper.

Mr. Giwa's hopes of attending university were shattered when his high school patron, the ooni, or prince, of Ife, died before Mr. Giwa had completed high school.

Mr. Giwa traveled to New York in 1971, supporting himself by working in a plastic factory and driving taxis. In his free time, he earned a degree in English from Brooklyn College.

He later earned a master's degree in public communications from Fordham University and worked as a news clerk for The New York Times.

Triumphal Return to Nigeria

In 1979, Mr. Giwa returned to Nigeria to work as a newspaper editor. Reporters here like to tell the story of his return in 1982 to Ife, his hometown, where he took part in a symposium at the university. When several students accused him of being a "bourgeois journalist," he invited them into his Mercedes and drove them across town to the hovel where he had grown up.

Mr. Giwa's independent and abrasive style as editor of The Sunday Concord landed him in jail for two weeks in 1983, when Nigeria was under civilian rule. Two years ago, when a foreign exchange shortage severely limited the imports of Time and Newsweek magazines, Mr. Giwa and Mr. Ekpu launched a home-grown version, Newswatch.

The magazine grew to have an estimated circulation of 50,000, one of the largest in Africa. Acerbic reporting boosted sales. Two weeks before Mr. Giwa's death, the Newswatch cover story was titled: "Nigeria - Why Nothing Works."

"Newswatch had good investigative reporters," said Chuma Azikiwe, a Harvard-trained businessman.

'Delete Has Gone Home'

NIGERIA SEEKS THE SLAYERS OF AN EDITOR

Mr. Giwa's death as well as his life was marked by uniquely African touches. On the day of his funeral, hundreds of mourners spilled onto the tarmac of Murtala Muhammed Airport in Lagos, chanting in Yoruba: "Dele has gone home. You have killed him and caused great pain."

Following tradition, his body was flown for burial to his mother's home village of Ugbekpe-Ekperi, about 150 miles northeast of Lagos.

Two months after the funeral, Mr. Ekpu says, police investigations are "just moving in circles."

Meanwhile, Lagos newspapers continue a low-key campaign: In odd corners of their pages are little boxes that read, "Who Killed Dele Giwa?"

---

End of Document

Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless

Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless

Mail & Guardian

July 30, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 M and G Media (Pty) Ltd. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1651 words

Byline: Idowu Omoyele

Highlight: Biodun Olumuyiwa has been writing since the late 1980s, but has only recently published his debut poetry collection

Body

---

In a Journey of Dreams* by Biodun Olumuyiwa

Zacchaeus & Caroline Publishers, 2020

Biodun Olumuyiwa is the writer whom time forgot. He has only this year brought out his debut collection of poetry, In a Journey of Dreams. The book was published in Ibadan, by his own imprint, Zacchaeus & Caroline Publishers, which is named after his parents.

And yet, Olumuyiwa's work as a writer of poetry, plays, short stories and articles had begun to appear in print - chapbooks, anthologies, magazines and newspapers - in Nigeria in the late 1980s and early 1990s, the period during which he composed the poetry of his prime. And then came silence.

Having completed his undergraduate studies in 1991 - the year his father died - Olumuyiwa was posted to Calabar, the port city that is the capital of Cross River state in southern Nigeria, for his National Youth Service Corps programme. After youth service, Olumuyiwa turned away from the literary scene for several years; although he continued to write poems from 1992 till about five years ago, he did not publish them anywhere. Nevertheless, his service experience inspired Calabar - September '91, a poem in his new collection that uses alliteration and assonance, metaphor and rhetorical questions to evoke an atmosphere of dislocation, ambivalence and uncertainty:

"I crossed the girdle to the terrace of your heart but I am greeted only

Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless

by the dullness of your liquid laughter — is there a pain which I do not see in the creeping ripples of your laughter?

Canard of Canaan,
shawl of twilights,
wet pavements of candle dreams,
tell me,
do you mourn forever?"

Olumuyiwa has been something of a shape-shifter, not just in the variety and quality of his work, but also in terms of his name(s). He was born Godwin Afolabi Abiodun Eniayewun in the ancient city of Abeokuta, capital of Ogun state in southwestern Nigeria, in 1965. In September 1991 he became a born-again Christian and, in June 1998, changed his (Yoruba) surname from Eniayewun to Olumuyiwa "because a deeper understanding of my Christian faith showed that the image presented by the meaning of my surname was not in harmony with my Christian belief". The name Eniayewun translates as "A person desired by the world"; Olumuyiwa means "God brings this", "God brought this" or "God made this possible".

All the same, it was as Biodun Eniayewun that he had his article, "NYSC Camp in Retrospect", published in the October 30, 1991 edition of National Concord, a Lagos-based national newspaper that is now defunct. His poetry was published in the Daily Times, another Lagos-based national newspaper, and in Anapoint, the literary journal of the Ogun state branch of the Association of Nigerian Authors.

After elementary education in Ondo and Lagos, Olumuyiwa attended secondary school in Abeokuta. In 1987, he gained admission to what was Ogun State University (now Olabisi Onabanjo University), Ago-Iwoye, graduating with a BA honours degree in English in 1991. While at Ago-Iwoye, he was a member of the university's writers' workshop, founded by poet and English lecturer Sesan Ajayi. In his own poetry collection A Burst of Fireflies (1991), Ajayi describes his most gifted student as "soul-mate, fanciful chronicler/ of septic canticles of agony".

The writers' workshop, especially through its cyclostyled chapbook series, nurtured talents such as Eniayewun, Sina Oyadiran, Anuoluwakemi Orimoloye, Olumide Akinwunmi, Ademola Aderemi, Segun Ebietomiye, Wale Ajayi, Segun Sotuminu and Alric Adeniyi Amona. The latter two, unlike Olumuyiwa, appear in Voices from the Fringe (1988), the anthology of contemporary Nigerian poetry in English, edited by Harry Garuba.

But it is to the generation of poets included in Voices from the Fringe that Olumuyiwa properly belongs, rather than that of millennials like Emmanuel Iduma (born 1989), Gbenga Adesina (1991) and Gbenga Adeoba (1993), none of whom had been born when the then Biodun Eniayewun won the inaugural Ogun State University Tchicaya U Tam'si poetry prize as a first-year undergraduate in the 1987-88 academic year. Incidentally, Olumuyiwa's poetry, in part, honours the great French-language Congolese poet and writer for whom that prize is named, and who has had such an enduring influence on the Nigerian's poetry:

"You must think that poets are sane - count me out, for the poet in my blood festers,
as the hidden lyrics

in A Game of Cheat-Heart.

I am locked in the rupture of a thousand nightmares;

Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless

the songs I still polish on stones of wood ...

You do not know about my failing days that bleed,
maimed like the never ending mad dreams"

These lines from the poem In Greenland Cage in Olumuyiwa's In a Journey of Dreams allude to A Game of Cheat-Heart, the title of a section of *Tchicaya U Tam'si's Selected Poems* (1970), translated by Gerald Moore. Here, Olumuyiwa's speaker repudiates the reasoning affirming the sanity of poets; he needs to move beyond the edge of sanity to be able to plumb the depths of pain and pathos concealed in suppurating lyricism of the quality and profundity found in Tchicaya's poetry.

In the 1988-89 academic year, when he was in his second year as an undergraduate, Olumuyiwa emerged first runner-up in the university's *Duro Ladipo* playwriting contest and won the *Dambudzo Marechera* short-story prize, with his entry, Cold Blood of Innocence, published in Kollaj (May 1989), the flagship journal of the university's writers' workshop. His Between Two Deaths is published in the anthology *Frontiers: Nigerian Short Stories* (1992), edited by the writer and academic *Asomwan Sonnie Adagbonyin*.

While an undergraduate, he also wrote at least two experimental, absurdist plays under the pseudonym of Sousa Sonne Mateba: The Parable appears in Ogun Onire (1990), the students' literary magazine of the department of English; Rattle is published in Spring (January 1990), the short-lived university literary magazine that was Olumuyiwa's brainchild. Reviewing the latter magazine in Lagos paper The Guardian on Sunday on February 4 1990, Sesan Ajayi writes, "Sousa Sonne Mateba's (aka Biodun Eniayewun) absurdist drama piece Rattle actually rattles us from our realist, chronological assumptions by depicting a situation where motivation is non-existent, and where abrupt signals and indirect references rule the days."

Olumuyiwa's penchant for experimenting with form and technique is palpable throughout In a Journey of Dreams. The collection is dedicated to his mother and late father, "the living and the dead,/ who nurtured many dreams/ in dark nights of hope" and to his Ago-Iwoye mentor Sesan Ajayi, "whose 'urgent throbs ... nudged me here'", Olumuyiwa slightly misquoting Ajayi's own words in the poem Forever Foraging for Faith from A Burst of Fireflies: "the urgent throbs/ of/ a soul in anguish/ nudge me here".

Divided into four parts, Olumuyiwa's collection tracks the interior consciousness of its persona or speaking voice as he meditates on love and beauty, death and mourning, friendship, freedom, and the fate of peoples and places within and beyond Nigeria. The poet's spiritual rite of passage or journey of discovery is bookended by In the Glen of Fulfilment and A Farewell Song, a pair of poems capturing the antithesis of arrival and departure, initiation and farewell.

Olumuyiwa provides social commentary on epochal events and current affairs, holding a mirror to history, especially, the final quarter of the 20th century. Still Naked, for example, is an ode to *Sam Nujoma* on the occasion of Namibia's independence from South Africa:

"I see Windhoek dressed as the rainbow - you may not know, but I think you should,
for you are a sign of this springing moment:
Namibia shines through to me like a pageant of bliss sailing a night ...

But between you and I,
I swear by our joy
and the spirit of our kinship, bound as the waters we pain to know

Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless because of the ruins it brought our race in plaguing currents, this land I behold is still naked.

It is still naked
as the night-stars round our necks, it is still naked as our teeth in the abandon of our grins, naked as the remnant fragment of fears strewn over this freedom ..."

Whereas the six visions comprising the collection's title poem are infused with a spiritual, transcendental essence, the long nine-part poem, Beginnings and Ends, is more rooted in recognisable history. One part honours Jack Mapanje, Malawian poet and former political detainee; another mourns Dele Giwa - Nigerian journalist and founding editor-in-chief of Newswatch, Nigeria's premier weekly newsmagazine - who was killed by a mystery parcel bomb at his Lagos residence on Sunday, October 19 1986. One section shames Blaise Compaoré for his bloody betrayal of Burkina Faso and Thomas Sankara; another is ambivalent about the Soviet Union's Mikhail Gorbachev.

Yet another, titled South Africa - 1991, reflects paradoxically on the apartheid-to-postapartheid dispensation, and with a visionary's prescience:

"My dream is gashed in South Africa by the violence of cruel hearts and now I mourn wasting flesh in shallow graves -

the beginning was the end,
but now the end becomes the beginning,
violent days upon baking anguish.

Buried without love in timeless trenches of hate,
for how long will this dream smother itself?
For how long, when indeed
tomorrows will die
without songs across the tables of war, without love,
to weather blistered steps?

When dreams betray dreams,
tomorrow will die;
hopes collapsing in violent winds of pale memories."

Anyone genuinely interested or invested in the health of modern or contemporary literature should savour the sensuous magnetism of Biodun Olumuyiwa's poetry, its highly affecting empathy and humanity, its sinuous grace and lush lyricism, its aphoristic wit and epigrammatic force, its timely and timeless quality.

Idowu Omoyele is a UK-based writer

Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless

The post Review: Biodun Olumuyiwa's 'In a Journey of Dreams' is both timely and timeless appeared first on The Mail & Guardian.

Link to Image

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

---

End of Document

Why I Ventured Into Movie Production -Foluso Lala

Nigerian Tribune

September 19, 2021 Sunday

Copyright 2021 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1932 words

Body

---

If there is one woman who likes to have her hands in different pies, then the name that comes to mind is Foluso Lala. A writer, an actress and media personality with more than 20 years experience, Lala has written over 25 movie scripts and produced a few. She was the immediate past chairperson of National Association of Women Journalist (NAWOJ), Oyo State. In this interview by SEGUN ADEBAYO, she speaks about her life as actress and media personality.

It seemed you have had your hands in many pies over the years. From journalism to sport and movies, what part of your formative years prepared you for this life you are living?

I had wanted to study Theatre Arts in the university with second option of Mass Communications while my father of blessed memory wanted me to study Law. My interest in theatre apart from the fact that I used to act plays in my primary school days and in the church became strong when my uncle, Ayo Thomas and Dr Sola Fosudo were studying Theatre Arts at the University of Ife, now Obafemi Awolowo University and they and their colleagues used to come to our house at Ogbomoso. Their displays then caught my attention seriously. As God would have it I ended up with Bsc and MMP in Psychology. I also have a PGD in Journalism. During my NYSC, I served in the Public Relations Office of the Nigeria Police Zonal Headquarters, Zone 4, Makurdi. My beat then was to write press releases. Afterwards I gained employment in Tribune. All along from my primary to secondary school days I've been taking part in drama with passion for writing short stories. I was engrossed in reading and summarising novels. I remembered that my father used to buy Sunday Concord newspaper for me because of my love for the column 'Dele Giwa on Sunday'.

You were the immediate past chairperson of NAWOJ in Oyo State, what would you say was your greatest moment during your tenure?

By nature I am a very compassionate person. I always have empathy for women and children who are the vulnerable to all kinds of vices. Nature is not so kind to the womenfolk which in no doubt have effects on the children. My coming onboard as the chairperson of NAWOJ was with a hindsight of contributing my own quota in making life meaningful for the women. Let me mention two cases amongst others. My tenure went at length by way of carrying out four different surgeries on a young boy named Aanuoluwa Rafiu who suffered extra growth in his leg and buttock. It wasn't an easy task but God helped us out. The boy is back in school and very intelligent. We also rescued a day-old baby boy whose mother deliberately delivered by the roadside to be abandoned but for providence that hooked her from running away. We sourced for assistance. The mother and child are doing well.

Why I Ventured Into Movie Production -Foluso Lala

Talking about movies now, what informed your decision to become a thespian; does being a writer qualify one as an actor?

Like I said earlier, I had wanted to study Theatre Arts. The urge to act has been with me unabated. For me, acting is a talent and not a skill while my ability to write well doubles as a talent and a skill too. It is not automatic that a writer can as well be an actor. Some can write but may not be able to act. Some might be able to act but might not be graced to write. Whereas some are graced to write and act. Good acting requires excellent interpretation of roles with perfect body language, amongst others. In my own case, I am powered with both writing and acting. To my credit, I have over 25 movie scripts written by me and I've taken part in a number of cinema and movie productions.

You are a writer and you have been one for a long time. But you have also been acting as well. When are you going to start producing cinema-standard movies like some of your colleagues do?

I'm glad to inform you that I have produced one of my creative writings into a movie with the title ABEGAN. Any good script can be produced for the cinema but the financial implication is the main issue. Cinema work is a serious matter that requires involvement of serious investors but because people don't really know its viability, they stylishly brush it aside. And, the investors who had tasted it and found out that it is very lucrative won't tell. I have this strong belief that sooner than later I will be producing cinema stuffs, in sequence. I am in need of serious minded investors to power my heavy scripts.

For someone who had more than a stint in journalism and has continued to thrive in the business of information dissemination, what comes to your mind when you see how mediocrity is fast destroying the profession?

Firstly, let me correct your impression about having a short period of practice in journalism. I've been in the profession since 1991 till date but for between 2003-2004 on a special assignment in the 8th All Africa Games COJA. All the while I've been practising in the pen profession. I started in the African Newspaper of Nigeria, publishers of Tribune titles; Daily Times; defunct Oracle Newspaper; Alliance of Human Rights Action (AHRA) magazine and presently an information officer in the Oyo State Local Government Service Commission. Information officers are journalists with degrees in Communication Arts and/or PGD in Journalism and are members of the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) and the Nigeria Association of Women Journalists (NAWOJ).

Journalism is a distinctively noble profession that commands respect from both the highly placed and the downtrodden. As the Fourth Estate of the Realm, the highly placed tremble at the sight of a journalist while the downtrodden sees journalists as their mouthpiece to voice out their mind, to table their cause in such a way that governments would work in their favour. T

With your experience in the movie industry and a professional at that, why does it seem you are yet to break into the mainstream where we get to see more of your works on screens?

Like the saying that you can't grow up to reach the sky in just one day. Those ones you see often have stories to tell before they became what they are today. It's just a matter of time. Some of the works I took part in are in the cinema like Efunsetan Aniwura: The Untold Story by Funmi Holder; Balogun Ibikunle and Lagbondonko by Biodun Eleni. Others included Alapa by Tamilore Martins-Ojo; Ohun Aye; Kinni Ero Re?; Isokan Yoruba; The Sadist; Femiremi by Bosede Adelaja Mabis; Abeni and Omolewa and other ones that I can't remember their titles. I also authored a book titled IN Awe of the King.

When should we expect a big budget movie from you or you are just going to concentrate on writing scripts and acting?

Everyone prays to do the extraordinary in their endeavours in order to showcase what they are made of. I appreciate God for the talents He embedded in me. I find script writing and acting very easy. I've written over 25

Why I Ventured Into Movie Production -Foluso Lala

movie scripts and most of my scripts are financial heavyweights meaning sooner than later I will be coming out with big budget works. With the strength and grace of God I will continue to write, act and produce.

You seem to have a quiet lifestyle, but this appears not to be the same for some of your colleagues who keep flaunting fake lifestyles to keep themselves relevant in the business. Why are you not putting more of yourself out there?

There are so many actors and actresses who are super rich; some because of their backgrounds, some through hard work while some are into other streams of income that thrive very well. Those ones that wrongly present themselves to the public do not have same kind of background nor financial mussels to breast the kind of life they struggle to live. Such ones are very close to financial indebtedness and avoidable illnesses because they'll always want to meet up. Some of them engage in what you better not imagine. At the end they'll stretch their body, soul and spirit than necessary. There are always individual differences. I Foluso Lala don't and will never live a fake life. Fake life is a sign of inferiority complex. If you are sure of yourself why should you paint yourself what you are not? People out there are no fools, they know the truth and won't respect anyone who is not what he presents him/herself to be.

As a pretty woman, how do you keep temptations from men in check and does it come with pressure to stay scandal free?

Thanks for the compliment. You know temptation is everywhere. Thanks to God who in His infinite mercy created me fearfully and wonderfully in His image. Every human being is beautiful depending on how you see them. Beauty is in the eye of the beholder, the saying goes. The ones you regard as not so pretty too receive compliments from time to time and with that I am not exempted. How one manages such advances is key. The way you present yourself is also key. Polite but frank rejection is required. You don't expect me to be hopping around. I don't fool around because I respect myself. For what? My 'small me' have taste! (Lol)

Tell us about your new project you are working on and your take on sex for roles which is very rampant in the industry?

Like I said, I just produced a star-studded culture-modern movie titled ABEGAN. I thank God I was able to solely finance it. The cast gives a hint on its financial implication. The movie features creme-la-creme in yoruba nollywood including Joke Muyiwa; Rykardo Agbor; Antar Laniyan; Ladi Folarin; Yetunde Ogunsola; Tamilore Martins-Ojo; Taofeek Adewale 'Digboluja' (Abegan); Wale Akorede Okunnu; Jomiloju Olumbe; Adelani Ariyo; Bosede Adelaja Mabis; myself and a host of others.

About the sex for role in the industry, I have, with every sense of truthfulness, never experienced it. So I may not be an authority in that wise.'

As the music business continues to expand with interests from different walks of life, more record label owners have begun to show interest in the art of nurturing music acts and providing viable platforms that could help them fulfill their dreams.

One of such labels making moves to bridge the gap with plans to put music acts on the world map is Big Achievable Dreams (B.A.D), as it comes into the industry with a breath of fresh air and throwing its weight behind the career of struggling artistes yearning for a platform to showcase their talent.

As part of its plans to lead the way, the South Africa-based company in a statement said it will support artistes with music production, marketing of their contents and branding and strategic planning, one that has the capacity to put their names on and songs on the lips of many music lovers within and outside the African shores.

'We have observed how artistes are struggling to show the world what they can offer and this is why we are offering to give them quality sound production, marketing, management and packaging for artistes of all genres. This cuts across Reggae, Pop, Hiphop, classic music and the likes.'

Why I Ventured Into Movie Production -Foluso Lala

The record label is concerned with bringing the best out of their artistes, through engaging their sense of creativity, proper guidance, strategic planning and quality management.

On a quest to rebranding and refurbishing the entertainment industry, the record label believes in making positive changes to their local and international audience through the provision of top notch entertainment from all subsidiaries; music,film,events and lifestyle.

'We have a line-up of projects that would be coming up from December; our target is to provide opportunities for people, both young and old to explore their creative side and to develop them socially, mentally, financially as well as other aspects that would yield positive productivity'.

Load-Date: September 22, 2021

---

End of Document

RIGHTS-NIGERIA: PROBING 15 YEARS OF ABUSES UNDER THE MILITARY

IPS-Inter Press Service

August 25, 1999, Wednesday

Copyright 1999 IPS-Inter Press Service/Global Information Network

Length: 589 words

Byline: By Remi Oyo

Dateline: LAGOS, Aug. 25

Body

---

The shadows of late Nigerian rights activist Ken Saro-Wiwa and journalist Dele Giwa continue to haunt policymakers in Nigeria.

Saro-Wiwa, leader of the Movement for the Survival of Ogoni People (MOSOP), was executed along with eight other Ogoni leaders in November 1995, allegedly on the orders of the late military dictator, Gen. Sani Abacha.

His compatriot, Giwa, was killed by a letter bomb in October 1986 during Gen. Ibrahim Babangida's rule.

The two murders are now, along with hundreds of others, the subject of investigations by the new Nigerian civilian government of Pres. Olusegun Obasanjo, who was sworn-in in May following 15 years of military rule.

The investigation is being conducted by a panel headed by retired Supreme Court Judge Chukwudifu Oputa, who was appointed by the Obasanjo government.

Controversial Nigerian lawyer Gani Fawehinmi, who is representing Giwa, is demanding two billion naira ($ 20 million) as compensation for the death of his client, who was editor-in-chief of the "Newswatch" magazine before his death.

Fawehinmi is also demanding the prosecution of Col. Halilu Akiliu and Lt. Col. Kunle Togun, both retired officers of the army's intelligence corps at the time of Giwa's murder.

In the petition, Fawehinmi described himself as "friend and counsel to Mr. Dele Giwa (who) commenced and concluded a private investigation into the circumstances surrounding the cold-blooded murder of the courageous journalist.

"Giwa was lawful Nigerian citizen, entitled to his right of life and the pursuit of happiness and investigative journalism," he said.

"The deceased," Fawehinmi said, "was presented with a parcel bomb dressed in official configuration but which connected the military regime of Gen. Ibrahim Babangida. The parcel bomb terminated the life of the deceased without any justification or excuse."

RIGHTS- NIGERIA : PROBING 15 YEARS OF ABUSES UNDER THE MILITARY

Babangida, who ruled Nigeria between 1985 and 1993, has also been named in another petition. Dele Akande, a top Nigerian lawyer, alleges that the former President committed "criminal annulment" when he canceled the results of the 1993 presidential election, which the late businessman Moshood Abiola was presumed to have won.

Abiola died in detention in July 1998.

"The annulment of the June 12 (election) participated in by 14 million voters in the country, denied this country the opportunity to have the person they elected freely and justly to occupy the post of the president of the country," Akande was quoted as saying in a local publication in the commercial capital of Lagos this week.

Akande is also demanding that the panel summon Humphrey Nwosu, who headed the National Electoral Commission under Babangida, to tell his side of the story.

Nwosu has never granted an interview since the annulment of the polls, which resulted in the death of hundreds of protesters, the jailing of scores of others and the ultimate emergence of Abacha, the nation's worst dictator since Nigeria became an independent nation in 1914.

The National Democratic Coalition (NADECO), one of the most vilified pro-democracy groups during Abacha's five-year rule, has also petitioned the panel, chronicling the "degradations" suffered by its members under the Abacha regime.

The nine-page memorandum argues that "despite NADECO's peaceful methods of resistance, the Abacha junta launched a full-scale war against its members. Where we called for dialogue, Abacha hounded us to jail, sent assassins after us, and bombers to our homes."

NADECO is demanding two billion naira (about $ 20 million) from the government as compensation.

Load-Date: August 26, 1999

---

End of Document

NUJ demands arrest, prosecution of killers of Bayelsa journalist

Business Day

April 30, 2017 Sunday

Copyright 2017 Business Day All Rights Reserved

Length: 267 words

Body

---

The Nigeria Union of Journalist (NUJ) has urged the Inspector General of Police, Idris Abubakar, to ensure the arrest and prosecution of the killers of Famou Giobaro, a broadcast journalist in Bayelsa.

The union made the request in a communiqué issued Sunday at the end of the NUJ National Executive Council (NEC) meeting, held in Gombe.

The communiqué was signed by the NUJ National Secretary, Malam Shuaibu Leman.

News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) recalls that on April 16, some unidentified gunmen had killed Giobaro, a staff of Bayelsa-owned Glory FM 97.1, in his residence at INEC Road, Kpasia in Yenagoa, the state capital.

The attackers neither stole anything, nor attacked other occupants of the house, triggering speculations the killing could have been premeditated.

The union is also demanding that the case files of all slain journalists be re-opened, including those of late Dele Giwa and Bagauda Kaltho.

The communiqué further condemned in strong terms, the withdrawal of a Punch reporter, Olalekan Adedayo, from the State House and urged Presidency to reprimand the Chief Security Officer responsible for the act.

The union challenged the Federal Government to sanction state governments that failed to properly utilise the first batch of the Paris Club refund.

The communiqué further commended the anti-corruption war of the present administration and also called on the National Assembly to ensure quick passage of the Petroleum Industry Bill, to stabilise the sector.

The NUJ commended the Gombe State Government and the State Council of the union for the successful hosting of the NEC meeting. (NAN)

Load-Date: May 1, 2017

OPINION: AT 78, IBB MAINTAINS HIS IMPORTANT BEATS, BUT

The Will (Nigeria)

August 17, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 The Will Newspaper All Rights Reserved

Length: 1464 words

Body

General Ibrahim Babangida I had, in the past, written a number of tributes on the occasion of the anniversary of former military president, General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida (IBB). I penned the last one in 2017 on his 76thbirthday titled: "At 76, IBB sustains his essential rhythm".

I had introduced the subject matter by pointing out how special the month of August is to him, being the month of his birth and the month he stepped in and out of the saddle as military president. Nothing has changed or can change the fact that the eighth month in the annual calendar holds a great deal of significance for him and intense attraction to his admirers in the contemplation and celebration of the IBB persona, which is wrapped in enigma.

The phenomenal individuality that lives on the mythical Hilltop in Minna marks his 78thanniversary on August 17. Interestingly, at an age shy of 80, IBB continues to maintain his important beats. But, it is about time he confronted his existential conundrums before he takes his deserved place in the pantheon.

At 78, IBB can laugh death to scorn. In other words, as a veritable human institution, he has overcome the fear of death- certainly no more points to prove.

He can fittingly appropriate the Latin phrase attributed to Julius Caesar, in a letter to the Roman Senate around 47 BC after he had achieved a quick victory in his short war against Pharnaces II of Pontus at the Battle of Zela, "Veni, vidi, vici", meaning I came, I saw and I conquered. As a sui generis statesman, IBB had defined his eon with the magnitude of his character, military discipline and political beliefs.

He had compulsorily fought a number of battles he had also deliberately chosen some battles to fight while in the face of imminent defeats in some other battles, he had beaten tactical retreats and, perhaps guided on those occasions by the eternal words of Demosthenes, an epic Greek orator, after the Battle of Chaeronea in 338 BC where, according to notes, he deserted, to wit: "For he that fights and runs away, may live to fight another day." One of such occasions was the annulment of the June 12 presidential election won by the late Chief M.

K.O.

Abiola.IBB had stepped aside following national and international pressure against his plan to elongate his stay in power.

The other was the battle to return to the presidency via the ballot box, but which plan he abandoned in 2007 under the tension of counter goal and intimidation by the powers-that-be. By stepping aside amid the ballyhoo that greeted the annulment of the June 12, 1993 presidential election, IBB had cleverly negotiated his survival against so many forces that had engaged him in a survival battle.

OPINION: AT 78, IBB MAINTAINS HIS IMPORTANT BEATS, BUT

That episodic event was after he had been largely sustained in power with the support of a carefully selected crop of academics and brilliant minds, with whose cerebral resources, he had survived the dialectics and polemics of intellectual interrogations of the contents of his transition programme from the wider community of the nation's anti-military eggheads. IBB had also surmounted the political confrontations by the old guard of barely principled politicians, who piled pressure on him to surrender power to civil authority, as well as the tangible strain of his own military constituency, which was ready to explore the coup option as a last resort to bring his regime to a terminus.

As I wrote before, in the peak of the commotion, the army general who survived a bloody coup masterminded by Major Gideon Orkar, had decided to stop the seeming unending mesmerism of the polity, characterized by continuous shifts of and adjustments in the transition timetable. In the face of obvious loss of popular support and national goodwill, the famed Maradona of Nigeria's political landscape, had thrown in the towel and emplaced an Interim National Government headed by Chief Ernest Shonekan.

He had retreated to his Hilltop mansion in Minna for power-brokerage communion. Since 1993, the avuncular IBB has continued to minister to the needs of his loyalists as an oracle of sorts, building for himself a seemingly impregnable myth of the ultimate power broker until it was shattered in 2006 when the then president, General Olusegun Obasanjo, unleashed the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC) on his first son, Mohammed, for his alleged 24 percent shareholding in Globacom under the chair of Otunba Mike Adenuga.

The melodrama of Mohammed's invitation by the EFCC happened about the eve of IBB's 65th birthday in 2006. It was also a prelude to the widespread agitations by IBB's followers to have him join the race for the presidency in 2007. Between hunting down Adenuga, who was believed to be a trusted business ally of IBB and Mohammed, was IBB himself who, although was untouched, got the message that he should not attempt to vie for the presidency on the platform of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) or any other party's platform for that matter. Since that incident, which saw IBB withdraw his interest after picking the expression of interest form, he has remained content with his pastime as a perceptive "prophetic" or "oracular" diviner.

His influence in shaping the direction of leadership and governance has not been diminished by the reality of the socio-economic and political conditions that served as an endgame to his regime in 1993. I have always argued that the political ferment that culminated in the anti-climax of his historic egress was an inalienable part of the corpus of knowledge that underpinned the nation's ill-fated Third Republic, over which his regime superintended. Notwithstanding, he chose to be his own prophet, declaring that he was stepping aside.

He did so with the intention of returning to power some day, but his prophecy did not come true. The year 2007 had marked a dramatic retreat by IBB into his shell.

It was a denouement of sorts. Opposition to his presidential aspiration had come from Obasanjo, the man he helped to power in 1999. He had to withdraw from the race because he could not secure Obasanjo's critical support.

In his letter of withdrawal, which he sent to Obasanjo, he had said he was withdrawing because of the moral dilemma occasioned by the entry of General Aliyu Gusau and Alhaji Umar Yar' Adua both of whom he described as a friend and a younger brother respectively into the race. Surprisingly, in 2010, following the death of President Umaru Yar'Adua, IBB was listed among the northern presidential aspirants shortlisted by a group of northern leaders chaired by the late Malam Adamu Ciroma for the choice of a consensus candidate that would be supported by the north in the PDP presidential primary.

But Atiku Abubakar had emerged the eventual consensus choice of the northern leaders. IBB had maintained a studied silence subsequently, not acting in any way that would unsettle the polity.

Perhaps, since after the 1993 experience, he considers no sacrifice too much to make for national unity. This must have informed his resolve in 2007, in particular, to quietly ease out of the presidential race without embracing the idea of confronting Obasanjo in a witty and gritty succession battle.

OPINION: AT 78, IBB MAINTAINS HIS IMPORTANT BEATS, BUT

Even now, the gap-toothed general understands better the dynamics of the Nigerian political landscape. He knows how to sustain his own political rhythm or relevance.

But, in sustaining his essential relevance in the ambit of the perception, conception and construction of a united and stable nation, IBB must be fair to himself by taking steps to shed the garbs of "evil genius", "Maradona" and other insalubrious monikers that had been foisted on him by the significant others in describing his individuality. What do I mean? It is time IBB declassified once and for posterity his roles in a number of incidents in which he reportedly featured prominently.

Consider some of them: the coup for which his best friend, General Mamman Vatsa, was killed in order to clear some insidious insinuations the June 12, 1993 presidential election annulment to clarify the roles played by all the actors the allegedly misappropriated $12.5 billion Gulf Oil Windfall despite a court dismissal of the suit against him in 2012 and the assassination of Dele Giwa via a parcel bomb under his regime, among others. An autobiography is a veritable medium by which he can declassify his roles and those of the significant others otherwise, he would go with his own sides of the stories to his grave.

But is this the essential legacy, a legacy of unresolved riddles and obfuscated brainteasers, that IBB wants to leave behind as a statesman? He must obligatorily ponder this on his anniversary. This is wishing IBB well on his 78th birthday.

Sufyan Ojeifo, an Abuja-based journalist, contributed this piece viaojwonderngr@yahoo.com

Load-Date: August 21, 2019

---

End of Document

At 78, IBB maintains his important beats, but...

At 78, IBB maintains his important beats, but...

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

August 17, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1459 words

Byline: Sufuyan Ojeifo -

Body

---

I had, in the past, written a number of tributes on the occasion of the anniversary of former military president, General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida (IBB). I penned the last one in 2017 on his 76th birthday titled: "At 76, IBB sustains his essential rhythm". I had introduced the subject matter by pointing out how special the month of August is to him, being the month of his birth and the month he stepped in and out of the saddle as military president.

Nothing has changed or can change the fact that the eighth month in the annual calendar holds a great deal of significance for him and intense attraction to his admirers in the contemplation and celebration of the IBB persona, which is wrapped in enigma. The phenomenal individuality that lives on the mythical Hilltop in Minna marks his 78th anniversary on August 17.

Interestingly, at an age shy of 80, IBB continues to maintain his important beats. But, it is about time he confronted his existential conundrums before he takes his deserved place in the pantheon. At 78, IBB can laugh death to scorn. In other words, as a veritable human institution, he has overcome the fear of death- certainly no more points to prove. He can fittingly appropriate the Latin phrase attributed to Julius Caesar, in a letter to the Roman Senate around 47 BC after he had achieved a quick victory in his short war against Pharnaces II of Pontus at the Battle of Zela, "Veni, vidi, vici", meaning I came, I saw and I conquered.

As a sui generis statesman, IBB had defined his eon with the magnitude of his character, military discipline and political beliefs. He had compulsorily fought a number of battles; he had also deliberately chosen some battles to fight while in the face of imminent defeats in some other battles, he had beaten tactical retreats; and, perhaps guided on those occasions by the eternal words of Demosthenes, an epic Greek orator, after the Battle of Chaeronea in 338 BC where, according to notes, he deserted, to wit: "For he that fights and runs away, may live to fight another day."

One of such occasions was the annulment of the June 12 presidential election won by the late Chief M.K.O. Abiola. IBB had stepped aside following national and international pressure against his plan to elongate his stay in power. The other was the battle to return to the presidency via the ballot box, but which plan he abandoned in 2007 under the tension of counter goal and intimidation by the powers-that-be. By stepping aside amid the ballyhoo that greeted the annulment of the June 12, 1993 presidential election, IBB had cleverly negotiated his survival against so many forces that had engaged him in a survival battle.

At 78, IBB maintains his important beats, but...

That episodic event was after he had been largely sustained in power with the support of a carefully selected crop of academics and brilliant minds, with whose cerebral resources, he had survived the dialectics and polemics of intellectual interrogations of the contents of his transition programme from the wider community of the nation's anti-military eggheads. IBB had also surmounted the political confrontations by the old guard of barely principled politicians, who piled pressure on him to surrender power to civil authority, as well as the tangible strain of his own military constituency, which was ready to explore the coup option as a last resort to bring his regime to a terminus.

As I wrote before, in the peak of the commotion, the army general who survived a bloody coup masterminded by Major Gideon Orkar, had decided to stop the seeming unending mesmerism of the polity, characterized by continuous shifts of and adjustments in the transition timetable. In the face of obvious loss of popular support and national goodwill, the famed Maradona of Nigeria's political landscape, had thrown in the towel and emplaced an Interim National Government headed by Chief Ernest Shonekan. He had retreated to his Hilltop mansion in Minna for power-brokerage communion.

Since 1993, the avuncular IBB has continued to minister to the needs of his loyalists as an oracle of sorts, building for himself a seemingly impregnable myth of the ultimate power broker until it was shattered in 2006 when the then president, General Olusegun Obasanjo, unleashed the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC) on his first son, Mohammed, for his alleged 24 percent shareholding in Globacom under the chair of Otunba Mike Adenuga. The melodrama of Mohammed's invitation by the EFCC happened about the eve of IBB's 65th birthday in 2006. It was also a prelude to the widespread agitations by IBB's followers to have him join the race for the presidency in 2007.

Between hunting down Adenuga, who was believed to be a trusted business ally of IBB and Mohammed, was IBB himself who, although was untouched, got the message that he should not attempt to vie for the presidency on the platform of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) or any other party's platform for that matter. Since that incident, which saw IBB withdraw his interest after picking the expression of interest form, he has remained content with his pastime as a perceptive "prophetic" or "oracular" diviner. His influence in shaping the direction of leadership and governance has not been diminished by the reality of the socio-economic and political conditions that served as an endgame to his regime in 1993.

I have always argued that the political ferment that culminated in the anti-climax of his historic egress was an inalienable part of the corpus of knowledge that underpinned the nation's ill-fated Third Republic, over which his regime superintended. Notwithstanding, he chose to be his own prophet, declaring that he was stepping aside. He did so with the intention of returning to power some day, but his prophecy did not come true. The year 2007 had marked a dramatic retreat by IBB into his shell. It was a denouement of sorts.

Opposition to his presidential aspiration had come from Obasanjo, the man he helped to power in 1999. He had to withdraw from the race because he could not secure Obasanjo's critical support. In his letter of withdrawal, which he sent to Obasanjo, he had said he was withdrawing because of the moral dilemma occasioned by the entry of General Aliyu Gusau and Alhaji Umar Yar' Adua both of whom he described as a friend and a younger brother respectively into the race.

Surprisingly, in 2010, following the death of President Umaru Yar'Adua, IBB was listed among the northern presidential aspirants shortlisted by a group of northern leaders chaired by the late Malam Adamu Ciroma for the choice of a consensus candidate that would be supported by the north in the PDP presidential primary. But Atiku Abubakar had emerged the eventual consensus choice of the northern leaders. IBB had maintained a studied silence subsequently, not acting in any way that would unsettle the polity.

Perhaps, since after the 1993 experience, he considers no sacrifice too much to make for national unity. This must have informed his resolve in 2007, in particular, to quietly ease out of the presidential race without embracing the idea of confronting Obasanjo in a witty and gritty succession battle. Even now, the gap-toothed general understands better the dynamics of the Nigerian political landscape. He knows how to sustain his own political rhythm or relevance.

At 78, IBB maintains his important beats, but...

But, in sustaining his essential relevance in the ambit of the perception, conception and construction of a united and stable nation, IBB must be fair to himself by taking steps to shed the garbs of "evil genius", "Maradona" and other insalubrious monikers that had been foisted on him by the significant others in describing his individuality. What do I mean? It is time IBB declassified once and for posterity his roles in a number of incidents in which he reportedly featured prominently.

Consider some of them: the coup for which his best friend, General Mamman Vatsa, was killed in order to clear some insidious insinuations; the June 12, 1993 presidential election annulment to clarify the roles played by all the actors; the allegedly misappropriated $12.5 billion Gulf Oil Windfall despite a court dismissal of the suit against him in 2012; and the assassination of Dele Giwa via a parcel bomb under his regime, among others. An autobiography is a veritable medium by which he can declassify his roles and those of the significant others; otherwise, he would go with his own sides of the stories to his grave.

But is this the essential legacy, a legacy of unresolved riddles and obfuscated brainteasers, that IBB wants to leave behind as a statesman? He must obligatorily ponder this on his anniversary. This is wishing IBB well on his 78th birthday.

*Ojeifo, an Abuja-based journalist, contributed this piece via ojwonderngr@yahoo.com

Load-Date: August 17, 2019

---

End of Document

At 78, IBB Maintains His Essential Beats, But...

Nigerian Tribune

August 17, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1451 words

Body

---

I had, in the past, written a number of tributes on the occasion of the anniversary of former military president, General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida (IBB). I penned the last one in 2017 on his 76th birthday titled: 'At 76, IBB sustains his essential rhythm'. I had introduced the subject matter by pointing out how special the month of August is to him, being the month of his birth and the month he stepped in and out of the saddle as military president.

Nothing has changed or can change the fact that the eighth month in the annual calendar holds a great deal of significance for him and intense attraction to his admirers in the contemplation and celebration of the IBB persona, which is wrapped in enigma. The phenomenal individuality that lives on the mythical Hilltop in Minna marks his 78th anniversary this year (August 17).

Interestingly, at an age shy of 80, IBB continues to maintain his important beats. But, it is about time he confronted his existential conundrums before he takes his deserved place in the pantheon. At 78, IBB can laugh death to scorn. In other words, as a veritable human institution, he has overcome the fear of death- certainly no more points to prove. He can fittingly appropriate the Latin phrase attributed to Julius Caesar, in a letter to the Roman Senate around 47 BC after he had achieved a quick victory in his short war against Pharnaces II of Pontus at the Battle of Zela, 'Veni, vidi, vici', meaning I came, I saw and I conquered.

As a sui generis statesman, IBB had defined his eon with the magnitude of his character, military discipline and political beliefs. He had compulsorily fought a number of battles; he had also deliberately chosen some battles to fight while in the face of imminent defeats in some other battles, he had beaten tactical retreats; and, perhaps guided on those occasions by the eternal words of Demosthenes, an epic Greek orator, after the Battle of Chaeronea in 338 BC where, according to notes, he deserted, to wit: 'For he that fights and runs away, may live to fight another day.'

One of such occasions was the annulment of the June 12, 1993 presidential election won by the late Chief M.K.O. Abiola. IBB had stepped aside following national and international pressure against his plan to elongate his stay in power. The other was the battle to return to the presidency via the ballot box, but which plan he abandoned in 2007 under the tension of counter goal and intimidation by the powers-that-be. By stepping aside amid the ballyhoo that greeted the annulment of the June 12 presidential election, IBB had cleverly negotiated his survival against so many forces that had engaged him in a survival battle.

That episodic event followed his sustenance in power via the support of a carefully selected crop of academics and brilliant minds, with whose cerebral resources, he had survived the dialectics and polemics of intellectual interrogations of the contents of his transition programme from the wider community of the nation's anti-military eggheads. IBB had also surmounted the political confrontations by the old guard of barely principled politicians, who piled pressure on him to surrender power to civil authority, as well as the tangible strain of his own military constituency, which was ready to explore the coup option as a last resort to bring his regime to a terminus.

At 78, IBB Maintains His Essential Beats, But...

As I wrote before, in the peak of the commotion, the army general who survived a bloody coup masterminded by Major Gideon Orkar, had decided to stop the seeming unending mesmerism of the polity, characterized by continuous shifts of and adjustments in the transition timetable. In the face of obvious loss of popular support and national goodwill, the famed Maradona of Nigeria's political landscape, had thrown in the towel and emplaced an Interim National Government headed by Chief Ernest Shonekan. He had retreated to his Hilltop mansion in Minna for power-brokerage communion.

Since 1993, the avuncular IBB has continued to minister to the needs of his loyalists as an oracle of sorts, building for himself a seemingly impregnable myth of the ultimate power broker until it was shattered in 2006 when the then president, General Olusegun Obasanjo, unleashed the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC) on his first son, Mohammed, for his alleged 24 percent shareholding in Globacom under the chair of Otunba Mike Adenuga. The melodrama of Mohammed's invitation by the EFCC happened about the eve of IBB's 65th birthday in 2006. It was also a prelude to the widespread agitations by IBB's followers to have him join the race for the presidency in 2007.

Between hunting down Adenuga, who was believed to be a trusted business ally of IBB and Mohammed, was IBB himself who, although was untouched, got the message that he should not attempt to vie for the presidency on the platform of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) or any other party's platform for that matter. Since that incident, which saw IBB withdraw his interest after picking the expression of interest form, he has remained content with his pastime as a perceptive 'prophetic' or 'oracular' diviner. His influence in shaping the direction of leadership and governance has not been diminished by the reality of the socio-economic and political conditions that served as an endgame to his regime in 1993.

I have always argued that the political ferment that culminated in the anti-climax of his historic egress was an inalienable part of the corpus of knowledge that underpinned the nation's ill-fated Third Republic, over which his regime superintended. Notwithstanding, he chose to be his own prophet, declaring that he was stepping aside. He did so with the intention of returning to power some day, but his prophecy did not come true. The year 2007 had marked a dramatic retreat by IBB into his shell. It was a denouement of sorts.

Opposition to his presidential aspiration had come from Obasanjo, the man he helped to power in 1999. He had to withdraw from the race because he could not secure Obasanjo's critical support. In his letter of withdrawal, which he sent to Obasanjo, he had said he was withdrawing because of the moral dilemma occasioned by the entry of General Aliyu Gusau and Alhaji Umar Yar' Adua both of whom he described as a friend and a younger brother respectively into the race.

Surprisingly, in 2010, following the death of President Umaru Yar'Adua, IBB was listed among the northern presidential aspirants shortlisted by a group of northern leaders under the Chair of the late Adamu Ciroma for the choice of a consensus candidate that would be supported by the north in the PDP presidential primary. But Atiku Abubakar had emerged the eventual consensus choice of the northern elders. He maintained a studied silence subsequently, not acting in any way that would unsettle the polity.

Perhaps, since after the 1993 experience, he considers no sacrifice too much to make for national unity. This must have informed his resolve in 2007, in particular, to quietly ease out of the presidential race without embracing the idea of confronting Obasanjo in a witty and gritty succession battle. Even now, the gap-toothed general understands better the dynamics of the Nigerian political landscape. He knows how to sustain his own political rhythm or relevance.

But, in sustaining his essential relevance in the ambit of the perception, conception and construction of a united and stable nation, IBB must be fair to himself by taking steps to shed the garbs of 'evil genius', 'Maradona' and other insalubrious monikers that had been foisted on him by the significant others in describing his individuality. What do I mean? It is time IBB declassified once and for posterity his roles in a number of incidents in which he reportedly featured prominently.

At 78, IBB Maintains His Essential Beats, But...

Consider some of them: the coup for which his best friend, General Mamman Vatsa, was killed to clear some insidious insinuations; the June 12, 1993 presidential election annulment to clarify the roles played by all the actors; the allegedly misappropriated $12.5 billion Gulf Oil Windfall despite a court dismissal of the suit in 2012; and the assassination of Dele Giwa via a parcel bomb under his regime, among others. An autobiography is a veritable medium of declassifying his roles and those of the significant others; otherwise, he would go with his own sides of the stories to his grave.

But is this the essential legacy, a legacy of unresolved riddles and obfuscated brainteasers, that IBB wants to leave behind as a statesman? He must obligatorily ponder this on his anniversary. This is wishing IBB well on his 78th birthday.

Ojeifo, an Abuja-based journalist, contributed this piece via ojwonderngr@yahoo.com

Load-Date: August 20, 2019

---

End of Document

Blame Obasanjo For Bad Leadership In Nigeria Osoba

The Will (Nigeria)

August 7, 2018 Tuesday

Copyright 2018 The Will Newspaper All Rights Reserved

Length: 282 words

Body

---

BEVERLY HILLS, August 07, (THEWILL) A former governor of Ogun State, Chief Olusegun Osoba, has declared that ex-President Olusegun Obasanjo should be held responsible for the bad leadership in the country. Osoba spoke on Monday in Lagos at the 70th Birthday Colloquium of one of the co-founders of Newswatch Magazine, Mr Ray Ekpu, a contemporary of the late Dele Giwa.

Osoba alleged that the Obasanjo manipulated the governors elected on the platform of the Alliance for Democracy (AD) in 1999 out of the Council of State, saying that manipulation by Obasanjo "was the beginning of the downward trend of leadership in this country." The journalist-turned-politician said the crop of state governors elected in 1999 through the open ballot system were still the best, noting that he and others never had any cause to be probed for corruption by anti-graft agencies.

Some of those in attendance were a former governor of Akwa Ibom State, Obong Victor Attah the founder of Vanguard Newspaper, Sam Amuka-Pemu Prof Pat Utomi a former Deputy Governor of the Central Bank of Nigeria and presidential hopeful, Kingsley Moghalu and the Chairman, Editorial Board, The Nation Newspaper, Sam Omatseye. On the panel of discussants were the Executive Director of Enough is Enough, Ms Yemi Adamolekun and Mr Debo Adesina.

While expressing his hope in the future of the country, Osoba said he believed that the proposed electronic voting in the amendment to the Electoral Act would eliminate election rigging in the country. He blamed the emergence of bad leaders on the nonchalance of the educated citizens who slept in their houses on election day and left the exercise to thugs, "who sell their votes for N5,000."

Load-Date: August 17, 2018

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

Nigerian Tribune

April 16, 2023 Sunday

Copyright 2023 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 5061 words

Body

---

I would say the inspiration came from two sources: one, it was a product of some of the experiences that I had as a young person that made me detest injustice in whatever way it manifests itself. I recall that in my first year in secondary school, I always emphasised this first year because I repeated Form I. In that very first year, there was a senior that I was serving which was the tradition then; a junior student was attached to a senior that he or she would serve. The person that I served was a very wicked person; he was a brute. Anytime I arrived at school with all my provisions, he would ask me to open my box and pick all that he wanted - milk, sugar and foodstuffs like garri and all of that. And then, he would generally bully you, beat you up, shout at you and so on.

I recall he liked some particular kind of food - eko. On the days that eko was on the menu at the dining hall, it was compulsory for me to help him gather as many wraps as possible. He never once asked about my well-being despite the fact that I used to be sickly. I looked at my other classmates and the seniors they were serving, the experience seemed slightly different. Some of them were humane, took the juniors serving them as their brothers or sons; they were not forcefully taking their food, their provisions. So, I looked at that and felt it should be the model of relationship between juniors and seniors and from that experience, I told myself that whenever I became a senior student, I would behave like those other seniors and not behave like this man and where possible, I would rise against injustice.

The other one was also related. This was the most painful experience I had in that first year. It had to do with some of my classmates who were bullies. There was a day someone alleged that his wristwatch was stolen. We used to have prep in those days. In the evening you had to go to the class compulsorily to read; there was also afternoon prep. That day, I was coming to class, they had just built a technical block in the school and some of the equipment they wanted to put in the building was spread around the premises. So, that day, I was just coming to the class, I didn't even know that somebody had said his wristwatch was missing. As I was coming in, after taking a few steps up, I saw a wristwatch under one of the equipment, something like a small container, I just picked it up. When I entered the classroom, I asked who the owner of the wristwatch was. And the next thing some of them said was that 'Yes, you're the one that stole it.' All efforts to convince my classmates fell on deaf ears. This matter went up to our seniors and I remember that I was mercilessly beaten by the then senior prefect. The essence of the punishment was that you're already guilty and you must just confess your sin. The beating was so much that I didn't know when I said 'yes, I was the one that took it' just to escape the punishment. I am talking of real beating and torture. But people said you should have stood your ground and all that. It also made me understand that when one is under pressure, you're threatened, one can confess to an offence not committed just to escape punishment. Of course, that showed me I needed to strengthen myself. I said to myself 'this is an injustice perpetrated by your classmates, some of whom are bullies.' It was an experience that fired the inspiration that as I grew up or advanced in that school, I would be doing things that advance the cause of justice.

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

Was there any inspiration before the secondary school experiences?

I think another inspiration also came from general childhood experiences one way or the other. I have always been an activist, even from my primary school days. I was very active in the school's dramatic group. I was also involved in the school band, entertaining other students. I liked acting a lot. In those days, it was called entertainment. Anytime they had end-of-year drama or entertainment and I was not chosen to perform, I would be angry; I would fight and I felt it was a kind of inspiration.

Then, back to our secondary school, I remember the kind of literature we were exposed to. Some of them made us think in terms of fighting for justice in society. I did mention this in my students' unionism memoir, by the time we got to Form IV and V, we had read books like Zambia Shall be Free by Kenneth Kaunda, Tell Freedom by Peter Abraham and Mine Boy. All that literature's sort of changed our worldview, that if we say we were enjoying ourselves, things were not rosy for some other people. From Tell Freedom, we got to know there was a place in this world where black and white did not mingle, where as a black, you could not even go to school. Only the white could go to school because they were privileged. We were told that the system in South Africa was called apartheid. This provoked hatred of injustice in our young minds. So, for me, these are what I could call sources of inspiration when we talk of public activism. In any case, before I left secondary school, I was social prefect and unlike those bullying seniors, I tried to relate well and today, my circle of friends goes beyond my classmates and includes my juniors. So, we were able to bring a new orientation that things could be done without necessarily inflicting injuries on your fellow students, particularly the junior ones.

Perhaps I should also add the inspiration from my dad as a principled person who rejected injustice in all its ramifications. My dad spoke his mind no matter whose ox was gored and once he was convinced that his fight was just, nobody could change his mind. He would fight to the last.

How was your experience growing up?

Well, it was quite exciting because it was full of memorable events. Those were the days of street restlessness or if you like, activism of the streets whenever you were not in the classroom or in the church. You had a situation where we engaged in all kinds of moonlight plays or exercises. But I felt that it also helped in the mental development of our generation, talking about growing up on the streets of Osi-Ekiti, doing hide-and-seek, all kinds of games that tested, not only your strength, but intelligence. I recall the one that involved holding a tiny stone and shaking everyone's hand so that you would pass on the stone to somebody unnoticed. It would now be the duty of the person selected for the purpose to guess who had the stone as everybody was meant to be tight fisted irrespective of who had the stone. That person would sometimes look at the body language to guess correctly and some of my childhood friends were experts at detecting the holder of the stone. That game was called mude-mude. We played street football as well up to and including inter-street football competition.

Then, my father was a produce buyer, a cocoa merchant; he was known as 'Akin Onikoko' not only in Osi-Ekiti, but in neighbouring towns like Iropora, Awo, Epe, Ara, Igbole, Ido, Ifishin, among others. He used to travel to those towns for produce collections in the Lorries of Lawrence Omole and Sons, the Ilesa-based bigger cocoa merchant to which my father, Thomas Akinyemi Arogundade, was attached as an agent. My father didn't like it, but aided and abetted by the drivers and loaders, I would often find a way of jumping into the lorries for the village runs. All the collections would be brought to our big shop for proper bagging and grading for movement to Ilesa and from there to the Lagos seaport. The travels also exposed me to people and activities in those other places early in life.

Which of these holds the fondest memory for you?

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

The masquerade festivals stood out. I loved the kind of masqueraders that I saw in those other places. My grandfather, Daniel Ogunlana, was based in Awo-Ekiti. In fact, he was a contemporary of the founder of CAC Church, Ayo Babalola, more or less the first generation of that church and he built the first CAC Church in Awo-Ekiti. Anytime I followed my dad to purchase cocoa in that town and I noticed the masquerade festival was on, I would find an excuse to return. I would say I would like to spend the holiday with my grandfather, just because I wanted to feature in those activities.

I recall telling my grandfather's secretary to take me to the masquerades' shrine not far from our house so that I could become one. He said I needed to bring money. How much was the money then? Six pence. I went to my grandmother and convinced her and she gave me the money. I went to the man and said 'come and take me to the bush'. Then he laughed and said 'you want me to lose my job? Don't you know your grandfather is a Christian? He will sack me if he finds out.' In spite of that, I would still run round the streets after the masqueraders. And in the night, the masquerader would be running after me in my dream. I would cry out and the old man would say you must have been following those masqueraders and would flog me. So, that's the kind of exciting experience that we had. It extended to going to the farm and having a good educational foundation.

What about schooling?

I went to St. Paul's Anglican Primary School, Osi-Ekiti. We had fantastic teachers, some of them disciplinarians. If you messed up, they flogged you. In fact, one of them, the one we called Boogie-Ranking, would say if he flogged you and you reported to your mother, he would also flog your mother and if you also brought your father, he would flog him - all this to our murmurs of anger and disapproval.

When it came to the time to go to secondary school, the idea was that you took entrance examinations in different schools and then, you decided the one you preferred. I remember I was offered admission into African Church Grammar School, Ilesa, but my dad said I could not go there because my brother was already there and we would not face our studies, but would be playing football. I also got admission into Ijebu-Jesa Grammar School and Ekiti Parapo College. Invariably, I chose Ekiti Parapo College because a person like the late Professor Olu Ogboja came to our house and said it was EKPACO I should attend because that was his school and it was the best. I went there and I saw a good school.

As I often say, Ekiti Parapo College was like our first university. That was a secondary school that had everything, including well-equipped biology, chemistry and physics laboratories. We didn't lack anything. We were there right in the bush, so to say, but I can't remember anytime we were to write WAEC exams and we would have to go and borrow equipment for experiments from other secondary schools. In the physics lab then, we had many gas cylinders, sometimes we would play with them. There was one we called laughing gas, we would say we want to laugh, let's release laughing gas to make us laugh.

What about your tertiary education?

Before I got admitted to the University of Ife (now Obafemi Awolowo University), I was at the Federal School of Arts and Science, Ondo (FSASON). I was there for the Advanced Level programme, but I didn't spend the entire two years there. I just did one year; I sat for JME and passed. I wanted to study Economics, but I didn't meet the cut-off mark, by three points or so. In fact, I had started writing my A' Level exams when my uncle, now retired Bishop Kehinde Olowokure, who was an archdeacon at the All Saints Anglican Church, Ogbonkowo, Ondo, at the time kept saying 'you don't need to wait, you're an old person, go and take a course.' That was how I stopped writing the exams and took up the offer of admission to study Psychology at Ife. FSASON was also another experience in terms of the facilities that we had because it was like a buffer then when you could not go directly to the university. At the school then, we had all sorts of clubs, one of which was the press club. Groups or individuals would come together and give themselves a name and they would write stories. The stories then were handwritten on sheets of paper that were pasted on the notice boards. My own press organisation then was called Ken-Picolo Organisation because there were three of us - Kenlast, Picolo and myself. So, the press club was the most popular and most prominent club at FSASON then. We used to contest elections. I ran for the position of secretary against one of our classmates, Jendu, a very popular socialite. Of course, I lost the election, but that was the first time I stepped forward to address a large audience to talk about what I could do as secretary of the organisation. I lost, but it was a good experience.

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

It was from Ondo that I moved to the University of Ife in 1980 to study Psychology. Some of my mates in Ondo were admitted the same year. Some of us found ourselves living in the same room because not everybody was able to get a bed space then. On getting to Ife, there were mates like Tope Ibitoye and others who would later be instrumental to my success when it came to campaigning for offices. But the thing was that in our first year at Ife, it was like we were awe-struck by the campus. If it was raining and you were in the lecture room, you wouldn't know it was raining because of the drainage system. We felt we were in another world entirely. You can even spend a whole day moving around, admiring the lecture theatre, Oduduwa Hall, the amphitheatre and so on. In the classrooms, we had an audiovisual system through which some of the lectures were delivered.

How did you get involved in campus activism?

No matter where you came from, the Ife campus then would change the person in you, and from that we were exposed to student unionism. In fact, shortly after we resumed, campaigns were on. Even as we were arriving on campus, they were going to stage protests in Lagos. So, I had early stages of exposure to activism under the leadership of Wole Olaoye and the rest of them. They now had campaigns for candidates, singing and beating drums. It was a beautiful experience. At Ife then, Part I students could not vote and be voted for, but you can participate, you can be cheerleaders, you can be noise makers. So, we followed the candidates around the campus. Even from that first year, there was something to show one might be interested in students' unionism.

And it didn't take long because by my second year, I had made up my mind that I was going to contest for a position in the Students Representative Council to represent the Faculty of Social Sciences. In those days, we were allocated 35 seats and I was able to clinch one of the seats. And based on my performance in the SRC, in the third year, I ran for the secretary-general of the Students Union. By that time, I had become an ideologue and joined the Alliance of Progressive Students (APS), a student socialist group, and it was a factor. And in my final year, again based on my performance, the presidency of the National Association of Nigerian Students (NANS) was coming to Zone D, our zone. Again we had comrades and friends who felt I was the best to run for that position. We ran around for that and I became NANS president.

And campus journalism?

My exposure to journalism in Ife campus was another dynamism we witnessed. The fact that as you're waking up in your room, someone is knocking on your door, student vendors selling journals - we had Echo, Bang, Petals and others like Cobra which was the chief gossip magazine. They go after lecturers who were chasing girls and others. As of the time we were there, Dapo Thomas was one of the popular editors of Cobra, there was also Niyi Ogun. On one or two occasions, I was one of those Cobra dealt with in their report. Cobra was right wing and they were always interested in APS members. That was a phenomenon at Ife campus to the extent that there was and still there is the Association of Campus Journalists (ACJ). I think for some time, I was president of that association. Some of those who have become lawyers, who are doing well today, were campus journalists. So, journalism itself was an alternate students union, if I can put it that way, at the University of Ife. You had the students union, but you also had the campus press that was playing the oversight role, that was taking the authorities to task, that was raising questions, writing editorials that were probing. A lot of people would talk about Great Ife, talk about Aluta and so on, but I feel enough documentation or enough study has not been done on the phenomenon of journalism at Ife campus. Here is a university that doesn't have a Mass Communication faculty, that does not have any course in journalism, yet had a thriving press. So, when you look at the media in Nigeria today, you cannot dismiss the Ife factor. I can reel out the products of Ife campus journalism who came into the larger society and made their mark as journalists - very long list. I can talk about the likes of Wole Olaoye, Dapo Olorunyomi, Owei Lakemfa, Gbolahan Gbadamosi, Jika Ator, Kunle Ajibade, Femi Ojudu, Uzor Maxim Uzoatu, Edmond Enaibe, Dele Momodu, Seye Kehinde, Kehinde Bamigbetan and former editor in chief of the Punch, Bola Bolawole. And talking about Punch, one can mention the likes of Bolaji Adebiyi and Tunde Aremu. Outside Punch, I can mention Tony Iyare, Edetaen Ojo, Tive Denedo, myself and others.

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

Can you briefly take us through your career history?

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology. There were a number of options, but I just felt it was the media that could provide the kind of space that I needed. And it was not just because of the Ife activism alone, I also fell in love with the media while going round media houses, distributing press releases as NANS president. On one occasion I was at the Punch newspaper and that day, they were having their chapel election, Tunji Ladner (Jnr), Niran Malaolu, Mr Demola Osinubi, Uncle Eric Teniola were all there; so many of them. I really liked the atmosphere and it's like 'oh, I would like to work in this kind of place'; the likes of Nojeem Jimoh, Feyi Smith, Tokunbo Oloruntola, had all interviewed me as NANS president. Femi Falana (SAN) would also take me round media houses as NANS president so I liked the environment. Though, when I first graduated, I worked briefly at the law chambers of Aka-Bashorun as a solicitor's clerk, he was trying to get me to work in the textile industry. He felt since I had a degree in Psychology, I could work in their industrial relations department. But somehow, it didn't work out. Then, the Republic Newspapers was established and I went there and I was recruited. Before then, I had tried to join the National Concord, but I was not successful. So, the Republic was the beginning of my journalism and union career as a journalist. I was chapel chairman. And when as a result of union activities we went on strike over non-payment of salaries, I was sacked. For me not to sit at home idle, Ladi Lawal, who was chairman of Lagos council of NUJ encouraged me to join the secretariat and work as the organising secretary and editor of Lighthouse News, the then news organ of Lagos NUJ.

How well did that go?

That didn't last long. But then, at the Republic, we had some of the best hands in the industry and that newspaper would really have made it if the publisher had been a little patient. He came from the banking sector, he was expecting quick return. The Republic had good hands, Paxton Olu Idowu was our editor, and we had Kunle Oduduwa in the newsroom as news editor who came from Daily Times background and the like of Tokunbo Oloruntola as head of the newsroom. So, I was at the Lagos NUJ and after a short period of time, I really felt like moving back to mainstream journalism and fortunately, National Concord had a place for me. I joined National Concord as chief correspondent, working with the likes of Niyi Obaremi, Akin Ogunrinde, Kunmi Olayiwola, late Soni Ehi Asuelimen, Kola Ojelabi, Ayo Aluko-Olokun and many others including Goke Olayinka and Waheed Odusile. When I became the features editor, I worked with the likes of Tunde Akanni, Sam Nwanze, Jide Orintunsin and others. National Concord was a better environment compared to the Republic; well established, well funded, facilities were available to do your work - recording gadgets were available when you want to conduct interviews and we had an editor who was highly competent and very professional, Nsikak Essien. We had a robust political desk manned by the likes of Tunji Bello, Victor Ifijeh, Sam Omatseye and upcoming fantastic writers like Louis Odion. National Concord was another arena entirely and for me we really practiced good journalism. Concord had its own house style, for example, a paragraph then was not supposed to be more than 32 words. So, it was a training ground. But as you know, we ran into political storms when Chief MKO Abiola ran for the presidency and Concord was made to pay the price by the military junta. We were not rabidly in support of MKO and we were not running down the other political party. Concord was simply professional and it reflected in the fact that the daily newspaper was doing well. The weekend paper was something else, when it was edited by Mike Awoyinfa, selling over 500,000 copies per day. The Sunday Concord was also doing well coming from the tradition already established by the likes of Dele Giwa. For me, the attack on Concord and the forceful closure was one of the greatest setbacks to journalism in Nigeria, because Abiola really had the vision of a newspaper modelled after the best newspapers in the world and I believe Concord was on its way to being that. It rivalled well established newspapers of the time.

After Concord shutdown, what next?

I again moved in the direction of activism by going to Gani Fawehinmi Chambers to work on the stable of The Masses. Gani Fawehinmi had in 1994 formed the National Conscience Party in defiance of the ban on political parties by the military government for which he was jailed. The editor of the Masses was Richard Akinnola and I was the deputy editor. I worked in Gani's chambers for some time, and around the same time too, I was editing Democracy Echo, a journal of the Committee for the Defence of Human Rights (CDHR) of which I was a foundational member. Despite these, I still felt the need to go back to mainstream journalism because around the time, a group of journalists who came from the same tradition with me felt that we needed to be more involved in the NUJ as we were part of the New Trend Movement. We had been active in the campaign that made Ladi Lawal president of NUJ. Before Ladi Lawal, there was Sani Zoro in 1992 because the movement had been formed by that time. Before New Trend, there was another group by erstwhile campus journalists and activists called Progressive Journalists Association in the media, we used to meet at the secretariat of the Nigeria Labour Congress - Kayode Komolafe, Tunji Lawal, Owei Lakemfa were prominent in that. Towards the end of Ladi Lawal's tenure, some of them were suggesting that well, we see you as someone who could become the chairman of NUJ, but the Masses was not in mainstream journalism and I had to return to mainstream journalism and Vanguard was waiting to take me. So, I became assistant editor and member of the editorial board of the Vanguard Newspapers.

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

For me, one of the best contributions to journalism has been made by Uncle Sam, just by making the point that you don't have to breathe down the neck of editors and reporters before they can turn out good copies. And the editorial board I worked with one of the best under the chairmanship of late Alhaji Kola Animashaun. He also taught us the value of diversity.

Anytime they were having Islamic festival, Alhaji Animashaun, would ask me to write the editorial. When he first challenged me to do so and I asked him how I would go about the editorial, he said I should read more about Islam. So, anytime we had Islamic festivals, I would be the one to write the editorials. Then, during Christmas or Easter, either himself or another Moslem on the editorial board, Alhaji Femi Abbas, would write the editorial. That was the way we worked at Vanguard. It was from Vanguard in 1995, with the support of the management and staff, that I ran for the chairmanship of Lagos State NUJ, won and served from 1995 to 1999.

How did you meet your wife?

That was the National Concord factor. My wife's dad, late Chief Segun Ogunsanwo, was also in the media; he was a journalist and he worked on the sub-desk. He was chief sub-editor of National Concord. By the time I was joining Concord, he was on his way out to establish an advertising company - SAO Oguns. The children, including my wife and the brothers used to come to Concord to place adverts on his behalf. She was also trying to work on her admission and a friend in the features department was trying to help out. So, anytime she came around to drop advert, she would check the features department to see that my friend, who is an Ijesha brother. It was in that process I set my eyes on her. And there is an Italian saying that when you see a woman and you like her, and you want to fall in love with her, you will say you are struck by the thunderbolt. So, that was what happened and that's where the relationship started around 1992 or thereabout. But it was only in 1996 that it ended in marriage. That was how I met my wife Ogunsola (nee Ogunsanwo).

You must be involved in pranks as a youth.

Well, there is no way you won't be involved in one prank or the other. Okay I remember one time when I was in the primary school. I had a friend whose father was an herbalist or oracle diviner. His name is Dele - very funny character. One day, he told me that we should not go to school; that we should go and swim. There was a big stream called 'Omi Isun' in the town. That morning, I was supposed to go to school, I just gave an excuse to my dad and said I wasn't feeling fine. I stayed back. So, Dele, myself and a female classmate went to the stream while others were in school. We were enjoying the swimming, not knowing that an elderly man who was returning from the farm had seen us. He was shocked that two boys and a girl were swimming when they were supposed to be in the school. The first thing he did was to go grab our clothes and he cleverly hid them. He then made some noise to call attention to himself. We ran out of the stream. The instinct was to go for our clothes and run, but he laughed as he asked which clothes we were looking for. We were downcast! Then, he gave us our clothes, but said we should be marching ahead of him, which enabled the villagers to tongue-lash us. My Dad was shocked and flogged me. My teacher took his turn the following day at school to punish me.

In the secondary school, I had a friend who liked playing pranks, his name is Taye Akerele. We just thought of ways to embarrass our seniors, particularly those that we believe were wicked or not that exposed. I recall that we went to one of them and told him that a lady in our class had fallen in love with him, and that he should write to her. The senior had a very good handwriting; so, he wrote a fantastic love letter. Immediately he gave it to us, we ran to the stream to open the letter and we saw all those big expressions like 'you are the golden key to my brain' and so on. We didn't actually deliver the letter to the girl, but we gave him the impression that we had delivered it. However, the tradition then was that if you wrote somebody, the person would have to reply. But in this instance, there was no reply. The guy, perhaps, got worried that the lady might report him to the authorities; his major fear was for the letter not to fall into the hands of the teachers because it could earn him a dismissal. We started playing games. We told him the lady would be in class during prep and that he should come. He would come and ask where is the lady and we would say the lady had gone and all that. So, the guy suspected that something was wrong and said 'okay, return my letter.' We now went to my own senior that I was serving, a more humane person, and told him that we had been deceiving a senior. Then, he screamed that we have destroyed his friend. He was more shocked than annoyed and asked the offence he committed that made us to do what we did.

Ife prepared me for journalism, even though, I read Psychology -Lanre Arogundade

We played another one on another senior, a very reserved person. He was our next victim. We went to him and said a lady in our class had fallen in love with him and since Valentine was coming, he should buy some things. The man was shocked, but he bought the stuff and gave it to us. But this time, we delivered to the girl. And she was surprised. We told the girl you have to buy your own, to reciprocate. She bought it and of course, we had our own share of the largesse.

How do you unwind?

In terms of my hobbies, I like sports; I watch football and I go dancing. In those days I was fairly regular at Fela's shrine. When Lagbaja had Motherlan, because my wife likes Lagbaja, we were regulars at the Friday shows. Sometimes in the office when I want to unwind, I take to the floor and dance. I also unwind by watching movies; I watch all kind of things. People would say why, but for me, no knowledge is lost. We keep learning one thing or the other. In any case, life continues. So, I am not rigid. Yes, I have my traditional areas of interest like radical and socialist literatures, but I read other things, only that I have become a slow reader now. There was a time I would read up to six books in a year. But now, I struggle to finish two.

I also like reading biographies. I have enjoyed a number of biographies, that of Nelson Mandela, Bill Clinton and Oba Sikiru Adetona, the Awujale of Ijebuland. I listen to all kinds of music, Ashake or whatever. The lyrics may not make as much sense, but they keep you on your toes.

Sometimes I sit with friends, chat, and have some drinks. It keeps life going because whether you unwind or not, life itself keeps going. Nobody is going to have a second chance at life, just the fun you give yourself. And when possible, I hang around with people, relate and joke with them.

One of my major hobbies is reading about, studying and owing Aviation technologies. There was a time I could look into the sky, see a plane and correctly tell if it was a Boeing 737, 747, DC10 or the Airbus series. Ditto for planes on the tarmac.

Load-Date: April 17, 2023

Killing of Journalists Now Game [opinion]

Leadership (Abuja)

May 4, 2010 Tuesday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 571 words

Byline: Chika Otuchikere

Body

---

How callously bestial can a people suddenly become? One may be forced to ask. The point here is that, everybody must die because death, of course, is a necessary end which must come when it will but why must it be for reason of stopping a just cause or movement? Nigerians have more than enough sources through which death, the cold one, comes to dispatch then men into eternity prematurely.

Accidents take more than a fair share. If it is not in the air with virtually no escape route, it is at sea as our young men and women attempt to smuggle themselves out of the country. This has taken the form of a death-trap from which men only escape when they cease to breathe and float into foreign lands paved with gold and diamonds. The most rampant and prominent is death on our federal and state roads. Apart from the roads being directly and single-handedly responsible for deaths too numerous to count, they also provide a safe haven for robbers and other agents of death who carry out deadly acts.

Talking about robbers, they are fast taking the unenviable position of the most cruel agent death uses to send men to the beyond. What's with the recently popularized picture of robbers ordering innocent passengers to lie flat on the road for a huge truck to run them over, crushing them like some avian flu infected fowls penciled down to be wasted to avoid spread of the disease?

There are many other ways through which Nigerians lose their lives: starvation, minor and major illnesses without any funds to seek medical attention here or abroad and of course, unavailability of genuine medication. We won't forget the unenviable role of police stray bullets and extra judicial killings which is always brazenly denied.

Journalists are not exempt from falling victim of any of the above listed sources of death and many are not listed. What makes the journalist's case more pathetic is that his life is snuffed out simply to shut him up stop the just cause he is running. This, no other group of Nigerians experience.

It was during the military rule of General Ibrahim Babangida that the killing of journalists became a favoured option in settling arguments. Most who are today killing or ordering their deaths borrowed a leaf from the killers of Dele Giwa - a foremost journalist who was in novel style, dispatched to the land of the dead. Up till today, the killers have not been traced and so many became confident that using various methods to kill journalists but ensuring 'like the Dele Giwa case' that it was not traced to them was okay. Babangida was accused of the assassination since, according to the story, still fresh in so many people's minds, the bomb which shattered vital organs of the young journalist was wrapped in federal government envelope. Babangida was even sued for the heinous crime by the late fiery lawyer, Gani Fawehinmi but nothing came out of it.

Killing of Journalists Now Game [opinion]

However that incident signaled a new dawn for the Nigerian journalist. They became a major part of the world's endangered species with everybody mindlessly willing to kill them for every flimsy reason. Today, the society which the journalist is to by nature of his calling watch over, now turns round to frighten them out of the profession. There may never be an end to this madness as long as the killers continue to evade justice. One day the country would wake up to find that all the journalists have been terrified out of the profession, God forbid!

Load-Date: May 19, 2010

---

End of Document

Echoes of parcel bomb

The Sun (Nigeria)

February 16, 2013 Saturday

Copyright 2013 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate.info, an Albawaba.com company All Rights Reserved

Length: 530 words

Body

---

The nation was on edge recently following the discovery of a parcel bomb by the Nigeria Postal Service (NIPOST) in Abuja, reportedly addressed to the Minister of Finance, Dr Ngozi Okonjo-Iweala. The contents of the mail believed to be the handiwork of hired assassins, were two substances suspected to be Improvised Explosive Devices(IEDs)which had since been detonated by the anti- bomb squad of the Nigeria Police.

IEDs, it needs to be stated, are essentially home-made bombs, simple to make, easily hidden but very destructive. Had the parcel bomb reached its target, it certainly would have opened a whole new front in terrorism in which key public officials would be prime targets. Although the interception of the suspicious mail saved the nation what would have been a monumental tragedy reminiscent of the assassination of frontline journalist ,Mr Dele Giwa, via a parcel bomb in 1986,it should serve as a rude awakening that the idea of parcel bomb is not over yet, and could indeed, be a new strategy by terrorist groups to silence prominent government officials.

It is instructive that the Finance Minister could just be one out of many other targets on the radar of some terrorists. But they should not be deterred. Rather, they should remain focused and resolute in their assignments. However, the development calls for more diligence on the part of security agencies, and specifically, authorities of (NIPOST) and other companies involved in parcel delivery. As a matter of fact, they should always insist on knowing the contents of every parcel. Because of the apprehension created by insecurity in the land, disclosure and description of what a sender is sending to the receiver must be confirmed by the postal or courier services before they are dispatched.

We commend the efforts of NIPOST in nipping the vicious plan in the bud, as well as the swift response of the personnel from the Explosive ordnance Department, a unit of the anti-bomb squad of the Nigeria Police Force. Again, considering the general security situation across the country, there is need for all agencies handling mails/parcels to be eternally vigilant. Contrary to the statement by the Post-Master General of the Federation,

Echoes of parcel bomb

Ibrahim Mori Baba, on the incident, both sane and insane persons can be used as "agents of death" by the masterminds of such criminal plot.

The case of late Dele Giwa remains a sad reference point of such disguise of the evil intentions of the sponsors. Government should step up its efforts against all manner of terrorist groups that have emerged across the country in recent times. A situation where public officials are afraid of their lives in the performance of their duties makes public service quite unattractive. It ought not to be so.

Public office is a service to the fatherland and those who have offered themselves to serve should not be stampeded out unceremoniously. We urge security agencies to investigate the possible source of the suspicious parcel. But beyond that, the incident+ is a sad reminder that terrorists may be one step ahead, and this is the time for the security agencies to re-strategize on a new offensive against terrorism in the country.

Load-Date: February 16, 2013

---

End of Document

Another Roots for IBB

This Day (Lagos)

October 30, 2010 Saturday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 564 words

Byline: Ndubuisi Ugah

Body

---

Secretary of Awori Youth Vanguard of Nigeria, Dr. Yinka Badmus, has said it is unfair to continue to blame former military president, Gen. Ibrahim Babangida, for the woes besetting the nation.

He said after 17 years since he left office with six successive heads of government, such attribution of Nigeria's problems to the presidential aspirant is unrealistic as it is deceptive.

Badmus, who listed what he referred to as the familiar template of Babangida's political 'sins' by his detractors to include the annulment of June 12 election, the murder of Dele Giwa and the $12.4 billion Gulf War windfall, averred that there is more of politics to the accusations than substance.

His defence of Babangida, which also reflected the former leader's positions on the accusations was contained in a statement issued in Lagos.

On June 12, he said: "At the appropriate time, Nigerians will not only know but would be shocked to discover those who pressurised IBB to annul the election, freest and fairest ever, including the man who said Abiola was not the messiah. Thus we must all reason to appreciate the issue in its true elements vis-à-vis our judgements. Moreover, his interest in democracy and the election can never be in doubt otherwise he could have aborted the election via ABN's injunction but he overruled it.

He has since been remorseful and accepted responsibility as a leader for all that was June 12. Yet we must remind ourselves that those who are claiming to be democrats today were the same people who quickly accepted interim government in place of the new expedited election proposed by IBB then".

Badmus added that the Okigbo panel was set up to examine the restructuring of the CBN not only under Babangida's era but also other governments like that of Shonekan and Abacha, a point, he said, is often conveniently omitted, saying the report never indicted IBB but said some of the projects for which money was spent on were not priority projects.

He noted: "But when we look back today those projects remain the nation's monuments in infrastructure, industrial and socio-economic development of the nation. We have to compare the revenues under IBB with those we have had from 1999 till date and see the level of developments across board and we can then appreciate the fact that IBB deserves some respectable credit and indeed deserving of his quest to rebuild and improve significantly on our national agenda and overall development as a reformer. Yes, IBB's critics should relate his tenure to the squandering of 20 billion dollars excess crude funds in 4 months and depletion of external reserves to 33 billion now in just some months to properly situate his legacy."

Another Roots for IBB

The statement similarly regretted the fate of Dele Giwa, whom Badmus regarded as a great journalist but said the recurring attachment of his death to Babangida in spite of court's avowal to the contrary is a calculated attempt to smear his image and reputation. He said that about 8 other journalists who lost their lives in similar circumstances in this democratic dispensation are also deserving of attention.

"Such deliberate insistence on falsehood and campaign of calumny against IBB by the so-called "democrats" and tenants of democracy and the plan to stop IBB at all cost only point to his popularity. IBB's fate should be allowed to be decided by the people as it obtains in a democracy", he stated.

Load-Date: November 2, 2010

---

End of Document

The conscience of a nation

The Nation (Nigeria)

July 10, 2019 Wednesday

Copyright 2019 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1705 words

Body

---

The cell-phone beeped frantically. With the caller ID withheld, it was easy to surmise that it was either a foreign call or someone preferring anonymity. Pressing the receive button, my hunch was dead right. The baritone voice was unmistakable: it was the literary lion himself roaring from his den on the other side of the Atlantic.

'Hey Louis, what's the trouble at home this time?' he teased in his accustomed patriarchal flourish.

'Good day, Prof,' I responded and, excited that my repeated dials had finally paid off, quickly switched to the sarcastic mode Kongi had set. 'It's Maradona again o. Of all the idle pensioners left in Nigeria, the NLNG people just declared that he's the only one fit to give keynote address at the next Prize ceremony.'

Indeed, heavy dust had been raised earlier on this day in September 2007 following the unveiling of General Ibrahim Babangida as the lead speaker at the exclusive shindig, to which the who's who in Nigeria's literary community get invited annually.

As editor of Sunday Sun then with a robust literary section, this writer was urgently seeking Professor Wole Soyinka's comment, to set the agenda ahead of the presentation ceremony scheduled for the following weekend.

Without mincing words, Kongi released the expected bombshell: 'Abominable!!'

His logic was simple: having been linked to the unnatural deaths of a few literary celebrities as military dictator and having presided over an order that flagrantly stifled free speech, it was simply unacceptable that the microphone be yielded to the former military dictator at a ceremony intended to celebrate the spoken or written word.

To him, that amounted to dancing on the graves of the likes of poet Mamman Vatsa (a military general summarily executed over the alleged 1985 military coup despite passionate pleas from the nation's leading writers including Soyinka) and Dele Giwa (celebrated journalist dispatched by a letter bomb on October 19, 1986).

With such thunderous denunciation by Kongi, yours sincerely was left salivating with some malicious pleasure at a steaming exclusive and did not think twice before making it a front-page story with the headline, 'NLNG Award: Soyinka moves against IBB.'

Predictably, Soyinka's eruption instantly triggered a concatenation of lightning and thunder across the land. Literary icons like Professors Niyi Osundare and Okey Ndibe added to IBB's misery with their barbs. There were a few dissenters, however. At the end, the 2007 edition of the Literature Prize organized by the Nigerian Liquified Natural

The conscience of a nation

Gas was completely overshadowed by the debate on the propriety or otherwise of inviting a military dictator to a literary feast.

Fleeting as it may seem, the foregoing anecdote nonetheless speaks to one fact: another confirmation of Professor Akinwande Oluwole Soyinka as the conscience of a nation blighted by vanity and amnesia, with a deep moral voice whose resonance not only sends fear into the hearts of men of power but also inspires generations of men and women to stand up and be counted for good.

By and large, what truly makes Soyinka great is not so much for the monumentality of a talent that spews pithy poetry, gripping prose and transcendental drama. His greatness lies more in the courage and character he brings to bear in creativity.

At an age when no territory seems restricted any more, when many yesterday's heroes and heroines have been exposed to be counterfeits, when more and more of the surviving statesmen would rather trade away their honour for temporary gains, Kongi remains an exemplar, distinguished from the multitude by his trademark hoary mane accentuated by an equally immaculate goatee.

My early contact with him was through the channel of the written word. Beginning from secondary school, to the polytechnic and later the university, I read tons and tons of Soyinka's works to find my own feet as a writer. As many students will attest, Soyinka's poems were a source of dread and torture.

But the Kongi I would later encounter as journalist was a pleasant man. Despite his world celebrity status, his humility is very numbing and, as the good teacher, he never allows any opportunity to mentor the younger ones pass.

As one of the pioneers of THISDAY back page back in mid-90s, this writer was introduced to him by a professional 'egbon' (senior), Dr. Yemi Ogunbiyi, during a flight to Abuja from Lagos.

'Oh, your face is already familiar,' he said, offering me a handshake. 'You're one of those I read on THISDAY back page.'

Coming from the owner of the word himself, the Nobel laureate, a famous name I grew up worshipping, I felt completely flattered that my own little juvenile jottings made some sense to Soyinka. I took his contact and tried to stay in touch. Thus began a relationship that grew from acquaintanceship to discipleship. He has a natural affinity, instinctive solidarity with anyone in the writing fraternity.

I have seen him deploy his awesome clout to extract better deals for fellow writers. While delivering a keynote address at the inaugural edition of the NLNG Prize for Literature many years ago, Soyinka had tactfully bad-mouthed the organizers for being too 'stingy' by the amount set aside as the Prize money in view of the 'fortune you daily amass from the soil of Niger Delta.'

In clear breach of protocol, he thereafter unilaterally declared that in the exercise of his 'natural powers' as the 'defender of writers' the amount was upped from 10,000 to 30,000 US Dollars. The Kongi's coup elicited a standing ovation from the galaxy of writers gathered in the expansive hall that night. The rapturous applause continued when his speech ended. Reading the mood in the audience correctly, NLNG's MD had little or no choice than announce the approval of Soyinka's proposal.

To the younger ones like yours sincerely, Soyinka's father-figure stature naturally makes him a guardian. But despite the wide age difference, Kongi also relates to you as a friend with incredible sense of humour. During one of his frequent visits to Nigeria, he gladly consented to an interview request I made. The only problem was time, because he had several speaking engagements already lined up.

Finally, he decided to squeeze out time in-between a lecture at the National Arts Theatre, Lagos.

The conscience of a nation

On the D-Day, we were already more than thirty minutes into the session when I suddenly noticed that the tape-recorder was stuck. My heart skipped with embarrassment. I quickly demobilized the gadget and played back. Lo, not a single word was recorded!

'Haba! Louis, shame on you. You mean a journalist of your standing still carries around a counterfeit recorder,' he teased, without the slightest sign of irritation that his precious time had been wasted on account of an avoidable mechanical malfunction. Graciously, he accepted we begin afresh.

His fiery pen and caustic tongue notwithstanding, Kongi remains tender at heart; one who may disagree with you in principle, but never holds back in the fellowship of humanity or be detained by bitterness over the past. Only that could possibly explain the complicated relationship he has had over the years with his kinsman, ex-President Olusegun Obasanjo.

Feisty OBJ had decided to veer from the political turf as sitting president in 2005 to engage Soyinka in an epistolary joust. In a statement he personally signed, he took a swipe at Kongi for criticizing his policies.

But discerning observers who read the open letter could not but raise their hands in panic immediately, fearful of the approaching literary wrath on the proverbial errant native doctor who carries his ritual offering past a mosque.

While it was easily conceded that OBJ was cantankerous by nature, many had expected that his fabled native intelligence would have served him well by dissuading him from venturing into a square rope against Kongi in a literary duel.

Their worst fears were soon proved right. Soyinka's response was an atomic bomb. By the time the smoke cleared, OBJ's presidential garment was torn beyond recognition. For once, the Ota chicken farmer became tongue-tied. Months later, the animus that open 'roforofo' (dirty fight) had generated would not prevent Kongi from showing up at the funeral of OBJ's spouse, Stella, who died suddenly following complications arising from a medical procedure in Spain.

When OBJ finally met with Kongi face to face on the aisle outside the funeral parlour, the story is told of how the president exploded in a playful rage, 'Wole, iwo! (Wole, You!)', raising an arm in mock threat. Defiant Kongi fired back, 'Segun, Ori e!', thumping his own head in a supreme Yoruba gesture of contempt.

Obviously more embarrassed than amused by such show of audacity, the band of guards around the President cleverly looked away.

Again, when Chief Emeka Ojukwu qualified the victory he achieved in the sham elections arranged by the Abacha junta to select delegates for the 1994 Constitutional Conference as conferring on him a mandate 'superior to June 12', vintage Soyinka gave expression to popular thinking in the country then by simply dismissing the ex-Biafran secessionist as 'an expired warlord'.

That critical riposte would not prevent Kongi from attending Ojukwu's burial in 2012 to pay last respect to a personal friend.

Same generosity of spirit is very much in evidence in his warm relationship today with General Yakubu Gowon. At the presentation of a memoir by Oba Eradiuawa of Benin in 2014, Soyinka continually poked good-natured jokes at Gowon while giving a keynote address, to the admiration of the audience. It was hard to believe that it was same Gowon who had clamped him into the gulag during the Nigerian civil war. In fact, his 20-month solitary confinement birthed the book, 'The Man Died'.

When it was his turn to speak, the former head of state threw the crowd into a fresh bout of laughter by cautioning Kongi to watch his tongue: 'You should remember that it was because of the same sharp tongue of yours that I sent you to prison in the 60s.'

Being the first black man to win the Nobel Prize in Literature, Soyinka's life surely sends an enduring message: the infinite possibilities of the black race and the value in character. Here is wishing him happy 85th birthday.

Load-Date: July 11, 2019

---

End of Document

Six Things June 12 Taught Me

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

June 16, 2019 Sunday

Copyright 2019 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1917 words

Byline: Simon Kolawole Simon -

Body

---

Where were you on June 12, 1993? I was in Ilorin, Kwara state, enjoying the weekend with my cousins. I could not vote because I registered in Lagos. If I had voted, I would have thumb-printed the space for the Social Democratic Party (SDP) whose presidential flag bearer was Chief MKO Abiola. I had been rooting for Alhaji Bashir Tofa, the candidate of the National Republican Convention (NRC). But after watching the televised presidential debate and having an argument debate with my dear friend, Mallam Lanre Issa-Onilu (now APC national publicity secretary), I was finally persuaded to vote for Abiola, although I eventually disenfranchised myself.

I learnt a dozen lessons from the June 12 debacle. First, northerners were unfairly vilified in the political crisis that engulfed the nation after the annulment. The narrative was that they did not want Abiola to become president. There was a conspiracy theory that the north wanted to hold on to power by all means. However, the election results did not support this claim. Abiola won nine out of the 16 states in the north while Tofa won only seven. The romantic part of the story was that Abiola defeated Tofa in his home state, Kano, and even in his ward. I do not want to believe it was the Yoruba or southerners in the north that did the magic. That would be a disingenuous claim.

To be sure, I accepted the conspiracy theory then. The north, I mean the "core north", had so dominated the political landscape that resentment had built up considerably in the south against the "northern oligarchy". So it was easy to read the annulment as a northern agenda. If you ask my opinion today, I would say there was no conspiracy. I would say the military guys just did not want to let go of power. That is the benefit of hindsight. After all, the previously cancelled primaries had three northerners in the lead: Gen. Shehu Musa Yar'Adua having pocketed the SDP ticket and Alhaji Umaru Shinkafi and Mallam Adamu Ciroma about to face a run-off for the NRC ticket.

The second lesson is that Igbo and Yoruba are not irreconcilable political enemies. Historically, the two dominant southern ethnic groups had appeared to be political rivals fiercely at war with each other — always going in opposite directions in the struggle for supremacy in the Nigerian power game. However, despite the SDP fielding a Muslim-Muslim ticket that held virtually no attraction to the Igbo, they still voted massively for Abiola, a Yoruba.

Six Things June 12 Taught Me

There were four Igbo states then. Although Tofa won in Enugu, Imo and Abia and Abiola won only in Anambra, the total scores provided better evidence: 790,371 to Tofa, 739,748 to Abiola. A mere difference of 50,623 votes!

I believe Yoruba still owe Ndigbo one. You would appreciate these figures better if you realised that there was an Igbo on the NRC ticket: Dr Sylvester Ugoh was Tofa's running mate. Abiola getting 48 percent in the south-east was definitely not an ordinary gesture. Dim Chukwuemeka Ojukwu had angrily left SDP for NRC after the Muslim-Muslim ticket was announced, arguing that SDP had marginalised the Igbo — even though Abiola was always going to pick a northerner as his vice-presidential candidate. Informed that Abiola would appoint an Igbo as secretary to the government of the federation (SGF), Ojukwu famously quipped: "That's a glorified tea boy!"

The third lesson is that the Nigerian political class can be petty. NRC behaved badly after losing the election. Rather than join forces with the SDP to defend our democracy and confront the military which was the mortal enemy, it became a matter of "if I don't have it, then nobody else should". NRC backed out of the fight very easily. To make matters worse, SDP members who had been unhappy that Abiola got the party's presidential ticket in the first place were very eager to negotiate away the mandate. SDP leaders were soon engaged in meetings with the military to set up an interim government to "save Nigeria from the precipice". You won the election, guys!

The fourth lesson is that anyone can become a symbol of resistance no matter their past. Abiola was an establishment person, one who wined and dined with the powers that be, starting with the military government of Gen Murtala Muhammed in 1975. He was a known friend of Gen Ibrahim Babangida. If anyone was expected to accept the annulment of June 12 quietly, enter his car and go back to his house, it was Abiola. I am sure Babangida and his team were dumbfounded that Abiola led the rebellion against what was supposed to be a routine cancellation of elections. I honestly did not expect the resistance from Abiola, much less that he would go to his grave fighting.

What this seems to tell me about Nigeria is that the much-expected turnaround may come from unexpected quarters. I am not saying I saw any vision, but the usual suspects may not lead the ethical and political revolution that will unleash the potential of this country. Nigeria is too blessed to be crawling on its chest. How can we have all these resources — human and material — and be stuck in the cesspool of poverty, disease, unemployment and corruption? But the change leader may turn out to be the least expected person, one whom we despise or treat with suspicion. Abiola was an unlikely symbol of resistance. He did not look the part but he played the part.

The fifth lesson is that Nigerians have short memory. Many of those parading themselves today as heroes of democracy were actually in bed with the miscreants who annulled June 12. They fought vigorously to make sure the annulment was not reversed. They said and did despicable things for political gain and filthy lucre. But nobody remembers again. They now grandstand and lecture us on democracy and the resistance to military rule. If you want to have a list of these villains-turned-heroes, please get a copy of Olusegun Adeniyi's "The Last 100 Days of Abacha". You will marvel at the conduct of the sycophants who have become latter-day saints of the democratic order.

Finally, this may be minor but it is not irrelevant: I also learnt that presidential debate is a good thing. Actually, if Babangida had not annulled the presidential election, he would have bowed out a hero after a lot of missteps in his eight years as president of Nigeria. He had tried to create a new political order after performing many experiments, including banning and unbanning "old breed" politicians and creating, controversially, two parties based on competing ideologies and manifestoes. Watching the two presidential candidates debate was something completely new to me as a Nigerian and it really helped me weigh my options before making up my mind.

Unfortunately, debates have become a joke in Nigeria. Rather than make progress and build on what we experienced in 1993, we have gone terribly backwards on many counts. Studies have shown that if you want to win the presidential election in Nigeria, you must not participate in TV debate. Okay, that is a joke, but all the presidents we have produced since 1999 never participated in debates. In 1999, Chief Olusegun Obasanjo stood Chief Olu Falae up at the Hilton Hotel in Abuja on the night of the debate. Eventually, Falae had to do it alone. I remember him saying "I don't find it funny debating with myself" — or something like that — when the programme started.

Six Things June 12 Taught Me

In 2003, Obasanjo was absent again, even though Gen Muhammadu Buhari and Prof Pat Utomi were waiting for him. In 2007, Alhaji Umaru Musa Yar'Adua did not feature. No reasons were given, although we knew Yar'Adua to be articulate and capable of taking on his rivals. He did not prove it. In 2011, President Goodluck Jonathan avoided the company of Buhari, Mallam Nuhu Ribadu and Mallam Ibrahim Shekarau, and chose to debate with himself. In 2015, he spoiled for a debate with Buhari, but Buhari's handlers advised him to keep clear. This year again, Buhari avoided debating Alhaji Atiku Abubakar. Debate dodgers always win presidential polls in Nigeria.

We need a culture of debate. I would be the first to say that to debate is one thing and to govern is another, but I would add that avoiding debates does not guarantee good governance either. I won't even say debates determine the outcome of elections. I think most people's minds are made up irrespective of the pedigrees and eloquence of the presidential candidates, but my point is: what do we stand to lose if we hear them debate their ideas and policies in a room? It is a feature of democratic culture we need to imbibe. It certainly swung me in Abiola's direction in 1993. Overall, I have some good memories from the June 12 debacle, although the pains were devastating.

====

AND FOUR OTHER THINGS

HONORING MKO

I'm quite happy that President Buhari has followed through on his national recognition of Chief MKO Abiola, winner of the June 12, 1993 presidential election, by making June 12 our Democracy Day and naming the national stadium in Abuja after him. Former President Obasanjo must be livid. For eight years, we begged him to celebrate Abiola but he refused. Yet if Abiola had accepted the annulment of June 12, there would never have been an Obasanjo presidency. He died and Obasanjo became the chief beneficiary. And here is Buhari naming a stadium built by Obasanjo after Abiola! At least, nobody can say Buhari is looking for south-west votes again. Lovely.

CORRUPTION AND POVERTY

One interesting debate we have been having in Nigeria since 2015 is: is our problem corruption or the economy? Many think President Buhari has prioritised fighting corruption above the economy; Mr. Peter Obi, PDP vice-presidential candidate, even said anti-corruption is not an economic policy. Others have argued that without fighting corruption, the economy cannot grow and poverty will worsen. President Paul Kagame of Rwanda has weighed in, pointing out to African leaders that it is not enough to fight corruption – they have to create wealth to fight poverty. Let's hope President Buhari got the memo. Shared economic prosperity can actually help the anti-corruption war. Deep.

CLEAN SWEEP

Now that the leadership of the All Progressives Congress (APC) has succeeded in installing its preferred candidates as leaders of the national assembly, Nigerians have a right to expect a smoother working relationship between the legislature and the executive — especially for the quick passage of budget. However, a part of me does not believe this is our problem. PDP installed most of its preferred candidates for the 16 years it was in power but that did not make much difference. In fact, the PDP became an opposition to itself. We can only hope that something will change this time around and that Nigerians will indeed see the benefits in form of good governance. Waiting...

MYTH BUSTER

I recently got a WhatsApp broadcast that tried to recreate the murder of foremost journalist, Mr Dele Giwa, via a parcel bomb in 1986. It said the bomb was delivered to Giwa's son, Billy, by Major Buba Marwa, accompanied by Major Tunde Ogbeha. It said they came in a Peugeot car which they burnt thereafter, and Gen Babangida made Marwa governor of Lagos and "pumped" money into the state. All credible accounts said the bomb carrier used a motorcycle. And why has Billy Giwa not identified Marwa as the courier in 33 years? Meanwhile, Babangida left power in 1993 and Marwa became military administrator in 1996. How did Babangida pump money into Lagos? Phoney.

Six Things June 12 Taught Me

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/632/1802/78/156067583018.jpeg>

Simon Kolawole

Load-Date: June 16, 2019

---

End of Document

THE UNFORGETTABLE MEE 20 YEARS GONE

The Sun (Nigeria)

April 1, 2016 Friday

Copyright 2016 The Sun Publishing Limited Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1387 words

Byline: Uche Atuma

Body

---

IN memory of my friend, the celebrated journalist MEE Mofe-Damijo who died 20 years ago in March 1996, I bring you my 'Press Clips' tribute to her published on Saturday, March 30, of the Weekend Concord. I also bring you a front page story I did sequel to her death. It's all like yesterday. How time flies! MEE was such a sweet unforgettable friend who was as close to me as the late Dimgba Igwe. We all grew professionally under the editorship of the late Dele Giwa, at the Sunday Concord. Here is my tribute:

***

BLACK is the colour of MEE's car, the black-ness of sadness, the blackness of darkness, an opaque black without sun or moon. The blackness of her first Volkswagen Beetle car which she gave me while going to the U.S. to read for her first degree in journalism. The blackness of her Santana which she sold to buy her latest, a black Honda Civic she drove until her death.

How do you start writing the elegy of a beloved sister of the pen? How do you find the strength and the courage to string the words of sorrow together? How do you write about someone who writes the way you write, someone who writes with the heart of a poet? Someone who, like you, was born in Ghana and groomed professionally by the great Dele Giwa. Someone who is the chief priestess of the Dele Giwa cult and who died at the very age Dele Giwa died: 39!

May Ellen may not have died of a letter bomb like her master, but her death has exploded in our hearts, shattering us all into smithereens. Why must a woman work so hard to reach the top, to define her-self into our national consciousness, only to fade out in sunshine, in the afternoon of her life? An owl has hooted from the edge of a dark song. The winds of death again have blown, blowing away the girl with the "windsong." Things have suddenly fallen apart, and the dreamer can no longer dream, even though her eyes are closed in death's dreamland.

THE UNFORGETTABLE MEE 20 YEARS GONE

Her life had been a life of many goodbyes, but ironically she never had the chance to say the last goodbye. I remember when she first said goodbye to Ghana, the land of her birth. I remember how she used to lament the goodbye of her first marriage that didn't last. The coming to Sunday Concord. Saying goodbye to Sunday Concord and leaving for America to bag a degree in journalism. The joining of Newswatch. The goodbye to Newswatch and Quality magazine which she stamped her personality on. The coming on board to Weekend Concord to write the "MEE ON SATURDAY" column. The goodbye from Weekend Concord with a farewell column titled: "Never Can Say Goodbye." Classique magazine and the fairy tale marriage to Richard Mofe-Damijo. Now, it's goodbye to everything and everybody.

The last time I saw her, she was at the backseat of her Honda Civic. I overtook her, horned to greet her and she waved frantically.

"Mike, how now? Long time no see," she said.

Prophetic! We would not see for a very long time. We wouldn't even see again.

She stormed the Sunday Concord in 1982 as the party girl, the girl who would be reporting titbits about people in the limelight. From her accent and the tribal mark, I knew she must have been in Ghana. We struck an instant rapport, assisting her to graduate from a writer of titbits to the more challenging assignments of writing for the Sunday Concord magazine page which was the ultimate test then. MEE was ever ready to learn. She had the gift of a naturally talented writer and she never stopped reading fat novels. Robert Ludlum and all that stuff.

Her dream was to be a great journalist, a great novelist, and a great woman. To some extent, she attained some of the greatness. She carved her own niche. She created her own world and her own people. The "MEE People." She brought the "MEE People" to Weekend Concord. She was part of the success story of Weekend Concord. Part of the family. She walked on the bridge of Weekend Concord on her journey to give birth to her baby, Classique. We put her on the cover of Weekend Concord and prophesied that the millions would roll in for her. And the millions rolled. But Classique died, dying with the mother.

It is a big tragedy she has to be on our cover again today. Black is the colour of MEE. Black is the colour of death.

She died vomiting blood –How I reported MEE's death

ONE of the doctors who operated the late journalists, Mrs. MEE Mofe-Damijo, has spoken about how she died "vomiting blood from her intestines."

According to the doctor, it was a strange and "un-usual" occurrence that baffled the six doctors who thought they were handling a routine surgery to remove the fibroid from her.

"That episode was unusual for that type of surgery. Somebody you operated in the pelvis now passing blood from the mouth," the doctor said. He continued: "Why should blood come from the stomach when we did not operate the stomach? The site of the operation healed very well. Remember we did not operate the intestines. The fibroid is not in the intestine."

Since the death of Mrs. Mofe-Damijo, newsmen have been storming the hitherto obscure Providence Hospital in Surulere in search of clues to her shocking death. The chief medical officer, Dr. John Esangbe-do, said he was busy, but directed me to the hospital's Director of Clinical Services who agreed to be interviewed on condition of anonymity.

Asked if the "unusual" vomiting of blood has a spiritual or supernatural implication, the doctor said: "I am not talking of spiritual explanation. This is certainly unexpected. Bleeding from the stomach is unexpected."

On what was done to staunch the vomiting of blood, the doctor said: "we passed something to drain what was collected there (in the stomach). What was coming out was bloody. We were shocked. We wondered: Why is this woman doing like this? But we were giving her adequate blood transfusion that was well-screened. There was no blood transfusion reaction. It is not everybody who has blood transfusion that can be saved."

THE UNFORGETTABLE MEE 20 YEARS GONE

The doctor said another strange occurrence was that when MEE's stomach was touched, "it was soft instead of being hard." According to the doctor, the blood vomiting precipitated a second surgery. Said he: "The first surgery had been done and everything was fine. She was even reading novels, joking, playing with us. Then we noticed things changed gradually. We felt we had to scan her. We invited some doctors. When things are getting to this stage, we need to re-explore. It is not because of poor technique. Anything can happen that can make you go back to the theatre. Not because of poor technique or poor facility. We brought experts from other hospitals. What happened was unusual. It is not pertinent with the surgery we did. Let us not discuss the unusual."

The doctor said prior to coming for operation, MEE "had had two previous surgeries outside this country. What we did was a repeat of the same fibroid. Let us just take it that we did our best. Providence is one of the best hospitals in Lagos. We parade a lot of equipment, highly skilled medical facilities. If this procedure was carried out in Britain, the same thing would have happened. It was not due to negligence nor poor monitoring. Can you imagine what we went through?"

In the middle of the interview, an old female doctor who was part of the team of surgeons that battled to save MEE's life was questioned but she declined to answer. She would not even give her name. "I don't know my name," she said. "For 27 years I have been practising, nobody came to ask my name. The day that everything goes well, nobody talks. Doctors are not gods. Please, stop harassing us!"

With that she bolted the door and left angrily, muttering.

Back to the first doctor, she said MEE being a public figure, all precautions were taken, to ensure nothing went wrong. "We gave her the best ward, the one very next to the nursing section such that they were all at her beck and call. She was properly monitored."

On whether MEE died on account of bad luck, the doctor replied: "I don't believe in luck. It is an occultic language. Anybody who does surgery has some risk, which is why we make people sign consent form, so that when anything happens, you can't hold the doctor. It is that little risk that makes us ask you to sign a consent form. We never expected death. Death is a callous entity."

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/364/1228/4/145955906341.jpg>

Load-Date: April 2, 2016

---

End of Document

Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape And Murder So Gruesome!

News Chronicle (Nigeria)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 The News Chronicle. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1825 words

Byline: Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye -

Body

---

"One life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as millions lost in a pogrom."—Dele Giwa (Nigerian Journalist assassinated in 1986)

After five whole years of seeking admission into the institution of higher learning, Miss Vera Uwaila Omozuwa was eventually admitted to read Microbiology at the University of Benin.

Obviously a very serious student, she was in no mood to joke with her studies, probably, after considering how long it took her to secure the admission. So, she would always go to the serene environment of her Church when worshippers were not around to read her books. The Church environment should be both safe and devoid of distractions.

But on this particular day, May 27, 2020, some wicked, callous and barbarous assailants gained access to the Church auditorium where she was immersed in her books, brutally raped her and ended her life by hitting her on the head with a fire extinguisher which gave her a very deep cut. They then fled leaving her in the pool of her own blood. She was only 22 and in her first year at the university.

No one knew how long she lay there bleeding until the security man arrived and saw her. She was already unconscious, probably due to the effect of the brutal violation she had experienced, the cruel blow she had received, and the amount of blood she had lost. At the hospital where she was rushed to, the doctors tried their best but were unable to revive her. She eventually died without being able to utter a single word to anyone about what had happened to her or whether she was able to recognize her savage rapists and murderers.

The gory picture of her body is the most horrible image I have tried to look at in recent times. I had to remove my eyes immediately! A once beautiful girl had suddenly been turned into a horrific and scary image because of the primaevial exploits of some brutish creatures.

Now, what exactly could so badly provoke human beings to descend so low to the level of wild beasts to give free rein to their basest instincts to unleash such a barbaric violence on another human being?

Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape And Murder So Gruesome!

Lust, anger, hatred, envy, sadism, desire to conquer and dominate, revenge, or what? Are more and more people losing their humanity? Has the world gone irrecoverably berserk?

Daily, dizzying reports of grown men raping grandmothers, mothers, single women and even underage girls are roughly slapped on our faces. I have even read bloodcurdling accounts of ten or even eight-month-old babies raped, not by confirmed mentally challenged people, but by otherwise sane human beings! What exactly is happening? I think this should be a very rich research subject for our scholars in the fields of psychology and behavioural studies. We need to urgently understand what has gone wrong with our world.

The parents of Uwaila are badly heartbroken as outrage engulfs the country over their daughter's barbaric murder. In a video that surfaced on twitter early this week, Uwaila's father lamented:

"It was not a mistake; it was not a fault; it was not stubbornness for her to go to the church to study. She had been going there for several years. She struggled for five years before she gained admission into UNIBEN. I was waiting to celebrate her admission before she died."

When has it become an offence for a serious and focused student to find a conducive place to read, more so, a worship centre which should be considered sacred and inviolable? Who could be so godless, wanton and profane as to trail a girl to a church building to unleash this kind of cruel and deadly violence on her? Such a person or persons should have no place within the bounds of civilized society.

Narrating the horrific incident, Uwaila's mother mournfully recounted:

"I saw a friend, who came to visit me, off and before I came back, someone had called my telephone thrice. When I got back, my children told me that a church member, Mummy Osunla, had called me and when I called her back, she asked where I was and told me that I should come and that she did not know what had happened to my daughter.

"I ran to the place but before I got there, they [had] already [taken] her to a private hospital and when I saw my daughter, I cried. They raped her; the dress she was wearing that morning was white, but it had turned to red; all her body was full of blood. Her mouth and eyes were tied; the hoodlums used a fire extinguisher to hit her head, which left a deep cut.

"We were asked to take her for an X-ray on her head; I did not have money but my church members tried and money was raised and we bought all the drugs that we were asked to buy, but Uwa could not make it. She was unable to say anything till she died; it was just tears that were coming out from her eyes."

The national outrage this grisly incident has provoked is quite reassuring, but the security agencies need to be more creative and proactive about how to ensure that people that commit these hideous crimes are apprehended and punished. It should now be made compulsory that CCTVs must be installed in all public buildings including worship centres. This will go a long way to deter potential rapists and other criminals who will be tormented by the awareness that their criminal activities are being observed and recorded by some sharp, hidden eyes.

The installation of these cameras should equally be extended to the streets and even highways. No amount of money spent to enhance the security of lives and property should be considered too much. The police must equally be empowered to acquire more, modern crime-unravelling equipment, to be able to track criminals no matter how they try to evade justice

It is however encouraging that the Edo State Police Command has announced the arrest of one of the suspected killers of Uwaila. Its spokesperson, Chidi Nwabuzor, said that fingerprints on the fire extinguisher used in killing the hapless girl has led to the arrest of the suspect. We can only hope that the fingerprints reading is accurate and that this first arrest will lead to the arrest of the remaining criminals who are now on the run. We don't want to hear tomorrow that the suspect was wrongly arrested due to a malfunctioning machine. When perpetrators of crimes are punished, prospective criminals are dissuaded and society is made safer for everyone.

Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape And Murder So Gruesome!

When the news of Uwaila's murder broke, Edo State Governor, Mr. Godwin Obaseki tweeted: "I have ordered the Nigeria Police Force (@PoliceNG) to thoroughly investigate the circumstances that led to the death of Miss Vera Uwaila Omozuwa, a 100-level student of the University of Benin (UNIBEN).

Later, on Tuesday, June 2, President Muhammadu Buhari added his voice to the high profile orders handed down to the police to their job. "I expect the Nigeria Police Force to speedily and diligently investigate this case and ensure that all the culprits responsible for this barbaric act are brought to justice," the president reportedly said.

Good! Heartwarming response! But I would always cherish a country where the police and other security agencies can always do their jobs without being ordered to do so by the governor or president. Each time there is an attack by terrorists or bandits in which the casualty figures are high enough to attract national outrage, we will be served with the news that President Buhari has ordered the security agents to apprehend the perpetrators. I always recoil with shame each time I stumble on such strange reports.

It has even been reported in this country that the president had ordered the Air Force to bomb terrorist strongholds! This one is even more sickening and preposterous because it is like informing the terrorists to relocate. After all, bombs will soon start raining on their locations. Who does that in any other country except our badly run and chaotic Nigeria?

I would like to see Nigerian security institutions grow and be truly independent. They should be able to do their jobs conscientiously whether the crime attracted widespread uproar or not, whether they got instructions from the president, governor or nobody. Unravelling crimes and arresting the people behind them should be normal, routine work for them. They do not need to be prodded or ordered to go after criminals to apprehend and bring them to justice.

There is also this little but very injurious matter that deserves mention here since it keeps reoccurring. When crimes like rape or any kind of violence are committed against women, there are usually some outspoken ladies who are quick to not just condemn the crime and call for justice for the victim but readily turn the incident into an opportunity to initiate an anti-men campaign. They would stretch their power of oratory and emotional outbursts to brand ALL men rapists and women-killers to widen the valley of animosity between the male and the female and swell the tribe of men-hating amazons.

This might earn them the very lucrative identity they are craving but would not make our world any better. When the records of rape cases are thoroughly examined, it might even be discovered that male rapists may not even constitute up to one per cent of the male population.

Both genders are needed in the fight against this hideous crime – which is even committed against both women and men. Demonizing all men each time gender-based crimes occur may help those who insist on doing so to achieve some self-serving credentials, but it will eventually inject a serious setback in the larger campaign by depleting the support from men which is highly required to lend the war some beneficial balance and eventually win it.

All men are not rapists or supporters of rape, that should be very clear. Since the Uwaila incident, many men have gone all out condemning the crime and calling for justice for the victim. It will NOT help to seek to discourage them by going into overdrive with a fallacious generalization that aims to tar all men with the egregious brush of women-haters and violators.

As I tried to tidy up this piece, another ugly news broke that an 18-year old female student of the Institute of Agriculture, Research and Training, Ibadan, Miss Barakat Bello, has been raped and stabbed to death in her own father's house in Ibadan. Narrating the incident, the obviously shattered father said: "Somebody called me on the phone that I should come home but he refused to tell me what happened. When I got home, I saw that my daughter had been raped and stabbed to death."

I hope the Oyo State Police Command will not wait for any "orders" from the governor or a national outcry to thoroughly investigate this heinous crime and bring the perpetrators to book. Rape is ugly and ungodly and leaves a lasting injury on the victim. Let's all help to discourage it by ensuring that its perpetrators are always smoked out and punished according to the law.

Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape And Murder So Gruesome!

*Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye is a Nigerian Journalist and Writer (scruples2006@yahoo.com ;@ugowrite)

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/632/1802/10/159152482266.jpeg>

Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye

Load-Date: June 7, 2020

---

End of Document

I like doing house chores to encourage my sons –Bolaji Abdullahi

I like doing house chores to encourage my sons –Bolaji Abdullahi

The Punch

May 23, 2022 Monday

Copyright 2022 Punch Newspapers Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 3142 words

Body

---

Olaleye Aluko Published 25 August 2019

A former Minister of Youths and Social Development as well as Minister of Sports, Bolaji Abdullahi, speaks on his journalism and political career, family, and other issues with OLALEYE ALUKO

You recently announced that you would launch a N50m endowment fund to provide opportunities for young people. What influenced that decision?

You will recall I said that on my 50th birthday. Getting to 50 and coupled with my personal experiences, I think more about legacies than any other thing. I think that there cannot be a greater legacy for me than that which would impart positively on the lives of people.

I like to say that I am the 12th wonder of the world- in the sense that there was nothing in my background that would have predicted that I would get to the level I've got to in my life and career. So, my good fortunes have surpassed my individual ambitions. I have benefitted from so many people's goodwill over the years. And I believe that the little way I can pay back is to provide opportunities for other people who are currently in the kind of position that I was in 20 or 30 years ago.

Which set of people qualify to benefit from the fund?

I get a lot of messages from young people requesting financial support. They either want to pay school fees, buy examination forms, or attend one training or the other, and I have been giving this support over the years from my purse. But I think it is about time we structured it in an organised manner. We are going to set up a team that will work out the details of how to manage the fund. Like I said in the announcement, I don't have any N50m anywhere. But I believe that the social capital and relationships I have built over the years have put me in a position to raise such funds and assist young people. This will be from people who share the same vision with me on youth development and youth empowerment. In addition to that, we are also looking at creating a youth centre in my state.

I like doing house chores to encourage my sons –Bolaji Abdullahi

At the moment, we have a huge challenge; not only about young people who have not gone to school at all, but also about young people who have gone to school but have nothing doing. They have no opportunity to advance their careers.

All over the country, youths have a problem with drugs. Kwara State is not an exception and it is a problem we all have to tackle. I believe that we need a facility that can create opportunities for young people to play, work and learn. It is going to be an integrated resource centre for young people and it will have an indoor sports hall. That hall reflects my bias for sports. It will also have an electronic library and training facilities for conferences as well as office spaces.

For me, I tried to be a governor, but I don't want to be remembered for how many times I tried to be governor. I don't want to wait until I become a governor, as only God can determine that. But in my private capacity, I have to do what I can.

What were some of your most notable achievements as a Minister of Youth Development?

For youth development, I did not spend as much time as I would have loved to. But I am glad that some of the initiatives that we started actually survived. One of them is the reform of the National Youth Service Corps. The NYSC is the biggest parastatal under the ministry. And it was clear to me that we could do more for the NYSC because we already have a high population of youths in tertiary institutions. These reforms encompassed not what the country got from them while they served, but what they could also get from the country.

Don't forget that 2011, when I became the Minister of Youth Development, was a very difficult year for the NYSC. That year was the first time that young people who went on election missions were killed. So, many people were asking questions- why the NYSC? Of what use is it? Why do we even need the scheme? People were questioning the rationale of the scheme because of the national grief.

I remember telling former President Goodluck Jonathan at the time that apart from Gen. Yakubu Gowon who created the NYSC, I want him to be the president who actually reformed and retooled the scheme for the 21st century.

The first thing we did was to retool the scheme in terms of the functionality. At that time, most businesses had stopped employing people because they were guaranteed a steady supply of corps members every year. So, we made a policy that private businesses would no longer be given corps members, unless they guaranteed that they would employ them at the end of the service year. That was seen as a harsh policy and I was roundly criticised. However, I believe that I did the right thing. We also insisted that corps members would serve in the four key development priorities- agriculture, education, healthcare and infrastructure.

Also, we made the orientation camps more engaging for corps members and a place where they could learn skills that would enable them become financially self-sufficient. In fact, the idea at that time was that one could earn a Master of Business Administration within the service year. That way, one wouldn't only be giving to the country, one would also be getting something tangible in return.

Unfortunately, we were about to launch the youths' employment scheme when I was moved to the ministry of sports.

What were some of the challenges you faced in that particular office?

For youths' development, I don't think the Nigerian government really understood what to do with that ministry. The ministry was created in response to some pan-African agenda. I think the African Union directed member states to recognise youths' development as a major sector and not as an integral of any other sector, because youth issues were big then. That was why the late President Umar Yar'adua established youths' development as a separate ministry.

Most of the times I got summoned to the Presidency was for me to mobilise young people for one political activity or the other, or when there was some idea or benefits to be shared to young people.

I like doing house chores to encourage my sons –Bolaji Abdullahi

Though we had a national youth policy, there was no clarity as to what should be done. So, it was difficult for the minister's voice to penetrate through the policy wilderness. Ideally, there must be a youth component to every sector of governance, if we are really serious. There should be youth components to agriculture, environment, infrastructure and even women affairs.

Are you happy with the level of youth involvement in governance in Nigeria?

It is a great development and very important too. But I must say that is the easiest part. Passing legislation to say that young people could contest was the easiest thing that could have been done. For me, the parallel should be gender participation. There is no law that a woman cannot contest any political office in Nigeria as long as she meets the constitutional and age requirements. Yet, why do we have very few women in public office? So, there is no legal barrier against youths or women participation in governance.

What were your legacies as the Minister of Sports in Nigeria?

People would like to say that the highpoint of my achievements as the sports minister was winning the African Cup of Nations trophy in 2013 for the first time after 19 years. Yes, it is an achievement that I am proud of, together with all the people I worked with at that time. But I don't consider that as the zenith. For me, the most important achievement was the reform of the Nigerian Professional Football League.

When I resumed office, the NPFL was already comatose. Nobody was willing to associate with the league. Those who were managing the league at that time always came, cap in hand, begging for money to execute a match. In fact, they were making the clubs to pay indemnity of referees. So, when clubs were paying the indemnity of match referees, you could predict what would happen in the matches. In fact, every club was winning their own matches. That was the state of the league at the time I got into office.

But by establishing the League Management Committee, which later became the League Management Company, we turned the fortunes of the Nigerian league around. Within six months, we were able to sign agreements with Super Sports. We were able to get the title sponsors, Globacom, to come back. And that was why, within one year of launching the reforms and establishing the LMC, the club that won the league that year (I think Lobi Stars) got paid about N14m.

The second area is the launch of the National Youth Games, and I am so glad that we have continued that until today. The idea of the youth games is to create opportunities for young people to play sports. Don't forget that the National Youths Sports Festival used to be that event for young people not playing at the elite level. But we then decided that it should be called the National Open Sports Festival, which would be the Nigerian equivalent of the Olympics. It would not just be a gathering of talents, but a celebration of Nigeria's sporting strength.

What do you think are some of the major problems impeding sports development in Nigeria?

As a sports minister, I led the country to the Olympics in 2012 and we didn't win anything. If I knew what I know now, I would have told Nigerians not to expect us to win anything at the Olympics. This is because we had not done anything. Another Olympics is coming up in 2020, and we will be deceiving ourselves to expect Nigeria to win anything; unless it happens by chance. This is because there is nothing on the ground to think otherwise.

Countries that go to the Olympics and win medals spend a lot of money and years preparing for it. It is not something you just wake up few months to the event and say we are going to the Olympics. It is just jamboree.

I found that sports had become a science. This is at a point where micro-metres and micro-seconds were making the difference between the winner and the runners-up. Years of planned training must go into sports. That's why I was trying to set up the High Performance Index Centre and source for money from the government. President Jonathan bought the idea, gave us some money and we got some equipment.

However, it saddens me to note that most of the equipment we got at that time under Jonathan's government are still in the containers till today, unless something changes last week.

I like doing house chores to encourage my sons –Bolaji Abdullahi

Another area is the encouragement of our athletes, and this is lacking in Nigeria. We look down on our athletes, and expect to reap where we did not sow. We should celebrate our athletes. For me, those were the key challenges.

What do you consider your achievements as the National Publicity Secretary of the All Progressives Congress?

I became the publicity secretary at the most difficult period for the party, which was a time when the president had so many health challenges and he had to leave the country for some time.

All kinds of agitations were going on in the media and it was my responsibility to manage the party through that difficult period. I am very proud that we were able to navigate that time so well.

Secondly, as a journalist and party spokesman, my ethical principle is that the language of political communication must not be corrupt. In Nigeria, we have substituted verbal thuggery for communication, and the more abusive you are, the more people consider you to be effective as a public political communicator. That is really shameful. But at the time I was the spokesman; that was one resolve I made. I wanted to 'de-odourise' the language of political communication and bring in some finesse. People would abuse you and you must resist the temptation to abuse back.

How easy was it for you to take the decision to resign as the Publicity Secretary of the APC, and as Chairman, Nigeria Sugar Development Council?

It is a bit complicated and the full story will be told one day in my book. But at that point, it was really difficult for me; and not even in the way people would think. Many people would imagine that the difficulty I mean is that the political family I belong to, led by Dr Bukola Saraki, left the APC and so, I was caught between the parties. No, that was not the difficulty. The difficulty for me was that someone I had a lot of respect for, who was the chairman of the party, had diametrical opposite ideas of what I had of how the party should be run.

His tactics, strategies and understanding of how things should be done, were really different from the way I know to function and operate. So, it was becoming difficult for me then. As a result of the activities of my political constituency run by Dr Bukola Saraki, I was being victimised and seen as an enemy within, although I did not do anything. I was being second-guessed to the extent that people went behind to my deputy to issue statements. If Dr Saraki left and I did not have any reason to leave, I would still remain in the party. But there were so many other issues that will be disclosed in the course of time.

Would it be right to say that Bukola Saraki gave you your first opportunity in politics?

Yes, to the extent that I was working in Lagos State as a journalist with ThisDay newspaper, when he (Saraki) invited me to work with him at a time I had just returned from the United Kingdom. It was at that time he was elected governor in Kwara State, and he invited me to work with him. So, I became his special assistant.

Why did you decide to write the book- 'On a platter of gold-How Jonathan won and lost Nigeria'?

I think it is the dream of every journalist to write a book, though most of us never get to do that. I just think that it is important for us to chronicle historical moments. If you read that book, you will find that it was not just an exposé, it was about pitching together fabrics from our recent history to construct an articulate narrative in a way that so many things would then make sense. I wrote that book because I saw it as an opportunity to display my skills as a writer and journalist, and most importantly, as someone who worked in that government. I believe that put me in a unique position to document that moment for posterity.

How did President Goodluck Jonathan react to the book?

I don't know. I have not spoken with him. I think to the best of my ability, I tried to be objective. I am not saying it is faultless but I tried to be objective.

Some people believe you were being disloyal to the president by writing that book. What's your reaction to such people?

I like doing house chores to encourage my sons –Bolaji Abdullahi

Did he win an election in Nigeria? Yes. Did he lose an election in Nigeria? Yes. So, what is the disloyalty there? There is no equivalent in the manner that President Jonathan emerged. Against all odds, he became the president. At that time, he was the most popular president we had had. People actually marched on the streets, protesting for him to be made a substantive president. But how do we explain a situation where someone who came in with so much goodwill became the most hated president in the (history of) the country within a few years? As a journalist, that should arouse some curiosity. So, it was the question of what happened that I tried to answer in the book.

What inspired your book, Sweet Sixteen?

Sweet Sixteen was inspired by my children- my girls. They were growing up very fast and I was worried about the kind of values they were growing up with in the midst of so much that was happening all over the country. My eldest daughter was 14 at the time and I decided to write her a persona letter, sharing my core values and interests. I found that so many of her friends got interested when she shared the letter with them. She was doing her Advanced Levels then; so some of her friends even called and were willing to discuss with me about some of the issues I touched in the letter to my daughter.

So, that was where the idea came from. I felt that if so many young people, especially females, were asking these questions, I needed to do some kind of literature to address them. It was not just about sexuality; it was about career and living together in a multi-cultural society like Nigeria.

Can you recall how you met your first wife?

I met my first wife when I had just left secondary school. I was 19 and she was 18. It was secondary school love. I used to study and discuss literature with her. Then, literature turned something else and we ended up dating through our university years.

How often do you spend time with your family?

I have a lot of time now. Even when I was a minister and was so busy, the principal of my children's school used me as an example for other parents when we attended the Parent-Teachers Association meetings. He would say, "Look, this is one of the busiest parents we have here, but he has never missed the visiting days, inter-house sports and other activities; why don't you be like him?" I used to be very proud of that compliment because for me, my family is my priority.

In your opinion, what makes a good marriage?

I think there is no recipe for a good marriage; but respect is very important. The couple must have respect for each other. Love is important, but it does not solve everything. Most young people will find that out after some years. You have to marry someone who will continue to respect you. It is respect that will make you to listen to him or her even when he or she is wrong or angry.

Was your family in support of your political career from the onset?

Absolutely. They always have been in support of me. Whether I got appointments or resigned appointments, they always support me.

Do you engage in household chores?

I love to. This is because it's the only way I can encourage my boys. I don't feel comfortable sitting down and being served, then people come to pack the plates. Of course, they don't allow me to do chores. Everybody wants to collect it, but I try to show an example that household chores are not exclusive to females.

Who are your role models?

I have a lot of people- some of them I have never met but I just read about them. In terms of writing and journalism, I admire Paul Okoelo, Calib Jubrian, Dan Agbese, Yakubu Mohammed and Dele Giwa.

I like doing house chores to encourage my sons –Bolaji Abdullahi

Politically, I admire Obafemi Awolowo. Actually, he is one of the most incredible human beings I grew up to know in this country in terms of visioning. But not just him, the first generation of this country's political leaders, such as Sardauna of Sokoto, Ahmadu Bello; Tafawa Balewa; and Ladoke Akintola, loved this country.

What are your other interests?

My family knows that they cannot separate me from my books. And my children all read books. In my family, that is what we do. We read and discuss books. Also, we don't joke with prayers as we are devout Muslims.

All rights reserved. This material, and other digital content on this website, may not be reproduced, published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed in whole or in part without prior express written permission from PUNCH.

Load-Date: May 23, 2022

---

End of Document

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

Nigerian Tribune

June 18, 2017 Sunday

Copyright 2017 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 4361 words

Body

---

General Ajibola Kunle Togun, a former Director of Military Intelligence and former Deputy Director of States Security Service and now an evangelist, served at the Awka Sector of the Nigerian Army during the 1967-70 civil war. He speaks with MOSES ALAO on the recent threats and counter-threats among the major ethnic groups, why Nigeria is not making progress, the herdsmen menace and the politics of his home state, Oyo. Excerpts:

YOU were in the military during the civil war between 1967 and 1970; where did you serve and what was the experience like? This question becomes imperative in view of the threats and counter-threats of war now coming from youths of Northern and Southern extractions.

You are correct. I took part in the civil war; I was in the Awka Sector. That time, it was the hottest sector. Initially, when the war started, I didn't participate, but I joined in 1968 when I joined the Army after leaving the University of Ife. I got to the war front and the man who recruited me that time was retired General Daramola; he was a colonel then. Anyone who witnessed that civil war would not pray for another war. But the thing is that, when some of these young people began to shout and issue threats, one would expect that those who witnessed the war, those in the military would shut them up. But, unfortunately, people are pushing the military to the background in the politics of the country and this should not be so. Maybe that is why the retired military men have been watching. But I expect people to have spoken against all these threats from young men, who were probably not born or matured enough to understand what went down during the civil war. You see, in advanced countries such as Israel, United States and most of Europe, ex-military men play a lot of roles in politics, because the best brains anywhere in the world are in the military. But what we practise in Nigeria is not politics; people just join politics to make money. That is why we can never tell one another the truth and politicians will never address the issues causing these troubles squarely.

On January 13, 2017, I was at the Broadcasting Corporation of Oyo State(BCOS) with retired General Alabi Isama and I remembered him talking about the relationships among the three major tribes, that the North don't like Yoruba because the Hausa/Fulani saw the civil war as an effort to conquer the East to the ocean, but a Yoruba man, General Benjamin Adekunle, the commander of the 3 Marine Commando, prevented that from happening. Eighty-five per cent of the troops that fought in 3 Marine Commando were Yoruba. Isama also said that the Igbo people do not like the Yoruba and they will never like Yoruba, because a Yoruba man stopped their dream of Biafra. You can now imagine that between January and May, the issue he addressed about the unity of the country is now coming out.

The issue is that those agitating that Igbo should leave the North and so on, do not understand the implications of their actions. We studied military history and what it entails is not just about what happened in 1963; it is about the lessons of history. The battles that were fought, we learn from the lessons. If these people making threats know history, they will not be talking rubbish. I expected the older people from those areas to have spoken, including retired military officers. They should not just say that it is politics, because no nation survives two civil wars. So, if these people threatening know the implications, they will not be talking rubbish. Some of us sacrificed our lives to make Nigeria one. General Gowon's slogan then was 'To keep Nigeria one, a task that must be done,' but some people are now talking rubbish and their elders are not talking. The Northern Youth leader who issued the first threat didn't just say it; I saw a video of where he sat down and was reading, which means that he is not an unknown person. So, what were the leaders in the North looking at?

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

The Arewa Consultative Forum (ACF) spoke against the threat...

How many hours after the boy made the declaration? Some of us are experts in military intelligence. There is a department in military intelligence called psychological operations. Nigeria is supposed to have such. Under this department, there is what you call attitude and attitude change. If someone says something of that magnitude, one would expect immediate reaction in 24 or maximum of 48 hours. As I said, those people don't know the implications of what they are saying. They want to set this country on fire for a second time and people are keeping quiet. But when the thing starts, they will not be able to control it and it will break this country into pieces.

Some people are advocating Nigeria's break-up while others are recommending restructuring and true federalism as solutions to the country's challenges. What do you think can be done to achieve a united Nigeria?

We opted for a presidential system of government, but we are not practising it the way it should be practised. This is a challenge. You said people are agitating for restructuring, why won't they? We have not been operating true federalism and if Nigeria will forge ahead, we have to operate a truly federal system. There should be no part of the constitution that favours any section, religion or group. There must be equality all the way. If we can do this, then Nigeria will have no problem. But with what we operate now, there can't be unity.

And you think true federalism can bring about unity?

Of course yes. Let key people who have ideas about how government should be run come together to proffer solutions. And we cannot leave this in the hands of politicians, because they are only there to make money. I say this without fear of immodesty and I want any politician to come and meet me and tell me I am wrong. On that BCOS programme, I gave a challenge that everyone who has led Nigeria either as president or in any other capacity should come out to tell me that when he was Head of State or president, this was the national goal or national objective he pursued for Nigeria.

Does that challenge extend to President Muhammadu Buhari?

Of course yes. I want him to tell me that these are the national goals that he is pursuing. None. A colleague of mine phoned me after General Buhari won the election that I should write a paper for him on security and I wrote three papers. One was on security; the second was on national goal for the forward movement of Nigeria and the third was what I thought Buhari should do in the first 100 days in office.

Did the papers get to the president?

I sent them by DHL.

Where did you send them to?

He was staying at the Defence House, Abuja then. And since the papers were not brought back to me, then he got them.

How can you be sure? Did he acknowledge receipt?

He did not.

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

And you have not seen anyone close to him who could confirm whether he got the papers?

[General Abdulrahman] Dambazzau was following him about that time. I thought he would be the National Security Adviser, so I sent copies of those papers to him too. But he never acknowledged. When Monguno was appointed NSA [National Security Adviser], I sent copies to him and he acknowledged. To them, they would say Kunle Togun is looking for appointment or he is looking for work. But that is not true.

Haven't you seen any of the things you wrote about in the actions of the government?

What I am saying is that Nigeria has no national interest and that is the focus for any country to move forward. I wrote a paper on this in 1990. In 1983, as a Major, I was in TRADOC in Minna, in the Doctrine Department as a research officer. I was given an assignment to go and work out what Nigeria's defence policy should be as of 1983 and so I headed for Lagos. I met General [Ibrahim] Babangida; I served under him at the headquarters. He was the Director SD Plans and I was G2 SD, so I served under him at Army Headquarters. So, when I got to Lagos, he saw me and said, Kunle what are you doing in Lagos and I told him I was given the assignment to work out Nigeria's defence policy. He asked how I would go about it and I told him that I would go to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Institute of International Affairs and find out what Nigeria's national interest was. I said that I would then analyse the threats to that interest, after which I would be able to identify the countries, organisations and bodies that would be hostile to that interest because it would not be in their interest. I said I would identify those who would be neutral and those who would be friendly because they were likely going to gain from that interest. I told him that I would do further analyses on all these groups and then would be able to establish what Nigeria's foreign policy should be, which would be our national interest and that, normally, defence policy backs foreign policy. General Babangida clapped for me and then said that Nigeria had no national interest. That was in 1983.

In 1960 when we gained independence, did those leading Nigeria then sit down to discuss what should be the national interest of Nigeria?

No one identified or established any such thing and without a national interest, Nigeria cannot move one millimetre forward. The reason that advanced countries move forward and Nigeria has never moved forward is because there are no goals and objectives that Nigeria is pursuing. For instance, we have the Federal Government, the state government and the local government. Everyone should have something to do with the pursuit of the national interest. What we have now is that anyone gets into office as president, governor or local government chairman and comes up with what he thinks the people need; what he feels he should do and that is why there is no continuity. Let me give you an example from what I said in 1990 when I was at the National Institute for Policy and Strategic Studies. Because we didn't have a national goal, even our foreign missions are not tasked. If you send an ambassador or high commissioner to a country, what assignment are they going to carry out? That is why they call them missions. What mission do we give our ambassadors? If Nigeria has a national goal of self-sufficiency in food production, we have a fertiliser plant in Onne, though I don't know how functional it is now, all Nigeria has to do is to tell the ambassador to Togo to make sure that the president sends certain tons of phosphate to Nigeria annually for us to produce the amount of fertiliser we need. You have given an assignment to that ambassador. For the states, you can now task them and tell them that each state must produce so and so metric tons of farm produce common with their locality. That is how there can be continuity, because anyone who comes in as the next leader will know what he already has to do. The state government can also tell the local government to produce a certain amount of farm produce; that is how all the tiers of government will contribute to the national goal. But we have been talking; we have been writing but no one listens. They would say what are these soldiers saying again? What they do not know is that the best brains are in the military anywhere in the world, but Nigerians do not listen to the military.

Some of your colleagues saw that their voices would be ignored as ex-military men and quickly joined politics. Why did you stay aloof?

When soldiers started joining politics, you saw the opposition they had. Nigerians didn't want them. The issues involved do not need someone joining politics before he or she can speak out. I play politics, but I am not interested in elections or appointments. In politics, democracy says power belongs to the people, but the moment you vote in some people, they become bosses over those who elected them. So, I joined politics to ensure that power remains with those who voted and those who were voted for. Not all of us have to join politics; we can write papers, but they need to be acted upon. The military does psychological operations for the government in the United States.

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

From the damning verdict you returned on politicians that they are all after money, it will be interesting to know your view on 18 years of democracy in the country.

As far as I am concerned, since I cannot see the forward movement of Nigeria, I do not think the country has gained anything from the 18 years of democracy. That is my opinion. Nigeria is not moving forward. From Shonekan to Abacha to Abdulsalami and then the civilian government of Obasanjo, Yar'Adua and Jonathan, was there any concrete action plans on how to move forward? Nothing like that. In those days of effective politics, I was already mature during the days of Awolowo, so I knew how politics was played that time. Political parties had manifestos; [they knew] what they were going to pursue. Since 1999, can you tell me the manifesto of any of the political parties? Some of us are here to advise, to write papers but then, they are not acted upon. I know the role I played in Oke Ogun and Ibarapa and even Ibadan for Buhari to be voted in as president.

Did you do that because you were sure he would be different from the others?

No. Someone came to Saki and told me that Vice-President Yemi Osinbajo said he should hand over campaign posters for Oke Ogun to me and I said I didn't know Osinbajo. But I suspected it would be Buhari that sent them. Immediately, I set to work. They should check the votes. When the president got voted in, a classmate of mine with whom I did HSC in 1962, said 'we heard all your efforts for Buhari, please make sure that [Abiola] Ajimobi also gets voted for as governor in Oyo State for a second term.' I wrote a report of my activities on the 10 local governments in Oke Ogun, Ibarapa and Ibadan. I have about 2,000 of my supporters in Ibadan and in that report, I said I was not asking for money, but that I wanted to know what will be committed to the people, that Buhari and then Ajimobi would do. I sent a copy to Ajimobi and I have written to him three times that I wanted to discuss the issue of security with him; he has not answered me till date.

You said you were going to discuss security with him...

What I wanted to discuss with him is the issue of these herdsmen, who have been harassing Oke Ogun for the last 25 years. Now, the thing is getting out of hand now. In April 2015, I said I wanted to discuss security with him, but till date, I have not been able to.

Are you sure he got the letters?

He cannot tell me he didn't get them. But I do not want to appear as someone who is looking for appointments or something. So I am just watching. As I said earlier, we all do not have to join politics, but Nigerians should recognise the brains they have and listen to their advice.

The issue of herdsmen you mentioned has become very serious; what do you think is the solution?

I retired in April 1996; my farm in Saki that time was about 150 hectares of land. I had another farm in Ago Are. In October 1996, my younger brother died and I had to sort out the burial arrangements so I could not visit my farm in Ago Are. After the burial, I went to the farm and my almost 100 hectares of maize had been grazed on. I reported and they introduced politics into it. They said they investigated, that Abacha sent someone to investigate, but no one came to me. That was the time they said I was harassing people. General Buhari came to Ibadan during former Governor Lam Adesina's time to meet him that Oke Ogun people were killing Fulani herdsmen, whereas, it was the herdsmen that were killing people anyhow. They would enter your farm, graze on your farm and you cannot talk.

Do they still do that now?

Just last week, they macheted a man in Oje Owode here. The boy got to his farm and saw that cows had trampled on his maize farm and grazed on it. He traced the footsteps of the cows and saw the herdsmen and challenged them; they stripped him naked and macheted him mercilessly. Many of these herdsmen carry AK 47 about.

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

Around here in OkeOgun? One would think tales of AK 47-wielding herdsmen could only be told in Southern Kaduna.

The Development Agenda for Western Nigeria (DAWN) commission invited me to Lagos three years ago for a lecture and I told them this thing. I was also in Abuja last June; all of us who were former directors of military intelligence were invited to Abuja by the current director of military intelligence. He tabled the security challenges of the country and we all had to make contributions. When it came to the issue of Fulani herdsmen, people said different things. When it came to my turn, I said these Fulani herdsmen, who the Northerners see as part of them, are foreigners. They are foreigners; they are from Mali, Burkina Faso, Niger Republic and Chad; that is why they are so merciless. They are of no fixed address. I told them that Fulani people should call these herdsmen and ask where they come from in Northern Nigeria and ask them who their district heads are. The herdsmen are not Nigerians. I am a security man and I know my level of security status in the world. Some of these herdsmen were Al-Qaeda terrorists who took over Northern Mali and France had to send troops while ECOWAS and African Union added troops to expel them from Northern Mali and hand over the territory back to Mali. That was where they came about their assault rifles. Why are security agents not investigating how Fulani herdsmen are going about with AK 47? I told them in Abuja that you call them Fulani, but we call them Bororo in Oke Ogun and they have been harassing us for the past 25 years; it is not a joke. I said at DAWN three years ago that the 10 local governments of Oke Ogun and three local governments of Ibarapa were under the siege of herdsmen, but nobody listened and I see the invasion of these people as if someone is trying to expand their territory to Yorubaland.

Do you think the problem can be solved through the provision of grazing routes across the country?

How can anyone legislate on grazing routes? How? How much grazing routes have these people been given in the North? They are now saying we should give grazing routes.

There is a claim that there are grazing routes across the country.

Who made the grazing routes?

Is there no grazing route in Saki?

Let me tell you, from a very long time ago, they used to take cows from the North to Lagos on foot. That was when they used to pass through here and that is what they are now saying that there used to be grazing routes. Who created the grazing routes? The Fulani herdsmen we grew up to know around here do not graze on anyone's farm; we lived with them for decades. But these foreign invaders come and start grazing on people's farms. They go to people's farms to graze and tell you do you want their cows to die and once you challenge them, they shoot and kill. You see, things are happening and some idiots are sitting down somewhere making case for non-Nigerians. And do they know that if we give grazing grounds to these clowns, tomorrow they will say they own the place. That was what started the problem in Jos till date. That was what started the problem in Agatu. And someone expects that to happen in the South-West? Nobody should give grazing grounds in the South-West.

Sometimes, when the death of Dele Giwa comes up, your name mysteriously enters the fray. What do you have to do with Dele Giwa's death?

Well, I will blame you journalists. When an issue comes up, you need to explore all angles and be unbiased. But because Dele Giwa died a journalist, therefore, you do not want to hear the other sides of the story. I wrote a book entitled Dele Giwa: The Unanswered Questions, but the press didn't allow that book to fly. I will give you a copy for Tribune. In that book, you will find out who killed Dele Giwa. I pointed out who should be grabbed and made to tell those he collaborated with.

But how did you come into the mix?

I worked with Akilu in the State Security Service during the incident and some people are saying that Akilu called Dele Giwa before his death. The only thing I know was that he was invited to SSS following an article he wrote on SFEM, a policy Babangida started on foreign exchange, that if SFEM failed, Babangida and his officials would be stoned on the streets. So, he was invited to SSS and the woman who was in charge of the development, a Northerner, I think she was Mrs Aliyu or something, she was of the Assistant Superintendent of Police status and she was chatting with Dele Giwa on the write-up, that it was inciting and that he should retract it but he blasted the woman, that who was she to instruct him on what to write. At a stage, the woman came to report to me and I said security and the mass media should work together. So I went to the woman's office and I met Dele Giwa and Ray Ekpu there and began to explain that they should understand that he was only invited and not arrested. I said I was not in Nigeria when NET Building in Marina caught fire, but that I understood that a journalist wrote about three days before the fire, asking how prepared the Fire Service was to fight fire outbreak in many of the high-rise buildings springing up in Lagos and that the journalist was arrested. The two of them laughed and they said it was Ray Ekpu that wrote the article. So I said 'Dele, if someone attempts a coup and fails and somebody now says Dele wrote that Babangida would be stoned on the street and they arrest you, what will you do?' I said that was what the woman was trying to tell him and he realised the import of what was said. A second time, the woman came to me that Dele Giwa was trying to write an article about the other side of Ebitu Ukiwe, who was then sacked as Babangida's second in command and then there was a police officer who said something about soldiers not knowing anything beyond women and drinking beer and the police authorities were dealing with him. I was told that Dele Giwa wanted to write on that too and so I followed the woman to her office and we chatted. In fact, that day, by the time I got to the woman's office, I met him saying all sort of things that he was close to so and so persons and I asked him which article he was going to write on Ukiwe and the police officer. I asked why he could not go to meet the police authorities to intervene rather than just writing articles, because the police are bound by laws and it could not be said that the police were victimising the boy, because he knew there were laws that forbade his conduct. And then, I asked him where he talked about arms and ammunition and he said where did I get that information; and I told him you are a journalist, do you reveal your source of information? Are you now telling the military to reveal its source? He said he knew people were after him and I said 'Dele, I met you telling this woman the names of high-profile people you know; are you sure some of your colleagues are not jealous of you and trying to cause trouble for you?' And we joked that if he wanted me to investigate for him, he should pay me in foreign exchange and we all laughed. That was how people came about saying that I interviewed him prior to his death. In that book, you will find out who killed Dele Giwa. I pointed out who should be grabbed and made to tell those he collaborated with.

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

You revealed the role you played in Oke Ogun and Oyo State during the last election and for years, the people of Oke Ogun have been alleging that they are marginalised in power sharing and angling for one of their own to be governor. Where do you stand on the clamour for an Oke Ogun indigene to be governor in 2019?

That idea is mine.

The idea about an Oke Ogun man being governor? Why is it you never contested?

I am not interested in contesting or being appointed. During the time of UNCP, they sent for me and I went to Ibadan. They said they wanted me as the senator for Oyo North and I said I was not interested. So, let us address the 2019 issue. After the 2015 elections, I met APC members in Saki and I asked them who are the other key APC leaders in Oke Ogun; they asked me why and I told them that since Ajimobi had come to Saki and Oke Ogun to appreciate them for voting for him to win a second term, then we should also pay him a visit and also thank him for appreciating us. We would then tell him that we want an Oke Ogun indigene to be governor of Oyo State in 2019 and that we have told you, tell us who we should go and meet again in the APC. But the people started dilly-dallying; it was later that I learnt that if that was done, they were afraid that I would emerge the leader of the APC in Oke Ogun.

But the idea of having an Oke Ogun man as the next governor is a good one that all zones in Oyo State must give consideration to. It is in line with the principles of equity and fairness. Oke Ogun is the second largest zone in Oyo State after Ibadan, but only Ibadan and Ogbomoso have produced governors for over 20 years. So, I believe Oke Ogun should be given a chance.

Have you met the governor on that?

Only idiots make cases for terrorist-herdsmen -General Togun

The meeting never came up. But a young man came to me that they were working for an Oke Ogun agenda ahead of 2019 and I told him that the same thing had been on my mind. They had the first meeting in Otu and I was present there. I advised them that they would have opposition from politicians, traditional rulers and so on; I analysed everything and warned them against being hijacked. I have not heard much from them now.

About four or five aspirants from Oke Ogun have shown interest. As someone passionate about Oke Ogun, have you made up your mind on whom to support?

No. But I met the engineer, Remi Olaniyan, at a meeting of Oke Ogun traditional rulers held in Ago Are and he told me he would come and see me. Also, one day, a young man was here with Mrs Busari and he said he was Debo Adesina and that he has interest in being governor of Oyo State and I asked him which party he was going to use and he said he had not made up his mind yet. I asked him a few questions and he has phoned me a few times. No other person has told me he is contesting. So, for now, I cannot say I have made up my mind about anyone.

Load-Date: June 19, 2017

---

End of Document

Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape, Murder So Gruesome!

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

June 5, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1765 words

Byline: Ugochukwu Ejinkeonye

Body

---

UGOCHUKWU E J INKEONYE

"One life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as millions lost in a pogrom."—Dele Giwa (Late Nigerian Journalist)

After five whole years of seeking admission into the institution of higher learning, Miss Vera Uwaila Omozuwa was eventually admitted to read Microbiology at the University of Benin. Obviously a very serious student, she was in no mood to joke with her studies, probably, after considering how long it took her to secure the admission. So, she would always go to the serene environment of her Church when worshippers were not around to read her books. The Church environment should be both safe and devoid of distractions.

But on this particular day, May 27, 2020, some wicked, callous and barbarous assailants gained access to the Church auditorium where she was immersed in her books, brutally raped her and ended her life by hitting her on the head with a fire extinguisher which gave her a very deep cut. They then fled leaving her in the pool of her own blood. She was only 22 and in her first year at the university.

No one knew how long she lay there bleeding until the security man arrived and saw her. She was already unconscious, probably due to the effect of the brutal violation she had experienced and the cruel blow she had received, from whose wound she must have lost so much blood. At the hospital where she was rushed to, the doctors tried their best but were unable to revive her. She eventually died without being able to utter a single word to anyone about what had happened to her or whether she was able to recognize her savage rapists and murderers.

The gory picture of her body is the most horrible image I have tried to look at in recent times. I had to remove my eyes immediately! A once beautiful girl had suddenly turned into a horrific and scary image because of the primeval exploits of some brutish creatures.

Loading...

Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape, Murder So Gruesome!

Now, what exactly could so badly provoke human beings to descend so low to the level of wild beasts to give free rein to their basest instincts to unleash such a barbaric violence on another human being? Lust, anger, hatred, sadism, desire to conquer and dominate, revenge, or what? Are more and more people losing their humanity? Has the world gone irrecoverably berserk? Daily, dizzying reports of grown men raping grandmothers, mothers, single women and even underage girls are rough-ly slapped on our faces. I have even read bloodcurdling accounts of ten or even eight month-old babies raped, not by confirmed mentally challenged people, but by other-wise sane human beings! What exactly is happening? I think this should be a very rich research subject for our scholars in the fields of psychology and behavioural studies. We need to urgently understand what has gone wrong with our world.

The parents of Uwaila are badly heart-broken as outrage engulfs the country over their daughter's barbaric murder. In a video that surfaced on twitter early this week, Uwaila's father lamented:

"It was not a mistake; it was not a fault; it was not stubbornness for her to go to the church to study. She had been going there for several years. She struggled for five years before she gained admission into UNIBEN. I was waiting to celebrate her admission before she died."

When has it become an offence for a serious and focused student to find a conducive place to read, more so, a worship centre which should be considered sacred and in-violable? Who could be so godless, wanton and profane as to trail a girl to a church building to unleash this kind of harrowing and deadly violence on her? Such a person should have no place within the bounds of civilised society.

Narrating the horrific incident, Uwaila's mother mournfully recounted:

"I saw a friend, who came to visit me, off and before I came back, someone had called my telephone thrice. When I got back, my children told me that a church member, Mummy Osunla, had called me and when I called her back, she asked where I was and told me that I should come and that she did not know what had happened to my daughter.

"I ran to the place but before I got there, they [had] already [taken] her to a private hospital and when I saw my daughter, I cried. They raped her; the dress she was wearing that morning was white, but it had turned to red; all her body was full of blood. Her mouth and eyes were tied; the hoodlums used a fire extinguisher to hit her head, which left a deep cut.

"We were asked to take her for an X-ray on her head; I did not have money but my church members tried and money was raised and we bought all the drugs that we were asked to buy, but Uwa could not make it. She was unable to say anything till she died; it was just tears that were coming out from her eyes."

The national outrage this grisly incident has provoked is quite reassuring, but the security agencies should be more creative and proactive about how to ensure that people that commit these hideous crimes are apprehended and punished. It should now be made compulsory that CCTVs must be installed in all public buildings including worship centres. This will go a long way deter potential rapists and other criminals who will know that their criminal activities are not hidden. The installation of these cameras should be extended to the streets and even highways. No amount spent on enhancing the security of lives and property should be considered too much. The police must equally be empowered to acquire more, modern crime-unravelling equipment, so as to be able to track criminals no matter how they try to evade justice

It is however encouraging that the Edo Police Command has announced the arrest of one of the suspected killers of Uwaila. Its spokesperson, Chidi Nwabuzor, said that fingerprints the fire extinguisher used in killing the hapless girl has led to the arrest of the suspect. We can only hope that the fingerprint readings are accurate and that this first arrest will lead to the arrest of the remaining criminals who are now on the run. When perpetrators of crimes are punished, prospective criminals are dissuaded and society is made safer for everyone.

When the news of Uwaila's murder broke, Edo State Governor, Mr. Godwin Obaseki tweeted: "I have ordered the Nigeria Police Force (@PoliceNG) to thoroughly investigate the circumstances that led to the death of Miss Vera Uwaila Omozuwa, a 100-level student of the University of Benin (UNIBEN).

Uwaila Omozuwa: Rape, Murder So Gruesome!

Later, on Tuesday, June 2, President Mu-hammadu Buhari added his voice to the high profile orders handed down to the police to their job. "I expect the Nigeria Police Force to speedily and diligently investigate this case and ensure that all the culprits responsible for this barbaric act are brought to justice," the president reportedly said.

Good! Heartwarming response! But I would always cherish a country where the police and other security agencies can always do their jobs without being ordered to do so by the governor or president. Each time there is an attack by terrorists or bandits in which the casualty figures are high enough to attract national outrage, we will be served with the news that President Buhari has ordered the security agents to apprehend the perpetrators. I always recoil with shame each time I stumble on such strange reports. It has even been reported in this country that the president had ordered the Air Force to bomb terrorist strongholds! This one is even more sickening because it is like informing the terrorists to relocate because bombs will soon start raining on their locations. Who does that anywhere?

I would like to see Nigerian security institutions grow and be truly independent. They should be able to do their jobs conscientiously whether the crime attracted widespread uproar or not, whether they got instructions from the president, governor or nobody. Unraveling crimes and arresting the people behind them should be normal, routine work for them. They do not need to be prodded or ordered to go after criminals, apprehend and bring them to justice.

There is also this little but very injurious matter that deserves mention here since it keeps reoccurring. When crimes like rape or any kind violence are committed against women, there are usually some outspoken ladies who are quick to not just condemn the crime and call for justice for the victim, but readily turn the incident into an opportunity to initiate an anti-men campaign. They would stretch their power of their oratory and emotions to brand ALL men rapists and women-killers in order to widen the valley of animosity between the male and the female. This might earn them the very lucrative identity they are craving but would not make our world any better. When the records of rape cases are thoroughly examined, it might even be discovered that male rapists may not even constitute up to one percent of the male population.

Both genders are needed in the fight against this hideous crime – which is even committed against both women and men. Demonizing all men each time gender-based crimes occur may help those who insist on doing it to achieve some self-serving credentials, but it will inject a serious setback in the larger campaign by depleting the support from men which is highly required to lend the war some beneficial balance and eventually win it. All men are not rapists or supporters of rape, that should be very clear. Since the Uwaila incident, many men have gone all out condemning the crime and calling for justice for the victim. It would help to seek NOT to discourage them by unleashing a fallacy of generalization that seeks to tar all of them with the egregious brush of women haters and violators.

As I tried to tidy up this piece yesterday afternoon, a newsflash came in that a 19-year old female student was raped and stabbed to death in her own father's house in Ibadan. Narrating the incident, the obviously shattered father of the victim said: "Somebody called me on the phone that I should come home but he refused to tell me what happened. When I got home, I saw that my daughter had been raped and stabbed to death."

I hope the Oyo State Police Command will not wait for any "orders" from the governor or a national outcry to thoroughly investigate the matter and bring the perpetrators to book. Rape is ugly. Let's all help to discourage it by ensuring that its perpetrators are always punished.

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/74/159133335292.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/37/159133335295.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/35/159133335332.jpeg>

<http://imgs.syndigate.info/633/1803/76/159133335339.jpeg>

Load-Date: June 5, 2020

---

End of Document

NIGERIA: INTERNATIONAL JURY TO PROBE INTO MURDER CASE

IPS-Inter Press Service

October 6, 1993, Wednesday

Copyright 1993 IPS-Inter Press Service/Global Information Network

Length: 240 words

Dateline: ABEOKUTA, NIGERIA, Oct. 6

Body

---

An international jury is to investigate into the death of a Nigerian journalist killed by a parcel bomb in 1986, a leading Nigerian author announced yesterday.

Nobel laureate, Wole Soyinka, who is the chair of the Lagos-based African Democratic League said "it is time to unravel the seven-year-old riddle" surrounding the death of Dele Giwa.

"It is also time all facts are brought out before an international jury, because facts are being deliberately mingled with lies in some underground publications so as to make the water very murky," he said.

Soyinka, awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1986, said "living witnesses to the plot and murder" of Giwa are ready to testify if immunity and security are provided them by the jury. Some of the witnesses, he said, live in exile abroad.

"The exercise is a perfectly legitimate one. But whoever tries to block the unravelling of the brutal murder, will have to tell the world why," he warned.

Giwa, editor-in-chief of the independent "Newswatch" magazine was killed when a parcel, believed to contain a bomb, exploded in his hands in Lagos in October 1986.

Many Nigerians believe that the parcel was sent by the Nigerian secret police.

But the military government, led by former President Ibrahim Babangida, denied any state involvement in the murder. But it also refused to investigate the incident.

Soyinka, 59, has yet to disclose the members of the jury who would probe into the Giwa incident.

Load-Date: October 1, 1993

The myth of cars in a holy well

Weekly Trust

October 13, 2018 Saturday

Copyright 2018 Media Trust Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 824 words

Body

---

It depends on who you ask - what's a general's life worth, serving or retired? Probably worth much more than that of a bloody civilian or one hundred bloody civilians. When Boko Haram attacked Chibok, efforts were made by the government of the day to make light of it. Then they attacked Buni Yadi, slaughtered and roasted nearly 50 school children. Again there was no dynamic quest to avenge those deaths. In February this year, they visited Dapchi and snatched Leah Sharibu and others. Government rescued the others and left poor Leah in captivity. Every other week, our gallant soldiers are ambushed, killed and buried in hush solemn ceremonies.

When Major General Idris Alkali disappeared between Bauchi and Abuja, his phone records were tracked to the Plateau. The Plateau has swallowed many innocent people in the past decade. But thanks to the dynamism of our security forces, at least we know that General Alkali is missing. His disappearance did not escape the notice of his colleagues even though he had recently retired.

The former chief of army administration must have been a very simple person. In a country where bloody civilians are dispensable, army generals are a privileged breed.

They retire with their orderlies and uniformed driver. Their homes are under armed guard 24/7 for life. General Alkali chose to ignore all his privileges and travel like a bloody civilian. He even chose to drive himself, an unusual thing for a unique general with access to exemplary privileges of life. Where the majority is left to their own security, it is a crime for those with privileges to forgo them. General Alkali did not get to Abuja his destination. But for the loud noises of politicians, his disappearance is capable of causing an ethno-religious civil war.

Dura Du, the part where his phone records was last tracked was not necessarily on the volatile map of Plateau. It is therefore shocking that a 'holy well' that was once a mining pit is now at the centre of the silent war of General Alkali's disappearance. In other climes, mining pits are quickly landfilled to avoid disaster but in Dura Du and other parts of the Plateau, they have metamorphosed into wells of living water.

As anyone who has lived in a Naija village would testify, water sources generate deep myths. The inhabitants of Dura Du believe that any attempt at tampering with the well would unleash untold calamities on the community. You would pardon them because they are right. Wells can survive without humans but humans cannot survive without water. It is a law of nature and in villages; nature is synonymous with the gods.

So, after an initial confrontation with protesters, the military task force drained the well and discovered General Alkali's Toyota Corona, a few personal belongings and later, other vehicles on the missing list of security agencies.

The myth of cars in a holy well

This has prompted social media influencers from his part of the country to decry alleged media silence and lack of a campaign hashtag for the general.

A cursory look at mainstream media coverage of the tragedy would reveal otherwise but people see more colours of the rainbow in between black and white. For now General

Alkali is still declared as 'missing'. His former colleagues have not given up on finding him, hopefully alive, neither should we.

As a sad and unfolding crisis, it has been well managed. Protesters who confronted guns and bayonets have escaped either being shot or unlawfully detained. This is commendable. Those bent on turning it into an inter-ethnic or religious inferno are perhaps disappointed.

One could only hope that all the sides to this unfortunate saga would continue to have faith in the capacity of established agencies to unravel the mystery behind this general's disappearance without upturning the apple cart. Our nation is used to handling the incomprehensible. It has witnessed the inconclusive investigation into the murder of foremost investigative journalist, Dele Giwa, Timothy Bonnet and Godwin Agbroko. It has witnessed the murder of Harry Marshall and failed to conclusively find the killers of Suliat Adedeji, Kudirat Abiola and Olaitan Oyerinde. It has failed to unravel the mystery behind the death of former justice minister, Bola Ige. The death of MKO Abiola is still a source of mystery.

We all hope that whoever snatched General Alkali from his car would produce the General alive rather than dead or at least lead investigators to what happened to him. That would be assurance that our jungle is liveable. It is not just because General Alkali is a retired general, it is because no nation thrives that cannot guarantee the safety, security and free movement of its citizens and guests alike.

It's October and Dele Giwa's immortal words are as important today as they were when they were first written - one life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as a thousand others that may go down in a pogrom, so, let's stop talking about numbers and talk about life.

Load-Date: October 15, 2018

---

End of Document

The Myth of Cars in a Holy Well

Daily Trust (Abuja)

October 10, 2018

Copyright 2018 Daily Trust Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media All Rights Reserved

Length: 824 words

Byline: Tunde Asaju

Body

---

It depends on who you ask - what's a general's life worth, serving or retired? Probably worth much more than that of a bloody civilian or one hundred bloody civilians. When Boko Haram attacked Chibok, efforts were made by the government of the day to make light of it. Then they attacked Buni Yadi, slaughtered and roasted nearly 50 school children. Again there was no dynamic quest to avenge those deaths. In February this year, they visited Dapchi and snatched Leah Sharibu and others. Government rescued the others and left poor Leah in captivity. Every other week, our gallant soldiers are ambushed, killed and buried in hush solemn ceremonies.

When Major General Idris Alkali disappeared between Bauchi and Abuja, his phone records were tracked to the Plateau. The Plateau has swallowed many innocent people in the past decade. But thanks to the dynamism of our security forces, at least we know that General Alkali is missing. His disappearance did not escape the notice of his colleagues even though he had recently retired.

The former chief of army administration must have been a very simple person. In a country where bloody civilians are dispensable, army generals are a privileged breed.

They retire with their orderlies and uniformed driver. Their homes are under armed guard 24/7 for life. General Alkali chose to ignore all his privileges and travel like a bloody civilian. He even chose to drive himself, an unusual thing for a unique general with access to exemplary privileges of life. Where the majority is left to their own security, it is a crime for those with privileges to forgo them. General Alkali did not get to Abuja his destination. But for the loud noises of politicians, his disappearance is capable of causing an ethno-religious civil war.

Dura Du, the part where his phone records was last tracked was not necessarily on the volatile map of Plateau. It is therefore shocking that a 'holy well' that was once a mining pit is now at the centre of the silent war of General Alkali's disappearance. In other climes, mining pits are quickly landfilled to avoid disaster but in Dura Du and other parts of the Plateau, they have metamorphosed into wells of living water.

As anyone who has lived in a Naija village would testify, water sources generate deep myths. The inhabitants of Dura Du believe that any attempt at tampering with the well would unleash untold calamities on the community. You would pardon them because they are right. Wells can survive without humans but humans cannot survive without water. It is a law of nature and in villages; nature is synonymous with the gods.

The Myth of Cars in a Holy Well

So, after an initial confrontation with protesters, the military task force drained the well and discovered General Alkali's Toyota Corona, a few personal belongings and later, other vehicles on the missing list of security agencies. This has prompted social media influencers from his part of the country to decry alleged media silence and lack of a campaign hashtag for the general.

A cursory look at mainstream media coverage of the tragedy would reveal otherwise but people see more colours of the rainbow in between black and white. For now General

Alkali is still declared as 'missing'. His former colleagues have not given up on finding him, hopefully alive, neither should we.

As a sad and unfolding crisis, it has been well managed. Protesters who confronted guns and bayonets have escaped either being shot or unlawfully detained. This is commendable. Those bent on turning it into an inter-ethnic or religious inferno are perhaps disappointed.

One could only hope that all the sides to this unfortunate saga would continue to have faith in the capacity of established agencies to unravel the mystery behind this general's disappearance without upturning the apple cart. Our nation is used to handling the incomprehensible. It has witnessed the inconclusive investigation into the murder of foremost investigative journalist, Dele Giwa, Timothy Bonnet and Godwin Agbroko. It has witnessed the murder of Harry Marshall and failed to conclusively find the killers of Suliat Adedeji, Kudirat Abiola and Olaitan Oyerinde. It has failed to unravel the mystery behind the death of former justice minister, Bola Ige. The death of MKO Abiola is still a source of mystery.

We all hope that whoever snatched General Alkali from his car would produce the General alive rather than dead or at least lead investigators to what happened to him. That would be assurance that our jungle is liveable. It is not just because General Alkali is a retired general, it is because no nation thrives that cannot guarantee the safety, security and free movement of its citizens and guests alike.

It's October and Dele Giwa's immortal words are as important today as they were when they were first written - one life taken in cold blood is as gruesome as a thousand others that may go down in a pogrom, so, let's stop talking about numbers and talk about life.

Load-Date: October 10, 2018

---

End of Document

#EndSARS: My father would be proud of Nigerian youths - Dele Giwa's daughter

PM News

October 20, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 56 words

Body

---

Ayodele Dele Giwa, the daughter of slain Nigerian journalist, editor and founder of Newswatch magazine, Dele Giwa has said her father would be proud of the #EndSARS protests being staged by Nigerian youths.

In a tweet thread on Twitter, Ayodele wrote that she was sure her father would have come out to protest if he were alive on this day.

Load-Date: October 24, 2020

---

End of Document

June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

The Nation (Nigeria)

June 15, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1651 words

Body

---

FOR 25 agonising years, the June 12 imbroglio was a never-ending soap opera until President Muhammadu Buhari decided to bring it to a deserving conclusion on Tuesday, June 12, 2018. At least, we all got the chance to exhale, regardless of how we may feel about the politics of the well-deserved presidential recognition bestowed on the real symbol of the undying narrative of an abducted hope on June 12, 1993-the late Bashorun Moshood Kasimawo Olawale Abiola. Even in these times, not many people would stand up to be counted like he did when it mattered most. Of course, in matters like this, it is difficult to rule out the usual devious sellouts who, after dancing on the grave of Abiola, also became beneficiaries of that supreme sacrifice. Pitifully, that is part of the story. But, when the chips are down, we do know those who truly stood up to be counted either dead or alive. And let's not get it wrong like the warped illogic spewed by a serving senator on the floor of the Senate some days back. These exceptional men and women were Nigerians-the true heroes of the democracy that many now enjoy with spasms of arrogance tailored to their padded shoulders.

For those who witnessed the tragic impulses that unfolded before them in those days, there couldn't have been a better way of celebrating Abiola's triumph than the significant olive branch President Muhammadu Buhari waved to all parties on the 25th anniversary of Nigeria's freest and fairest election which was annulled by the military junta under the leadership of now-retired General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida. The Babangida years would be remembered for three things-his Structural Adjustment Programme which impoverished the middle class; the gruesome letter bomb murder of that iconic journalist, Dele Giwa; and, the shameful role he played in the abortion of the June 12 mandate freely given to his bosom friend and arguably Africa's richest man at that time, Abiola. No one is keen to remember MAMSER, DFRRI, Option A4 and numerous great initiatives of the IBB era that the anti-people annulment eclipsed so firmly. Those who lived through that period couldn't have forgotten the deadly games and murderous proclivities of the military boys from the moment Babangida announced his decision to annul the election to the short-lived Interim National Government of Ernest Shonekan/General Sani Abacha to when the dark-goggled one completely seized the rein of power, tossing off Shonekan and his band of pretenders so casually with less effort than someone swatting a fly.

Ask Babangida today what pushed him into that betrayal of trust and he would mumble some mumbo-jumbo incoherent statement that makes no sense other than blaming it on the military hierarchy which, he said that he, as Commander in Chief, was powerless to control - the same tendentious excuse that he has tendered over the years to dribble everybody. Well, he ended up dribbling himself to infamy with that rude joke. And so, it was not surprising that he didn't turn up that Tuesday in Aso Rock when Abiola, Gani Fawehinmi and others had their day in the sun. How could he? Aside the ghosts of all the martyrs of the June 12, 1993 mandate haunting him, we cannot easily forget the many lives that were lost in the protests, including those who met their untimely deaths whilst running from the crisis-ridden South-West when the Abacha goons used protesters to perfect their shooting capacity. At the height of the June 12 struggle, notable voices were killed in their homes including Pa Rewane and Mrs. Kudirat Abiola who was mauled down on the streets of Lagos for daring to insist on the release of her husband. Till today, Abiola's death in the hand of the state is still shrouded in official secrecy. He was silenced, betrayed by those he thought he knew too well to distrust.

June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

If not for Buhari, 'Hope 93' could have been deferred in perpetuity. Some of those who sat at the ceremonial acclamation of that mandate last Tuesday at the State House Banquet Hall knew what they did to frustrate the somewhat 'heady' Abiola. Here, we speak of those who went behind his back to strike a deal with Abacha and worked to ensure that June 12 was finally dealt a fatal blow. Perhaps, one should ask: how did they feel when they heard Hafsat Abiola-Costello speak glowingly of the true love the father they never allowed her to enjoy had for the people of this country? Did they know that it was the same young graduate, Hafsat, who braved the odds many years back, asking the authorities to explain why her parents should come to such a tragic pass for daring to demand justice, fair play and equity for the people of this country? That same girl is now a full grown woman living with the 25-year anguish of being kept in the dark on why and how the state reached the agreement that her parents had to go for Nigeria to move on.

If it were that simple, Nigeria would have moved on since that cruel elimination of Abiola and every other person that opposed the perpetuation of military oligarchs in power. They just didn't want Abiola dead; they also wanted his memories wiped off like he never happened. But he did happen. Growing up in the suburb of Itire/Ijesha then, I remember vividly what Abiola Bookshop meant to us in different parts of the country. There was also Abiola Bakery, Concord Press and many other companies. Like Hafsat noted in her speech, MKO was one man who would rather die than allow anyone to shave his head in his absence. Even in those tortuous moments, he never forgot to lace his speeches with wisecracks that left many laughing through their pain. It was the Abiola personae that made June 12 a watershed. That election broke all barriers as Nigerians unanimously returned a Muslim/Muslim ticket to the consternation of the treacherous few who now gloat in the dark. And no one can ever forget the patriotism and strong sense of duty displayed by Prof. Humphrey Nwosu who stood firm in spite of intimidation from the military. He could have buckled under pressure. But he never did. That is why he is really an unsung hero of that once dark part of our history.

To understand what Abiola stood for, you would have to listen to Hafsat's testimonial at the event. Hear her: 'In many ways, the events that transpired later revealed to Nigerians the eloquence in his heart; the fidelity of his commitment and even his own deep abiding wish that, if there was anyway his own actions would in any way compromise the people of Nigeria, MKO preferred to die. He preferred to leave the earth rather than compromise on you, on your integrity as a people and your sovereignty as a nation.' And didn't Abiola live those eternal words of his daughter to the last? Wasn't he the reason why, when Nigeria began yet another journey of democratic experiment, the entire nation agreed that the South West must solely field presidential candidates? Did the winner of that election, his kinsman, recognise Abiola's sacrifices throughout his eight year on that seat? Did he even acknowledge the significance of June 12 in our national history?

When Prof. Wole Soyinka harped on the need to establish a hall of shame for those who betrayed the mandate, I assume quite a number of people in that hall would shift uncomfortably in their chairs. When Hafsat said it was quite ironic that a Buhari would be the one to posthumously honour her father, the import of that couldn't have been lost to those who understood that Abiola, like every one of us, had his shortcomings. One of these was the fact that he sponsored the palace coup that ousted Buhari and foisted Babangida on the nation-the same Babangida that looked the other way when a simple sip of tea killed the dream of a nation and threw us into turmoil. How would we have been able to heal the wounds if Buhari had not summoned the courage to right the wrongs?

Politics or not, Buhari made a huge difference in saying the five-letter word-sorry. But for sheer ego, that apology could have been made many years back. We cheapen the conversation when we criticize Buhari for trying to make huge political capital out of that gesture. Who wouldn't anyway? Yet, we do know that June 12 is more than that. Knowing the mindset of the living heroes of that particular event, it was ennobling some of them exploited the occasion to lecture Buhari on the fine ethos of democracy and why he must address the imbalance in the land.

June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

Though a soothing balm was rubbed on the festering wounds of many years from both sides of the divide, those who spoke were not shy of telling truth to power no matter how unpalatable. That was why Soyinka tasked Buhari on the limits of his somewhat fecund loyalty to Abacha, the tormentor-in-chief of Abiola and all loyalists of his mandate. That was why Hafsat reminded him that the best way to truly honour the memory of her father is to make Nigeria a place where the over 200 million population are in full control of the levers of governance instead of the current situation where few landlords oppress the majority and dare them to go take a dive into a fiery furnace. That was why Iyorchia Ayu demanded for his full understanding of how democracy works, asking him to develop an almost inelastic tolerance for the opposition. And, if we must rub it in, that was why those who couldn't take the knocks for their treacherous past excused themselves from the occasion when June 12 became a reality-the day MKO's inimitable message that 'the hand of the giver is always on top' toppled the evil machinations of his 'friend' and bruised the ego of a 'kinsman' who never saw MKO as the true symbol of the democracy that heralded him into power from the prison!

Well, June 12 is now Democracy Day. We can only hope that those that connived to kill the dream would come up, one day, to answer the hanging question: who killed Abiola? Without this, we can't have a closure. We just can't.

Load-Date: June 17, 2019

---

End of Document

June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

The Nation (Nigeria)

June 15, 2019 Saturday

Copyright 2019 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1648 words

Body

---

FOR 25 agonising years, the June 12 imbroglio was a never-ending soap opera until President MuhammaduBuhari decided to bring it to a deserving conclusion on Tuesday, June 12, 2018. At least, we all got the chance to exhale, regardless of how we may feel about the politics of the well-deserved presidential recognition bestowed on the real symbol of the undying narrative of an abducted hope on June 12, 1993-the late BashorunMoshoodKasimawoOlawaleAbiola. Even in these times, not many people would stand up to be counted like he did when it mattered most. Of course, in matters like this, it is difficult to rule out the usual devious sellouts who, after dancing on the grave of Abiola, also became beneficiaries of that supreme sacrifice. Pitifully, that is part of the story. But, when the chips are down, we do know those who truly stood up to be counted either dead or alive. And let's not get it wrong like the warped illogic spewed by a serving senator on the floor of the Senate some days back. These exceptional men and women were Nigerians-the true heroes of the democracy that many now enjoy with spasms of arrogance tailored to their padded shoulders.

For those who witnessed the tragic impulses that unfolded before them in those days, there couldn't have been a better way of celebrating Abiola's triumph than the significant olive branch President MuhammaduBuhari waved to all parties on the 25th anniversary of Nigeria's freest and fairest election which was annulled by the military junta under the leadership of now-retired General Ibrahim BadamasiBabangida. The Babangida years would be remembered for three things-his Structural Adjustment Programme which impoverished the middle class; the gruesome letter bomb murder of that iconic journalist, Dele Giwa; and, the shameful role he played in the abortion of the June 12 mandate freely given to his bosom friend and arguably Africa's richest man at that time, Abiola. No one is keen to remember MAMSER, DFRRI, Option A4 and numerous great initiatives of the IBB era that the anti-people annulment eclipsed so firmly. Those who lived through that period couldn't have forgotten the deadly games and murderous proclivities of the military boys from the moment Babangida announced his decision to annul the election to the short-lived Interim National Government of Ernest Shonekan/General SaniAbacha to when the dark-goggled one completely seized the rein of power, tossing off Shonekan and his band of pretenders so casually with less effort than someone swatting a fly.

Ask Babangida today what pushed him into that betrayal of trust and he would mumble some mumbo-jumbo incoherent statement that makes no sense other than blaming it on the military hierarchy which, he said that he, as Commander in Chief, was powerless to control - the same tendentious excuse that he has tendered over the years to dribble everybody. Well, he ended up dribbling himself to infamy with that rude joke. And so, it was not surprising that he didn't turn up that Tuesday in Aso Rock when Abiola, GaniFawehinmi and others had their day in the sun. How could he? Aside the ghosts of all the martyrs of the June 12, 1993 mandate haunting him, we cannot easily forget the many lives that were lost in the protests, including those who met their untimely deaths whilst running from the crisis-ridden South-West when the Abacha goons used protesters to perfect their shooting capacity. At the height of the June 12 struggle, notable voices were killed in their homes including Pa Rewane and Mrs. Kudirat Abiola who was mauled down on the streets of Lagos for daring to insist on the release of her husband. Till today, Abiola's death in the hand of the state is still shrouded in official secrecy. He was silenced, betrayed by those he thought he knew too well to distrust.

June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

If not for Buhari, 'Hope 93' could have been deferred in perpetuity. Some of those who sat at the ceremonial acclamation of that mandate last Tuesday at the State House Banquet Hall knew what they did to frustrate the somewhat 'heady' Abiola. Here, we speak of those who went behind his back to strike a deal with Abacha and worked to ensure that June 12 was finally dealt a fatal blow. Perhaps, one should ask: how did they feel when they heard Hafsat Abiola-Costello speak glowingly of the true love the father they never allowed her to enjoy had for the people of this country? Did they know that it was the same young graduate, Hafsat, who braved the odds many years back, asking the authorities to explain why her parents should come to such a tragic pass for daring to demand justice, fair play and equity for the people of this country? That same girl is now a full grown woman living with the 25-year anguish of being kept in the dark on why and how the state reached the agreement that her parents had to go for Nigeria to move on.

If it were that simple, Nigeria would have moved on since that cruel elimination of Abiola and every other person that opposed the perpetuation of military oligarchs in power. They just didn't want Abiola dead; they also wanted his memories wiped off like he never happened. But he did happen. Growing up in the suburb of Itire/Ijesha then, I remember vividly what Abiola Bookshop meant to us in different parts of the country. There was also Abiola Bakery, Concord Press and many other companies. Like Hafsat noted in her speech, MKO was one man who would rather die than allow anyone to shave his head in his absence. Even in those tortuous moments, he never forgot to lace his speeches with wisecracks that left many laughing through their pain. It was the Abiola personae that made June 12 a watershed. That election broke all barriers as Nigerians unanimously returned a Muslim/Muslim ticket to the consternation of the treacherous few who now gloat in the dark. And no one can ever forget the patriotism and strong sense of duty displayed by Prof. Humphrey Nwosu who stood firm in spite of intimidation from the military. He could have buckled under pressure. But he never did. That is why he is really an unsung hero of that once dark part of our history.

To understand what Abiola stood for, you would have to listen to Hafsat's testimonial at the event. Hear her: 'In many ways, the events that transpired later revealed to Nigerians the eloquence in his heart; the fidelity of his commitment and even his own deep abiding wish that, if there was anyway his own actions would in any way compromise the people of Nigeria, MKO preferred to die. He preferred to leave the earth rather than compromise on you, on your integrity as a people and your sovereignty as a nation.' And didn't Abiola live those eternal words of his daughter to the last? Wasn't he the reason why, when Nigeria began yet another journey of democratic experiment, the entire nation agreed that the South West must solely field presidential candidates? Did the winner of that election, his kinsman, recognise Abiola's sacrifices throughout his eight year on that seat? Did he even acknowledge the significance of June 12 in our national history?

When Prof. Wole Soyinka harped on the need to establish a hall of shame for those who betrayed the mandate, I assume quite a number of people in that hall would shift uncomfortably in their chairs. When Hafsat said it was quite ironic that a Buhari would be the one to posthumously honour her father, the import of that couldn't have been lost to those who understood that Abiola, like every one of us, had his shortcomings. One of these was the fact that he sponsored the palace coup that ousted Buhari and foisted Babangida on the nation-the same Babangida that looked the other way when a simple sip of tea killed the dream of a nation and threw us into turmoil. How would we have been able to heal the wounds if Buhari had not summoned the courage to right the wrongs?

Politics or not, Buhari made a huge difference in saying the five-letter word-sorry. But for sheer ego, that apology could have been made many years back. We cheapen the conversation when we criticize Buhari for trying to make huge political capital out of that gesture. Who wouldn't anyway? Yet, we do know that June 12 is more than that. Knowing the mindset of the living heroes of that particular event, it was ennobling some of them exploited the occasion to lecture Buhari on the fine ethos of democracy and why he must address the imbalance in the land.

June 12: Flashbacks and current realities

Though a soothing balm was rubbed on the festering wounds of many years from both sides of the divide, those who spoke were not shy of telling truth to power no matter how unpalatable. That was why Soyinka tasked Buhari on the limits of his somewhat fecund loyalty to Abacha, the tormentor-in-chief of Abiola and all loyalists of his mandate. That was why Hafsat reminded him that the best way to truly honour the memory of her father is to make Nigeria a place where the over 200 million population are in full control of the levers of governance instead of the current situation where few landlords oppress the majority and dare them to go take a dive into a fiery furnace. That was why IyorchiaAyu demanded for his full understanding of how democracy works, asking him to develop an almost inelastic tolerance for the opposition. And, if we must rub it in, that was why those who couldn't take the knocks for their treacherous past excused themselves from the occasion when June 12 became a reality-the day MKO's inimitable message that 'the hand of the giver is always on top' toppled the evil machinations of his 'friend' and bruised the ego of a 'kinsman' who never saw MKO as the true symbol of the democracy that heralded him into power from the prison!

Well, June 12 is now Democracy Day. We can only hope that those that connived to kill the dream would come up, one day, to answer the hanging question: who killed Abiola? Without this, we can't have a closure. We just can't.

Load-Date: June 15, 2019

---

End of Document

I Was a Security Guard Before I Became a Lawyer, SAN

This Day (Lagos)

May 17, 2014

Copyright 2014 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1882 words

Body

---

Sent out of the hostel for a term with a 30-day suspension from school, he cut the figure of a troublemaker. But, rather than making troubles, he seemed to be bullied by life; he failed to meet the cut-off mark to be able to read Mass Communication. For seven months, he worked as a security man at Archbishop Vining Memorial Church in Ikeja. For each month, he earned a measly N195 for a seven-day a week job. But, the security post offered him solace. From there he gained admission to read Law. From a budding journalist, he became a brilliant lawyer and a Senior Advocate of Nigeria, SAN. "Don't just get mad; get a lawyer!" says a sticker: Daniel Omotilewa might just be your best bet. In this down-memory-lane interview with Adedayo Adejobi, Omotilewa shares his melodramatic episode as a fired up school journalist, his sudden decision to study Law and his second thoughts about marriage and hard work

Everything seemed to be working out perfectly for him as a budding journalist. It was his passion; nothing and no one could convince him otherwise. Almost, this enthusiastic fan of Newswatch -particularly its editor-in-chief back then -felt his career was fixed with the fourth estate. So, why isn't he a journalist today? He looked at me with somewhat satisfying look, adjusted on his chair and cleared his throat before responding.

"Becoming a Lawyer was an eleventh-hour decision. All I wanted to be initially was a journalist. I must say the Newswatch of Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu, Dan Agbese and Yakubu Mohammed influenced me a lot. Even as a student, I was always doing everything possible to read Newswatch. Just like Dr. Tai Solarin wrote, after the death of Dele Giwa by parcel bomb, that it is the deed of courage that gives birth to men of courage. It was the death of Dele Giwa that more than anything fired my determination to become a journalist in those formative years of my life. You cannot interact with me for two weeks without knowing my passion for Newswatch and journalism. In fact, months after the death of Dele Giwa, a lot of my old school mates were still consoling me as if Dele Giwa was my biological brother.

"It was not a surprise when I got to Federal School of Art and Science Ondo, in 1986, I embraced the only press society in the school. It was called News and Current Affairs Society (NECAS), and towards the end of my first year in the school, I became the Editor of the society. Otunba Olapeju (Malam), the present Principal of Kings College, who was one of my literature teachers was the patron of the society. Kayode Akinmade (Yellow man) the present Commissioner for Information in Ondo, handed over the mantle of editorship to me. However, when Yellow man was handing over to me, I never knew he was handing over to me trouble. I mean real trouble. In our small school community then at Federal School of Art and Science, Ondo, I was introduced to the glamour and also the hazards of being a journalist. Few weeks after I became the editor, there was a serious demonstration in the school -an act the school authority believed was instigated by some inciting articles we published. The buck stopped on my table and I was sent out of the hostel with some of my colleagues for a term and also penalised through a 30-working day suspension from the school. My brother who trained me will possibly know about this information for the first time, if he should read the interview." Having missed his dream career, he did not give up. Well-groomed and clean-shaven, Daniel narrated how he transcended the low points of his life before becoming a Lawyer. "In 1988, I passed out of Federal School of Arts and Science with 9 points which was not enough to secure direct entry admission for me at Mass Communication Department of University of Lagos. I think the cut-off mark for direct entry that year was 11 points. Therefore, while waiting for the next academic /admission period, I picked up the only job available for me then which was to work as a day security man at Archbishop Vining Memorial Church, GRA, Ikeja.

I Was a Security Guard Before I Became a Lawyer, SAN

The only difference in our type of security then was that we were not wearing uniforms. As a day security/gateman, I worked from 6am to 6pm because the night guards must hand over to me in the morning while I have to hand over to them in the evening. This was in 1989 and I did that for seven months on a monthly salary of N195." Adjusting his glasses, he explained how he coped with a N195-salary. "People like us blend easily to situations around us. I am a great admirer of Dr. Tai Solarin. In fact, I have read his autobiography cover to cover more than six times. I have read in that book titled "To Mother With Love, An Experiment in Autobiography" how he picked up a job as a cleaner in a hospital in London after completing his Master's Degree. In fact, Dr. Tai Solarin was doing this work until an invitation came from Nigeria that he should come and assume the headship as Principal of Molusi College in Ijebu Igbo." With the Dr. Tai Solarin kind of influence on his life, surprisingly the lawyer doesn't seem to fully follow through the acts, practices and observances of the late teacher and atheist. He described himself in this light: "I am not an atheist. I am a Christian, but I must confess that his thoughts have greatly influenced the way I practiced my religion. Humanity is one, irrespective of our religious persuasions. Jawaharlal Nehru; the first Prime Minister of India was also a man I greatly admired. These two great souls are humanist par excellence. Therefore, I am a Christian, but with a heavy dose of humanism. My belief is that, the way you relate with that man beside your house, in your office, in the bus with you, in your village may just be a way of interfacing with God. Or even that young girl or boy working as a house-help in your home may just be the interface you need with God".

Why did he choose to pursue Law? "I never pursued law but law pursued me. As stated earlier, when I was working in that church as a security man, I was able to reflect greatly. It was a job that confined me to an environment for an average of 12 hours daily, 7 days of the week. So there was much time to reflect and even read. At this period I sat for an External GCE A/L and I had an A in Government which boosted my chance of direct entry admission for any of the high-flying courses such as Mass communication and Law. Therefore, it was at the eleventh hour of completing my admission form and after a deep reflection that the idea of Law dropped into my mind. The whole idea then was that 'why don't you do something that can make you self-employed?' And to the glory of God, I have only worked as a salary earner for six months since I was called to bar in December 15, 1993. It might interest you that I formed my company Daniel Omotilewa & Co., since my National Youth Service days. This 100% U-turn from Journalism to Law is the reason why I said it was law that pursued me. Today, virtually everything about me is law. My wife is a lawyer, my father-in-law is a lawyer, my first child is in Ife reading law and some of my best friends today are lawyers.". For the law profession to have caught up with and overtaken him for over twenty-one years he shared the jabs of his role models in the profession. "First and foremost, I admire late Chief Gani Fawehinmi. I did my law school chamber attachment with him. He was indeed a great soul, a humanist and a dogged fighter, a highly principled and hard-working individual. I redeployed from Enugu to Lagos during my National Youth Service with high hope that I will have a space in his chamber which never materialized." Omotilewa added that "Chief Afe Babalola is another individual who has made a great impression in my heart". What did he learn from the legal luminary? "He taught me civil litigation when I returned to University of Ibadan in 2002 for a Master's degree in Law. Here is a man who will be in classroom by 7am on a Saturday morning waiting for us students. He is a workaholic and a giver. I was further humbled when I read his autobiography where I saw a man with such a low background rising to become a big force in law profession and in this country as a whole." The third individual under his focus is Chief Wole Olanipekun. "I have been inspired by every bit of information I have picked on him. I think his industry, advocacy and tenacity of purpose should be studied by every young individual aspiring for the top."

It's not all about Law with this expressive man. You can ask him a question like "how did he meet his wife?" without being sued. Hear him: "What a question! Well, my nephew's wife visited me in my office one day in company of my wife-to-be. She was already a lawyer practising in a chamber on Lagos Island. Being a lawyer naturally elicited discussion between us and before you could say Jack Robinson, she became my wife. She has been a blessing unto my life and I could not have wished for a better one." With a friendly, warm and jovial disposition, it's all too easy to pigeon-hole Daniel Omotilewa as gregarious. "I will not consider myself a social person. I do not belong to any club. I do not go to parties neither do I drink alcohol. I might qualify as a teetotaller. I enjoy watching animal channels with my family and also having a solitary walk." For a man with a humble but impressive background he shared the secrets behind what has sustained him this far: "determination to succeed and the power of relationship. I cherish every relationship and I always endeavour not to abuse any. It is a decimal point in all my prayer every morning, to be a blessing unto others. This has worked for me in return as various people have been a blessing unto me. Do unto others what you expect them to do unto you. A good chunk of my clients today were at one time or the other at the other side of the table facing me." Looking back at his life from a position of knowledge gathered, experience and resolve to be a better man till death, the lawyer would like to do certain things differently. "Possibly marry earlier and secondly, to work a little harder. You will never know the level of your capacity until you are really challenged. Having the opportunity to start afresh, I will possibly want to be a total litigation lawyer or become a Professor of law," Omotilewa revealed.

I Was a Security Guard Before I Became a Lawyer, SAN

Well, he never became a professor of law. But, he does have a perspective on law practice. "Law is a science that is evolving by the day. Therefore, a practitioner must be dynamic too. I have been involved in the acquisition of a ship in the past. When the brief came, I had never done anything involving shipping or maritime law. I picked up books on it and I spoke to experienced colleagues on it and to the glory of God, the deal was successful." And his word for those going into law practice? "Be focused; have integrity. Believe in yourself; embrace great souls to mentor you. And above all, work, work and work. The onion, pepper, tomatoes, etc., you have in your house will never become soup no matter how hard you pray. You have to work on them before you can start having the aroma of a soup in your house. Jesus said my father work and I work. Therefore, for anyone to climb the ladder of real success, he must be ready to work."

Load-Date: May 19, 2014

---

End of Document

NGE Mourns Slain Journalist

Vanguard (Lagos)

April 29, 2010 Thursday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 300 words

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

The Nigerian Guild of Editors, NGE, grieves over the unconscionable murder of another journalist, Mr. Edo Ugbagwu, a Judicial reporter of The Nation newspapers. The NGE commiserates with his family and colleagues at The Nation newspapers as he is buried this weekend in Oturkpo in Benue State.

A statement by the President of NGE, Mr Gbenga Adefaye said: "NGE sees this murder as one too many, coming after the unresolved murder of Godwin Agbroko of ThisDay newspapers, Bayo Ohu of The Guardian newspapers, Abayomi Ogundei of ThisDay newspapers and others in recent times. The catalogue is frightening and the NGE wails: who benefits from the murder of journalists?

"It is a pathetic commentary on our regard for the sanctity of human lives that since the October 19, 2006 letter-bomb killing of Mr. Dele Giwa, the first Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine, many journalists like Bagauda Kalto, Omololu Falobi, formerly of The Punch, Tunde Oladepo of The Guardian have had their lives wasted while the security agencies have proved incapable of resolving the killings.

"Every time a citizen, particularly a journalist is murdered and the security agencies act helplessly, the faith in the ability of the Nigerian state to protect its own is undermined.

"Whenever a journalist is killed, debate is muffled, free speech is trampled on the ground and the nation dives into the cavé, into a state of fear and dances away from decency and civilisation.

"The death of Mr Edo Ugagwu, however, calls for a review of strategy by the press: to go beyond expression of outrage. We must share valuable information and collaborate in our own peculiar ways to fish out murderers of pressmen who are obviously out to intimidate all of us away from the path of freedom. It is a campaign that the media must undertake."

Load-Date: April 29, 2010

Understanding Hazards of The Country's Journalism [analysis]

Daily Independent (Lagos)

May 3, 2010 Monday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1054 words

Byline: Ekene Okoro

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

If there is any profession in Nigeria that has witnessed incidence of murder cases in the last 25 years, Journalism would stand out. In recent times, men of the pen profession have had to contend with hazards associated with the job especially in beats involving investigative reporting.

However, more worrisome is the spate of rising cases of high profile killings of journalists in the country with not less than nine killed in the last 25 years. The profession has lost notable journalists including Dele Giwa, founding Editor-in-chief of Newswatch magazine Bagauda Kaltho of The News Magazine, Bayo Olu of The Guardian, Godwin Agboroko, Abayomi Ogundeleji, both of THISDAY Newspapers and most recently Edo Ugbagwu, of The Nation Newspapers, Nathan Dabak and Gyang Bwede both in Jos Plateau State.

No doubt, the spate of killing of their members has sent dangerous signals to journalists across the country. This was one of the reasons the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) chose to use this year's World Press Freedom Day on Monday to stage a peaceful protest rally in Lagos to convey their feelings on the spate of killing of their members. Taking off at exactly 10am, hundreds of obviously aggrieved journalists all dressed in black outfits chanting solidarity songs and carrying placards some of which read 'IG, Please Save our Soul, "Stop the Killing of Journalists', Who killed these Journalists: Bagauda Kaltho, Dele Giwa, Bayo Olu, Edo Ugbagwu, Agboroko Godwin, Abayomi Ogundeleji', Justice Delayed is Justice Denied', amongst others marched from the Ladi Lawal Press Centre Alausa Ikeja to Newswatch Magazine, Oregun then moved to the Lagos State Headquarters of the Nigeria Police, Ikeja and then ended the rally at the Marina residence of the State Governor, Babatunde Fashola.

National President of the Union, Mohammed Garba who led top executives of National Association of Women Journalist(NAWOJ) and news editors of national dailies in the rally across the Lagos Metropolis told Daily Independent that the rally was mainly to show their condemnation and register their displeasure on the killings of their members and also present a 'Protest letter over murder of Journalists' to the Inspector General of Police, Ogonna Onovo as well as send a 'Save Our Soul' message to the Acting President of Nigeria, Dr. Goodluck Jonathan to immediate beef up the security in the country to forestall further killings of journalists in the country. According to Garba, despite the killings, no culprits have been brought to book, noting that the dastardly act not only dents the image of Nigeria, but also puts Nigeria on the top of the list of nations in the cases of abuse of press freedom in West Africa. "We embarked on this protest rally today being the World Press Freedom Day because we are disturbed, unhappy and worried about the situation of media killings in Nigeria. Going by the history of killings of journalists' right from Dele Giwa, we are worried because our security agencies are yet to unravel the brains behind this dastardly act several years after the sad occurrences and we chose Lagos because majority of the cases occurred here. Journalists in Nigeria are no longer safe and we want to use this medium to day to send our message to Governor Fashola, Commissioner of Police Marvel Akpoyibo because we know that these killings are a deliberate ploy to prevent us from performing our duties", he said. Adding his voice, News Editor of the Daily Independent Newspapers, Habib Aruna lamented the hostile manner journalists have been subjected to in the country adding that the government has not helped the situation.

Understanding Hazards of The Country's Journalism [analysis]

"We are in a society that does not like what we are doing; a society in is darkness and we represent the civilized world. We are the light and unfortunately, they do not want light", he said, adding "the government is not responsive. We are here to show our commitment and demand to know who killed our colleagues. Killing them would not stop us, we would continue the struggle". Aruna also called on the federal government to ensure security of lives of journalists and the freedom to perform their function as the watchdog of the society, adding "Thomas Jefferson once said, if the press is free, everything would be free". Former Lagos chairman of the union, Dele Odeyemi who also spoke added his voice to the protest, saying that the killings would only spur journalists to continue to expose corruption and negative vices in the polity and in the Nigerian system. Former National Secretary of the Union, Jola Ogunlusi in his speech called for the establishment of state police, expressing optimism that it would help in unraveling the killers.

"This is a call to the Acting President to strengthen the police and make them proactive. If these killings were to be in America or Britain, an effective investigation would have been called to unravel the killers", he said. Deputy Lagos State Commissioner of Police, Solomon Aranse who spoke on behalf of Akpoyibo expressed concern over the spate of killings of journalists, stressing that already, the police have commenced full scale investigations into the assassinations of Edo Ugbagwu. Aranse who also received the two-page letter to Onovo said "We would do everything humanly possible, we are out to ensure that these spate of killings stop", adding that the police are currently working with some journalists to fish out the killers of some of the slain journalists. Fashola on his part condemned the rising killing of journalists in the country saying it portends grave danger to the nation's democracy. He said "there is urgent need to regulate telephone Serial Identification Module (SIM) cards procured for proper identification".He added that government at all levels should be prepared to spend resources in building forensic labs as a way of getting evidence against the perpetrators of heinous crimes. Fashola while promising to hand over the letter to the Acting President said, "Every time the life of a person is lost in the state, it diminishes me as a governor. We need to increase the capacity of our security agencies in protecting lives and property as well as bursting crimes. "No amount of money is too much to invest in security. I sincerely empathise with you on the loss of your colleagues and families", he said.

Load-Date: May 5, 2010

---

End of Document

Makinde, Adeolu Akande, Ogunwuyi, Fatia Buhari, Others Make 2021 Oyo 100 Most Influential List

Daily Independent (Nigeria)

February 5, 2022 Saturday

Copyright 2022 Daily Independent. Provided by Syndigate Media Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 819 words

Byline: Raji Adebayo

Body

---

IBADAN – Oyo State Governor Seyi Makinde and 99 others were the recipients of the 2021 Oyo State 100 Most Influential Personalities and Brands.

Some of the other prominent persons on the list are Chairman Nigeria Communication Commission (NCC), Professor Adeolu Akande, Senator Representing Oyo North Senatorial District, Senator Fatai Buhari, Oyo State Chief of Staff, Honourable Segun Ogunwuyi, CEO Valencia School, Morakinyo Goodness, CEO Stone Café, Asiawaju Segun Olalere.

This was revealed during a grand event held by the popular online medium platform, IbadanMedia.com, where Crème de la crème in and outside the State were hosted to the 5th edition of the annual Most Influential Personalities & Brands in Oyo State.

The event, which was a 3-in-1 was held at Manhattan Hall, Cruzer lounge place, Jericho, Ibadan, where Shakiru Adebayo, CEO Apex Fabric International was enthroned as the "2021 Oyo State Man of the Year", after winning the keen contest competition with 13,143 votes, defeating Chief Omoniyi Obiyinka, CEO Extention Publication, who emerged as the 1st runner-up with 11,715 votes, and Prof. Adeolu Akande, Chairman Nigeria Communication Commission (NCC), ended up as the 2nd runner-up with just 22votes.

Also, in the youth category, Olamide Ojo-Philips, CEO Saphyr Events was also crowned as the "King of Boys" after winning the "Youth of the Year" contest with 38,211 votes, defeating Tolu Oluwo, CEO Trogworld, who emerged as the 1st runner-up with 31,149 votes, and Ademola Ajibola, the CEO of MAYA Awards, who gotten 16,432 votes as the 2nd runner-up.

The Oyo State Commissioner for Youth & Sports, Asiawaju Seun Fakorede, while delivering a goodwill message he congratulated the convener, Mr. Olalekan Olanrewaju Ola, the CEO of Ibadan Media Ltd.

Makinde, Adeolu Akande, Ogunwuyi, Fatia Buhari, Others Make 2021 Oyo 100 Most Influential List

In his message, the commissioner who was represented by a director at the event wished the convener a successful outing.

According to him, "brother, I don't know how I managed to miss your messages here. Our darling Club, Shooting Stars (3SC) has her match against MFM FC today in Lagos. I hope to be back in town early so I could make your event. Well done, and I wish you a great outing, Sir!" Seun Fakorede noted.

The Chief Press Secretary to the State Governor, Mr. Taiwo Adisa also sent his goodwill message and reasons why he was absent at the event, saying "as much as I would have loved to be with you, I'm away on a state's assignment, hoping to finish on time so I could join, but nevertheless, I wish Ibadanmedia a successful event".

The Osun State Commissioner for Youth & Sports, Hon. Yemi Lawal in his address lauded the initiative and counted it a privilege to be invited to grace the prestigious event.

"I was also listed as one of most influential personalities in the year 2018 edition of this award, and I think this was due to my company's (GQ Lounge) positive impact in Oyo State", Lawal noted.

While delivering a welcome speech, the convener and CEO of Ibadan Media Ltd, Mr. Olalekan Olanrewaju OLA, appreciated the state government who sees value in the event that started in the year 2017 and key into the vision by endorsing it in year 2021.

According to him, "I want to appreciate the Oyo State government who sees value in our event and endorsed it. This has been a true motivation and encouragement to keep the fire burning. The event is meant to appreciate & celebrate the change agents behind the new Oyo State, those who are adding values to the community, human life, the developmental project, by contributing to the IGR and growth of our darling State.

"There are 10 categories in total, ranging from Politics & Governance, Entrepreneur, Innovators, Tech, Journalist/Broadcasters, Entertainment, NGO/Orphanage Homes, New Media, Sports, and Brands, which are also divided into Education, Finance, Media, Fashion, Food & Restaurants, and Others."

Speaking at the event, the project coordinator, Amb. Ayo George, said he counted it a privilege to be appointed by Ibadan Media CEO to work together on this project.

According to him, he has always believed in the project, as Olanrewaju is supposed to have had the Man & Youth of the Year since the early year 2021.

"Ola is my good brother, I believe so much in his vision, especially the Man & Youth of the Year project, and I keep encouraging him that the project has good prospects. Thank God I am also on the project and we can all see what this young guy has been able to put together". Ayo George noted.

The event had in attendance top personalities in Oyo State, Top comedians like Ayo Ajewole, popularly known as Woli Agba and Dele Omo Woli, Dr. Smile Comedian, Media personalities like Mayor Isaac Brown from Fresh105.9FM, Dare Adekanmbi from Nigerian Tribune, Tunde Olawuwo and Ronke Giwa-Onafuwa, from Splash105.5, Mrs. Ishola from AIT Television & crew, BCOS Director of Current Affairs, Mr. Goke Adelakun, & the crew members, Impact Africa Television crew, and others.

Load-Date: February 7, 2022

War against everybody

Business Day

June 9, 2021 Wednesday

Copyright 2021 Business Day All Rights Reserved

Length: 3019 words

Body

---

The Buhari regime like NEPA, had no friends. They came to power proclaiming themselves friends of the people.

They had come, so they assured an unsuspecting populace to save them from the suffocating embrace of the politicians. But a few weeks after the duo of Muhammadu Buhari and Tunde Idiagbon marched triumphantly into Dodan Barracks, the seat of government, Nigerians were already asking themselves; "With friends like these, who needs enemies?" The self-styled off-shoot government of the decisive Muhammed/Obasanjo regime did not move fast to make it appear as if it deliberately wanted to estrange itself from the society.

This its top men did with an unparalleled arrogance and unnecessary combativeness, a mindless witch-hunting and needless antagonism against all sections of the populace. It was like a death wish.

The government's hostile attitude was so suffocating that it was commonplace for Idiagbon to appear on the television network and in his usual aggressive manner pronounce: You are warned to abide by ." When he was not warning people, he was threatening to "deal ruthlessly" with anyone who dared disagree.

On one occasion when Idiagbon smiled, it made headline news. It was that bad.

There had not been any government in the history of Nigeria that had so blatantly disregarded public opinion as did the Buhari regime. The ousted head of state's standard reply whenever a slight pressure built up on any particular issue was we cannot be rushed.

" The country was run as a personal fiefdom, an apparatus to use in settling personal scores.The first indication of this came when he granted his first interview to the local press.

When Dele Giwa, Ray Ekpu and Yakubu Mohammed, then with the Concord asked what his government's attitude to the press would be. Buhari went into a fit of anger.

"I will surely tamper with press freedom." he said, almost shouting.

War against everybody

His reason was that he was embarrassed with the allegedly missing N2.8 billion oil money reports which broke after he left the government of Obasanjo as Commissioner for Petroleum in 1979. And that was how the infamous decree number four which stipulated a jail term for a journalist who published an embarrassing report about a public Official, even if it was true, came into being. Read Also: What a Netflix Documentary Taught me About Buhari's War on Everybody Even in anticipation of the official promulgation of the decree, it was already being put into use when four months into its tenure, the government ordered the arrest and detention of Tunde Thompson and Nduka Irabor, both reporters of The Guardian.

The government was piqued because of a minor report concerning ambassadorial postings. Shortly after, the decree was published and a special tribunal chaired by Olalere Ayinde was set up to try the two reporters.

Despite a massive outpouring of public demonstrations, including pleas from traditional rulers and some of Buhari's former bosses, both journalists were tried and convicted, they were arrested on April 4 and jailed on June 4 under Decree 4, the alienation of the press and the public had set in. Harassment of journalist did not stop there.

Almost every month in their first year, one newspaper editor or another was detained for the slightest excuse. Duro Onabule, editor of National Concord was arrested and detained at least thrice.

Once for two weeks; Haroun Adamu editorial adviser of The Punch, a man Buhari had personal animosity against was detained until the government was toppled last week. also kept in jail till the end came for Buhari government was Rufai Ibrahim ex-editor of The Guardian (Sunday) for writing an open letter to Balarabe Musa, the former radical governor of Kaduna state who was impeached by a conservative opposition in 1980. In the same boat were Hamza, editor Of Amana, the Hausa language newspaper of the Concord group, Leke Salawu of the Triumph, and only one month ago, Bukar Zarma, editor of New Nigerian and Aliyu Babatunde Ahmed, editor of Sunday New Nigerian.

The deposed government tried other means to cripple the press as well. There are deliberate policy to starve newspapers of raw materials, especially newsprint.

This was done through ridiculously low import license allocation and extremely high import duties. It was so bad at one point that many newspapers retrenched staff and cut their print run and reduced pagination to eight.

The government also imported newsprint through the Nigerian Newsprint manufacturing company at Oku Iboku, Itu, for sale to newspapers. The government was still not satisfied.

It unearthed a dormant directive restricting federal government advertisement placement to the Daily Times and the New Nigerian. Buhari's press secretary, who has also now lost his job later explained in the government's usual bland manner that the "revenue-saving measure" was temporary.

" Till the dying days of his government. Buhari continued to threaten the press, especially the privately owned ones, with closure if the press went through its worst period ever, including the sentencing to jail of journalists for the first time, labour had a worse experience.

The leadership of the Nigerian Labour Congress (NLC) was completely emasculated so much that the NLC president Ali Chiroma became redundant and irrelevant. There was a sustained effort at embarrassing the union leaders.

Only recently, when he visited Allison Madueke, Anambra state governor until last week, Chiroma was subjected to an undignifying body search. The impotence of the labour leadership led to the disgraceful booing of NLC officials and then labour, Minister, Solomon Omojokun on May Day, workers day of celebration.

This year Omojokun represented Buhari who considered it below his dignity to attend the celebration, if only as a token of concern following the most massive retrenchment of workers in Nigeria's history. As Chiroma got up to read his address, a pall fell over the gathering of several thousand workers who responded to the speech with a rumbling boo.

War against everybody

Omojokun received the same treatment. In a touching side action, a little boy of about six displayed a placard that read; "please give my daddy a job.

"The Buhari government, which had promised to clear a backlog of unpaid salaries on coming to power, did not fulfil this promise, instead, the situation became worse leading some states to engage in rationing salaries. A notable example was the "Imo formula," which the Imo state government devised to pay workers "whatever money we have in hand.

" Niger state copied the "formula" in the final months. Any kind of organised labour or pressure group was treated with high-handedness.

The Airline Pilots and Flight Engineers Association (APFEAN) fell early in 1984. The association was banned when pilots of Nigerian Airways, the national carrier, embarked on a strike over conditions of service and lack of safety facilities, including radars and instruments landing system (ILS) at the nation's airports. The pilots were fired.

After a new employment screening was carried out, 14 of the pilots were dismissed. The government did its best to discourage other employers from giving them jobs.

The doctors were to follow the pilots later. In September 1984, after months of warning, the Nigerian Medical Association (NMA) decided to hold the Buhari regime to its promise.

When Brigadier Sanni Abacha announced the change of government in December 1983 he gave the deplorable state of medicare as one of the major reasons for the take-over. After waiting nine months and nothing was forthcoming, the NMA called its members out on strike reminding the government of Abacha's statement on the coup date that the nation's hospital had become mere consulting clinics.

Out of character, the government called a truce and a stop-gap quickly ferried in N4 million worth of drugs and medicaments through the UNICEF, the crisis came to a temporary end. Five months later in February this year, the health sector continued to suffer terribly from government inactions.

Virtually everything was in short supply, from dressings to potable water for hospitals. So the doctors went on strike again, after putting the government on notice.

But this time Buhari replied with a big stick. The NMA was banned, and its leaders, including the president Edmundson Thompson-Akpabio and the first vice-president, Beko Ransome-Kuti, were packed off into detention.

Before some of them were picked up, their families were harassed, and Akpabio's children were detained for a few days. Other leaders of the doctors' association, like Boniface Oyo-Adeniran, Wole Atoyebe, and Ayo Falope fled through bush paths to Britain and the United States to escape the terror of what was becoming a fascist regime.

Last week, President Babangida maintained in a broadcast that hospitals still remained "mere consulting clinics." The country's intelligentsia, like other sections of the society, was hounded into submission.

University lecturers were barred from talking to foreign media. Facilities in higher institutions were also stopped from being used for "subversive activities", a catch-phrase of Idiagbon meaning lectures, symposia, and student rallies and meetings.

The opposition to academia was so much that Idiagbon identified campus "subversive elements", including a college rag at the University of Ife called Cobra, The newsletter was actually a gossip periodical that published materials similar to those found in Lagos Weekend. Many lecturers especially officials of the Academic Staff Union of Universities (ASUU), were randomly picked up and detained.

Among those dumped behind bars were Tunde Fatunde, then secretary of ASUU in the University of Benin, and an activist at the University of Ibadan, Ola Oni. To further cow the academic community, the government directed that lecturers should be retrenched, and the process was in full gear at the Ahmadu Bello University (ABU), Ibadan, Lagos, and Nsukka Universities.

War against everybody

University students had an especially raw deal. Following the introduction of higher feeding and accommodation fees in early 1984, the National Association of Nigerian Students (NANS) entered into negotiations with Yerima Abdullahi, then Minister of Education.

When the talks appeared bogged down, the government, true to type, promptly declared that it no longer recognised the association it had been negotiating with and warned students to behave or face its usual punishment and detention. The students soon embarked on a nationwide boycott of lectures, which was broken when the universities were closed down and the students sent home.

On many occasions, student leaders were arrested and detained, including the president of the "unrecognised" NANS, Lanre Arogundade. Two months ago, when some student leaders from the universities met in Port Harcourt in the night, police were waiting for them.

They broke up the meeting and arrested some who were later released when the students threatened to go on demonstrations. The Ife University student leader, in a classical Gestapo style, was lured to a post office where he was arrested.

The Buhari government managed to stir up some trouble on religion as well. It cut a traditional two-day Christian Easter holiday to one, but back-pedalled after protests from the Christian Council of Churches.

When it decided to import rams for the Muslim Id-el-Kabir festival, Christians were quick to remind the government to import turkey for Christians. Meanwhile, the fundamentalist Maitasine Islamic sect continued to kill people mindlessly, and the government seemed incapable, despite assurances to the contrary, of controlling the riots.

Even traditional rulers, who were described by Buhari as "highways to national unity", felt the regime's iron fist. Two of the foremost traditional rulers, the Ooni of Ife and Emir of Kano were punished for paying a private visit to Israel "without official permission".

The two "highways of national unity" were stripped of official functions and restricted to their respective domains for six months. Another aspect of Buhari's war against everybody was one which wrought disaster in virtually every home in the land.

The first was the mass retrenchment of workers, for which the government declared that it would not make amends even if someone were unjustly sent into the throes of unemployment. In addition, nobody could challenge his retrenchment in court, by force of the decree.

Last May, the NLC said unemployed people had passed the one million mark. Simultaneous with the retrenchments, all the state governments embarked on an orgy of demolition of market stalls and homes in the name of environmental sanitation.

Millions of petty businesses were ruined, and millions of people left heartbroken. There were many families in which every member was unemployed: the husband retrenched, the wife's stall demolished, and the school leaver kid unable to get a job.

For the houses bulldozed, especially in Lagos, the government later found that many of them might have been wrongly wiped out. Solution: a government promised to set up a probe panel to look into grievances and that was the end of the matter.

And then there were the levies slapped on the poverty-stricken from just about every direction. There were levies in most states of the federation for development, education, radio set, television set, and involuntary donations.

Two weeks ago in Bendel State, the governor, Jerry Useni not reputed for finesse in handling state matters, ordered that "environmental sanitation levies" be collected from travellers passing through Bendel during the Muslim Id-el-Kabir festival. Those who could not pay had to pass through another state to their destinations.

War against everybody

The indiscriminate levies elicited a bitter sarcasm from Stanley Macebuh, Executive Editor of The Guardian. "Call Me Levy", he admonished in an article.

The environmental sanitation programme was sometimes carried to unreasonable extents. Many of the states closed offices at noon or shortly after so that all civil servants could spend three or four hours extra to clear refuse dumps and clean the road and drains.

Motorist in Oyo state for instance were usually forced to cart away the rubbish in their car booths. The target of all the effort; a N1 million prize promised by the sacked federal government for the cleanest state in Nigeria.

School fees were reintroduced in certain parts of the country which hitherto enjoyed free education, much to the chagrin but helplessness of the people. It was worst in Oyo state, where primary school fees were introduced for the first time in 30 years.

While the government floundered, it engaged in frivolities, Ondo state found time to erase Obafemi Awolowo's name from the signboard of the state university. Detention without trials was not restricted to politicians and journalists alone.

Schoolteacher Tai Solarin was detained for more than a year before his release last month. So also was Sule Katagum, former chairman of the Civil Service Commission (CSC), their offences were that they made pronouncements that were not sweet to Buhari's or Idiagbon's ears.

The execution of drug pushers against the overwhelming objection of the society was a clear instance of the government's refusal to listen to the populace. It was a regime that refused to change its mind even if it made mistakes so that it would appear tough.

The stubbornness provoked an exasperated Wole Soyinka, the Buhari government's most persistent critic into a kind of discomfiting resignation. "I don't talk to deaf people", he said.

It was a surprise to many people that he was not detained until the regime fell. Perceived double standards in the handling of issues were also a major source of disillusionment.

There was the case of Alhaji Abubakar Alhaji, former permanent secretary in the federal ministry of finance. He lost thousands of pounds of his personal money to Austrian-thieves while on an official trip abroad.

He could not explain how he came about such money since civil servants are not allowed by law to keep foreign accounts. The uproar did not move the Buhari administration, which merely reposted Abubakar to the ministry of national planning, with a Nigerian National Petroleum Corporation (NNPC) board membership to the bargain.

Both Melford Okilo and Sam Mbakwe, former governors of Rivers and Imo States respectively were jailed for the same offence, Abubakar Alhaji is still in government. The 53 suitcases issue also generated heated debate.

During the currency exchange exercise in April and May last year, tight controls were clamped on the airports and other inlets. Anybody found carrying the old currency was arrested and detained.

But a retired ambassador and an emir brought in 53 suitcases during the period, and the luggage was forcibly cleared without being checked in full view of everyone at the Murtala Muhammed Airway in Lagos. The soldier who threw his weight around was Major Jokolo, Buhari's aide-de-camp.

The government has not been able to explain it away satisfactorily. And it haunted the government forever.

These and other blunders drove wedges between different sections of the community, and the divisions inevitably led to impassioned calls for confederation, occasioned, perhaps, by a sense of alienation felt by certain sections of the country. The government was getting jittery, and its ad-hoc solution, true to character, was to ban all debates on the political future of Nigeria, any newspaper which published such debates, warned by the Buhari regime, would be closed down.

War against everybody

And so the stalemate continued. You can force the horse to the pond, but you cannot force it to drink.

The society drifted farther and farther away from the rulership, and the government inevitably could not get anything done. Instead of a war against poverty, corruption, and illiteracy, the Buhari administration waged a war against the people of Nigeria, and discredited the armed forces in the process, making President Babangida's first task that of putting an end to the war on everybody.

This article, culled from Newswatch, was first published on 9 September 1985

Load-Date: June 9, 2021

---

End of Document

The SSS Provocateur and Ken Saro-Wiwa (II) [opinion]

Vanguard (Lagos)

October 18, 2011 Tuesday

Copyright 2011 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 844 words

Body

---

THE news spread in our cell and beyond. We wept and mourned, and pointed accusing fingers at the blood-thirsty dictator Abacha for killing Ake. November is not good for me. Fare thee well, November.

November, the month I hate, is here again. I am just reminded. It was a Nigerian, Lagos-based journalist and friend who I had courted during those days of military gangsterism in the country, who drew my attention to a report in The Daily Trust, an Abuja-based national newspaper of October 5, 2011, which was written by Hope Abah, the Bayelsa State reporter of the paper.

The newspaper ran the story conspiratorially: "Why Saro-Wiwa was Hanged-Bayelsa SSS Boss". According to the report: "The late Ken Saro-Wiwa was hanged because he had concluded plans to cede the Niger Delta region from the rest of the federation and to create a separate country of his own, Bayelsa State Director of State Security Services, SSS, Andrew Iyayi, has said.

"The SSS director made the revelation yesterday (October 4, 2011) while delivering a lecture at this year's Bayelsa Nigerian Union Journalists, NUJ's, press week held at the council hall in Yenogoa.

Iyayi disclosed that the late Saro-Wiwa and eight others had acquired a standing army, designed a national flag, a national anthem and other security items that were to be handed over to the United Kingdom for a declaration of a federal state".

Other online news outfit like The Bayelsa State News Online, The Nigerian Mail Online, Naija News and Events Online reproduced The Daily Trust report.

November is here again, and we should expect more of such fabrication and untruth. I am not related to the late Saro-Wiwa in any way. What I do for him (defending) I also do for others who don't have a voice like him. I don't do it for a fee. I do it because I have a good conscience. We are in a world where twist, treachery and fraud hold sway. In my several articles I have dealt with those allegations against Ken Saro-Wiwa such as killing his elder brothers (Ogoni Four), raising army to breakaway and other lies against him.

Read "Saro-Wiwa: In Memoriam", The Guardian on Sunday, November 14, 1999; "That Agaba Dance on Saro-Wiwa's Grave", The Guardian Sunday, November 30, 2003, page 17; "A Saro-Wiwian Nightmare?" The Guardian Sunday, February 8, 2004, page 51; "Ken Saro-Wiwa's Mother: A Tribute", Ogoni Star, February 14-27, 2003, Page 10; "Anatomy of Terrorism in the Delta", The Niger Delta Channel magazine June, 2001 issue, page 39;

The SSS Provocateur and Ken Saro-Wiwa (II) [opinion]

"The Silence of The Irish Farmers", The Midweek Telegraph, August 31-September 6, 2005; "The Come Back of Professor Ibrahim Gambari", The Midweek Telegraph June 11-17, 2008; "Kogbara and The Anti-Saro-Wiwa Scheme", The Guardian on Sunday, July 12, 2009; "Fawehimi: End of An Essential Episode", The Guardian, Wednesday, September 9, 2009, page 51; "Foreword To Okuntimo's Book on Saro-Wiwa's Ogoni", Sahara Reporters, New York, USA, February 4, 2010; "Keen for Journalist Chris Ikunze", The Midweek Telegraph, February, 2009; and "Saro-Wiwa and Daminabo' Book", The National Network, January 30, -February 5, 2006, page 7.

I have read that thrilling espionage novel, The Spy Who Came In From The Cold (1963) written by John Le Carre. The name, John Le Carre is a pseudonym name of David John Moore Corewell, a former senior spy for M15 and M16, both British intelligence networks. I read that classic novel not because of its subject matter, its characters and style charmed me. Andrew Iyayi is not John Le Carre's spy who came in from the cold, but the spy who came in from the sea. I pity this country. This is how top undercover agents and security chiefs cook up stories and reports, to mislead us.

The SSS which was founded on June 5, 1986 by the Babangida's dictatorship following it's reformation of the National Security Organisation, NSO, its thematic responsibility should have been domestic policing, peace and security, the SSS operates like Frederick Forsyth's The Dogs of War (1974).

The Dogs of War is another espionage fiction that interests me a lot. SSS chief and operatives are enmeshed completely in the seemingly unending corruption, endemic to the Nigerian systems and state. The SSS is an apparatus of political repression, blackmail and instability. Poor Dele Giwa, one of those who inspired me to be a journalist, that son of very impoverished parents of Edo State origin, who rose to prominence through hard work, commitment and passion for his heavy barrel of pen would have been alive today.

Then deputy Director of SSS, Colonel A.K. Togun and Colonel Halilu Akilu, director of military Intelligence had lied like the Bayelsa spy master that the harmless, handsome and brilliant Dele Giwa, was planning a revolution and was smuggling into Nigeria arms, to prosecute it. On October 19, 1986, Giwa was bombed.

Iyayi should support his accusations with facts, and not to flutter his tongue hysterically on Saro-Wiwa. I was a round character in that Saro-Wiwa/Ogoni tragedy. I was not a spectator.

PATRICK NAAGBANTON , a journalist, wrote from Port Harcourt, Rivers State.

Load-Date: October 18, 2011

Gani: Ten Years On, Still The Finest

PM News

September 5, 2019 Thursday

Copyright 2019 Independent Communications Network Limited. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2298 words

Body

---

By Akeem Soboyede Ten painful years after his demise from a very unexpected source (lung cancer, for a man who never smoked a day in his life) Chief Abdul-Ganiyu Oyesola Fawehinmi continues to stride the Nigerian political, legal and humanitarian landscape like a colossus. The Shakespearean analogy is certainly not misplaced.

No one else comes to mind when the phrase "Senior Advocate of the Masses" is uttered, mostly in tones of admiration and gratitude. The latter sentiments were clearly earned.

Gani, on his part, proudly wore that unofficial honorific for countless deeds of selflessness that endeared him to the masses of Nigerians, but which equally brought him isolation and shunning from the powers-that-be, whose arrogant feathers he relentlessly and justifiably ruffled, even trampled upon. Even 10 years after his death, no other Nigerian, living or dead, can fittingly lay claim to the title "The People's Lawyer", even though that epithet or title was not originally invested on the great Gani when he was alive.

Till his very mourned demise a decade ago, on September 5, 2009, Gani Fawehinmi proved to be more than an enigma wrapped in a riddle to the succession of governments in Nigeria, civilian and military, that laid waste (and continues to do so) to her common wealth, under the guise of serving its perpetually-impoorer masses. Many years after Gani commenced his admirable and courageous campaign against the scourge, and ten years after his own passing, the tragedy that is public governance in Nigeria continues to traverse its vast landscape.

It is still the case that appointments or elections into public office in Nigeria is largely a call to "come and chop" at the public till and which often provides an opportunity for the just-appointed "soon-to-be-chopper" to pen an effusive piece recognizing the efforts of his /her "mentors" actual and chimeric in making the "auspicious occasion" possible. Not to mention the sprinkling of such words as "integrity" into such pieces, which only elicit smirks of derision in readers who know better.

The man who literally fought a succession of corrupt and blood-thirsty military governments in Nigeria to a standstill will certainly not accept the notion that the different civilian governments that have been produced in Nigeria since May 1999, as a direct result of his titanic struggles (anyone still remember how Gani, without the guns, tanks and even aircraft that Babangida controlled, literally brought the latter to his knees using the "mere" instrumentality of the courts, of course over the issue of the state-sponsored murder of journalist Dele Giwa) have been a commendable outgrowth of his vision of a Nigeria governed by "leaders" dedicated less to their own pocket-books and pleasurable pursuits and more to actually lifting the overwhelming masses of Nigerians out of grinding poverty, mass unemployment and continuing infrastructural decay at all levels, to mention only a few. Against this backdrop, and ten years after Gani's painful death, one chooses to dwell at this time on what can be considered certain "legacy" issues that arose and still subsist after Gani's demise, including events precipitated by the firebrand Senior Advocate of the Masses (SAM) himself.

Gani: Ten Years On, Still The Finest

Everyone already knows that while he was alive, Gani was that very rare member of Nigeria's elite class who used the law and courts to fight the excesses of the same members of that class (military and civilian), many of whom bled the country dry while claiming to serve her best interests. Former military heads of state Ibrahim Babangida and the late Sani Abacha were in the highest (or governing) echelons of that elite class when they unleashed a total of 13 years of mis-governance on Nigerians during that time, Gani Fawehinmi was about the only consistent voice within the elite, privileged class (and a "bloody civilian" to boot) who offered consistent criticism of and took concrete action against the actions and activities of the respective juntas.

Most others were latter-day converts to Gani's noble cause, only choosing to rise against the excesses of that particular military dictator after Babangida unleashed his eternal injustice of the June 12 annulment on Nigerians. In fact, a great number of the civilian elite like Gani (especially the politicians who fervently participated in the various "political transition programmes" the likes of Babangida and Abacha foisted with cunning glee on Nigerians) derided the prescient lawyer's consistent and wise counsel that Babangida, especially, was unveiling and forcing through a hidden agenda that would only lead the country to doom.

Almost none of the journeyman-politicians then listened (including those from that era still active in the present Nigerian Fourth Republic and have since transformed themselves to "kingmakers" and "soon-to-be-kings", especially in Gani's home region of Nigeria's southwest), until Babangida unleashed his "nuclear option" of the June 12 annulment, which then transformed those same politicians into latter-day "pro-democracy activists", most without the "integrity" to which they now scrupulously and laughingly lay claim. Many of these same "pro-democracy" politicians have since assumed plum positions in successive governments (beginning with Olusegun Obasanjo's in 2001) that have characterized Nigeria's Fourth Republic.

Most disheartening, of course, have been the "any-dogma-goes" politicians (some of whom I personally know) that had no use for Gani's crusading against Sani Abacha's transition programme between 1993 and 1998, and who participated lustily in the dictator's "political transition programme" during that time. These politicians with no known dogma (not to mention "integrity") have held or hold plum positions at the state and federal levels in Nigeria, courtesy of certain emergency and latter-day "kingmakers" and "soon-to-be-kings", who also only became "pro-democracy" activists after events and circumstances exposed them as minions who lacked Gani's vision and commendable prescience.

These same characters, failing to ride certain military dictators' "political transition programmes" to the great personal power and wealth that constitute their only objective as politicians, later invested themselves with the toga of "pro-democracy activists" to achieve those same goals, benefitting, of course, from the onerous struggle distinguished and selfless personalities like Gani Fawehinmi started and sustained. Everyone knows that Gani Fawehinmi warned for many years about the chicanery of Babangida's programmed-to-be-unending "political transition programme".

Many of those who only jumped on the ensuing "June 12" train to become "pro-democracy activists", including a substantial number of the prominent politicians in Nigeria's present political dispensation especially in the Southwest clearly evince a certain animosity against the superior political and philosophical legacy that is Gani Fawehinmi's (remember, Gani also founded and ran a political party that went nowhere fast in the cesspool of Nigeria's political space). That animosity is (and should) be as evident as ever, more than a decade after Gani's passing.

Those this writer chooses to call the "Babangida and Abacha politicians" who now rule the roost among Nigeria's present political class (as "kingmakers", "soon-to-be-kings", Commissioners, Ministers, etc.) obviously rue the fact that they were not smart enough to see nor predict the political train-wrecks those democracy projects midwifed by military dictators were destined to become especially Babangida's -but are now the bloated beneficiaries (as supposed "pro-democracy activists") sucking the polity dry.

Gani: Ten Years On, Still The Finest

It is this writer's belief that far from honouring Gani for this reason, those who benefitted from his struggle of constant opposition to dictators with absolute power that sought to rule in perpetuity, have consciously downplayed what should be a much-celebrated Gani Fawehinmi legacy within the Nigerian political space and polity, especially in the southwest. Certain reasons have, of course, been advanced for this, the primary one being that Gani, with the imperative to appear consistent in his beliefs (which he always was, thank God) "needlessly rubbished" a certain "pro-democracy activist" of a past clime (now "kingmaker" and also a supposed "soon-to-be-king") who had, well, a certain certificate problem in his chaotic past.

That, of course, hardly explains the conduct of spineless men (many of whom I once viewed as professional media colleagues superiors in Nigeria, unfortunately) who kept their pens dry when duty called on them to pen profuse eulogies in Gani's honour in the immediate aftermath of the latter's passing in September 2009. I watched then, with mouth agape, as supposed professional journalists who have since dipped larcenous fingers in the public jar of public administration in Nigeria (especially in the southwest and specifically in Lagos state) chose to "honor" Gani's passing with improbable silence, even though reporting on Gani's various battles on behalf of the oppressed had probably helped much to keep many of their media houses profitable and in business while that lasted many years earlier! This pitiful legacy of deliberate inaction or failure to celebrate a much-deserved legacy, spurred by supposed "political loyalty" to a present and continuing source of political largesse and favours (otherwise known as "eye service") is certainly not one Gani's life of struggle on behalf of others deserved. While alive, as the verifiable stories go, Gani awarded scholarships to indigent students, most of whom he never knew.

He also sponsored others on holy pilgrimages, even though it is said he never made the trip to the Muslim Holy Lands himself while he was alive. All these, too, while Gani tried to make a living as a lawyer in an environment dominated by murderous military dictators who never succeeded in intimidating the fire-brand lawyer that the dictators "rewarded" with numerous and prolonged stints in jails and detention centers, for standing consistently on the side of the masses.

All these also while Gani somehow managed to make enormous contributions to the development of Nigeria's legal jurisprudence, including single-handedly developing and sustaining its Law Reports segment. Gani did make a good living as a Nigerian lawyer who practiced in the most unfriendly landscape available during his most productive years, dominated as it were by various military dictators.

That, to this writer, should be considered one of Gani's momentous achievements none of the "eye-popping" assets mentioned in the lawyer's publicized will was tainted by any spell Gani spent in any public office or similar capacity, at any level of government in Nigeria. Even more impressive, Gani made it his unflinching duty to serve as an unofficial watchdog that policed the excesses of the corrupt military governments that ruled Nigeria while he was alive, including those who served in such governments.

This self-chosen essentially foreclosed any chance of Gani securing "contracts" or similar "largesse of the state while those governments lasted. In fact, while Gani was still alive, one of his perpetual nemeses, the dictator Ibrahim Babangida, revealed during an interview that Gani was the only known and very public critic of his government that he was aware of that did not criticize him during the day then sought favours from him or members of his government at night! That, to this writer, is the greatest compliment anyone ever paid to Gani, especially since it came from a most unexpected source.

It should also serve as a lesson to certain, er, persons in the Nigerian polity who apparently believe the impressive real estate and liquid assets Gani attained in his lifetime (as evidenced by his Will that was made public) can only be acquired through serving perpetually and corruptly in successive official capacities in Nigeria as Commissioner, head of a parastatal, Secretary to the State government and then again as Commissioner (never mind the apparent downgrade, especially if the new posting as Commissioner is a "plum" Ministry the person once headed, with the go-around appointment being made after publicly throwing under the bus the person one served as SSG!), etc. "Oga"! (specifically, the Yoruba exclamation for "incredible").

Gani: Ten Years On, Still The Finest

The above scenario, one out of many, certainly explains why certain misguided and rapacious individuals (including so-called media professionals tainted by covert exposure to political actors while they served in that former role) who ought to celebrate Gani's impressive and ground-breaking legacies in the arenas of civil and personal rights and jurisprudence in Nigeria, choose instead to turn their backs on such. They clearly do this in order to protect their supposed good graces in the eyes of "king-makers" orand "soon-to-be-kings" who ensure their perpetual access to public office in Nigeria, and the riches and privileges that apparently flow from such.

These privileges, nowadays, also apparently include revolving and musical-chair access to plum government positions for father and son, mother and daughter, uncle and nephewniece, and other such generational and perpetual combinations! The present crop of political actors in Nigeria (especially those with backgrounds in the irrepressible Nigerian media) have certainly not been worthy successorsor plauditsof Gani Fawehinmi's legacies. But the latter will clearly endure.

Certainly, more than 10 years after his regrettable departure, Gani remains the finest among us all. -Soboyede, a former Editor with Nigeria's THISDAY Newspapers, is an attorney in the United States.

Load-Date: September 5, 2019

---

End of Document

ANA commend Buhari on June 12, Abiola

The Nation (Nigeria)

June 12, 2018 Tuesday

Copyright 2018 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 434 words

Body

---

The Association of Nigerian Authors (ANA), Lagos Chapter has commended the posthumously national honours conferred Chief Moshood Kashimawo Abiola (MKO), that late human rights activist, Chief Ganiu Okikiola Fawehinmi (SAN) and Babagana Kingibe.

While noting that the annulment of the June 12 Presidential election, won by Chief Moshood Kashimawo Abiola (MKO) under the then Social Democratic Party (SDP) in 1993, which was adjudged the freest in the history of Nigeria, was of great impediment to national unity and peace within the polity, it described the move of President Muhammed Buhari in resuscitating of the issues of June 12 and efforts to right the wrongs of the era as a step in the right direction.

'The announcement of June 12 as the new democracy day as against May 29 is courageous and symbolic of empathy with an average Nigerian who have lost faith in the nation's leadership particularly, at the centre, as well as in our electoral system since the annulment of the June 12 election in 1993 by IBB and the eventual murder of the symbol of the epoch-making electoral exercise.

'We recall, with nostalgia, the philanthropic gestures and display of love for education and the arts, and we regret the absence of Chief Abiola, especially as the Association of Nigerian Authors (ANA), Lagos Chapter, prepares to host an international convention, after over 30 years, in October.

'We can imagine the kind of support ANA, Lagos, could have received from the late chief, Concord Group of Newspaper and Concord Airline, among his inheritances which were scuttled and destroyed by the military government of General Sanni Abacha, apart from the dear Kudirat Abiola which was equally wasted in the struggle to recover the mandate from the military.

The group, in a statement in a release signed by the Chairman, Publicity Sub-Committee, ANA 2018 International Convention, Feyi-Abiodun Samson Oyeniyi, also called for the Investigation of the mysterious murder of late Dele Giwa, a renowned journalist and Funsho Williams, while recalling the courage displayed by Prof Humphrey Nwosu and Prof Atairu Jega during the 1993 and 2015 elections.

'Furthermore, we urge the federal government to remember to honour, in whichever befitting ways, several others, who though, were part of the fights to install this presently evolving democracy, who may not be as prominent as Chief M.K.O Abiola, Gani Fawehinmi, Prof Wole Soyinka, Asiwaju Bola Tinubu, Femi Falana, among others, but whose efforts cannot be discarded as they were ingredients for the realisation of a done dream for a democratic nation,' it stated.

ANA commend Buhari on June 12, Abiola

Load-Date: June 13, 2018

---

End of Document

Babangida: The Prince At 78

Nigerian Tribune

August 18, 2019 Sunday

Copyright 2019 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 2193 words

Body

---

ONE of Nigeria's arguably most impactful rulers, Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida, was 87 years old yesterday. Combatant Officer of the Nigerian Army who joined the force in 1962, IBB, the acronym he became known by while he was Nigerian military Head of State, will go down in history as about Nigeria's most audacious user of governmental power. Lethal to those who stood in his way, one of the qualities he possessed at the highest cusp of his rule which even his adversaries acknowledged was his ambivalent disposition. He had the ability to stand at both ends of the hill and emit fire from his nostrils like a dragon. His off-the-cuff execution of his childhood friend, Mamman Vatsa, in spite of global supplications to him, mirrors this.

Babangida participated actively in virtually all the military coups that Nigeria has ever had. In 1966, while a lieutenant colonel with the 1st Reconnaissance Squadron, he was said to have sided with the dissident army corps that forcefully retrieved power from the hands of General Aguiyi Ironsi and sent the huge-statured officer to his untimely grave. In 1975, young Ibrahim was a key participant in the coup that ousted General Yakubu Gowon and, six months later in 1976, after the assassination of Murtala Muhammed, Babangida audaciously walked into the premises of soldier marksmen-strewn Radio Nigeria to test the potency of that persuasive power of his with the ring leader of the coup and one of his best friends, Lt. Colonel Buka Suka Dimka. Babangida had walked into the Radio station to persuade Dimka to abandon his moribund venture of seizing power. He had been sent by General Theophilus Danjuma with the charge to level the premises of the radio station if Dimka failed to bulge. Rather than deploy force however, Babangida chose persuasion.

'The coup has failed,' he reportedly told Dimka. 'You have to surrender.' Miffed by IBB's audacity, Dimka was said to have threatened to shoot him. Flashing that seemingly harmless gap-tooth smile of his, Babangida allegedly told Dimka that he was all right with being killed by his best friend, the sybaritic Dimka. 'At least, my wife and children will not suffer under your watch,' he had reportedly told Dimka who in turn melted and asked for amnesty from the new government wherein Babangida would ostensibly play a key role.

With permission to go and discuss the amnesty request from Dimka, IBB reportedly got back to Danjuma who, angered by his audacious request, had thundered, 'I didn't ask you to negotiate!' By the time IBB got back to Radio Nigeria, Dimka was said to have escaped. He was only caught in Abakaliki, current Ebonyi State, while escaping out of Nigeria. Though the coup failed, Babangida earned laurels of gallantry in the hearts of chroniclers of Nigeria's military history. The coup was to be the graveyard of several fine officers of the army like civil war hero, General Iliya Bisalla who, till today, has a major road named after him in Enugu's GRA, in appreciation of his efforts.

Babangida: The Prince At 78

From his enrolment at the Nigerian Military Training College (NMTC) in Kaduna on December 10, 1962, monitors of his meteoric manifestations knew that young Ibrahim would have a consequential alliance with power. Enrolled with officers like Muhammed Magoro, Garba Duba and Ibrahim Sauda, Babangida's imperishable footsteps are more in the annals of the history of his romance with power than they were with his military chosen career. Towering high among the core of officers who seized power from President Shehu Shagari in 1983, IBB was said to have suggested Buhari, among the coup plotter triumvirate, as one to rule the country. He was subsequently displeased that Buhari, just three months his senior in the army, would allow his deputy, Brigadier General Tunde Idiagbon, a junior officer to the coup triumvirate, ride roughshod over those of them who sacrificed their lives to get Buhari to be Head of State. IBB was said to have been slated for retirement over his impudence at having walked up to the C-in-C one day to remind the Head of State that the man he recently retired from service was a beneficiary of the triumvirate. IBB struck months after to save own neck and rescue the said beneficiary from the vice grips of the C-in-C. Upon IBB's ascendancy as military president, his hijack of power evoked smiles on the faces of Nigerians, even though they were later to regret his rule.

Babangida had a very lethal hold on power that sent shivers down the spines of those who attempted to test his resolve. His walked the path of Niccolo Machiavelli. Machiavellianism, a political treatise of Niccolo, 16th-century Italian diplomat and political theorist, has gained scholarly examination as a cruel, blood-cuddling method of power usage where the triad weapons of persuasion, manipulation and deception, rather than raw, crude brunt, are deployed as the weaponry of power. Psychologists claim that Machiavellianism also possesses personality traits of narcissism and psychopathy.

Babangida heavily deployed these tropes in his usage of power. In his The Prince, Machiavelli propounded a cruel path for his faithful in power to tread. This is epitomized in one of his teachings, to wit, 'If an injury is to be done to a man, it should be so severe that the prince is not in fear of revenge.' In abidance with this code, Babangida traded many irrecoverable tackles against his adversaries from which they never recovered until they sank into their graves.

At the height of office in the 1990s, he had told interviewers who marveled at his eclectic disposition to power that he was fascinated by the rulership traits of Zulu war hero, Chaka and Hannibal. The latter was a war General and statesman from Ancient Carthage widely held to be one of the greatest military commanders in history. A common thread that runs through both Generals is their maniacal and deadly power calculus, as well as their uncommon tactics and strategies in mowing down adversaries. Like Chaka and Hannibal, Babangida deployed hegemonic weapons of vinegar and juice in his dealings with friends and foes of his government. The juice resulted in the debasement of values that permeates Nigeria today.

But Babangida was not all brunt and bruises. With a disarming smile and an effeminate gap-tooth that masks the monster of power in his grips, it is doubtful if there was or is any Head of the Nigerian State in recent history who possesses IBB's kind of suavity, brilliance and even imperishable imprints in office. He was Janus reincarnate. While those who interfaced with him saw a very compassionate, humane and passionate character, Nigerians saw a very deadly and brutal leader who could sacrifice a city to rescue an armoury akin to the teaching of Machiavelli. He had a midas-touch which ensured that those who came across him didn't forget him in a hurry, either for good or bad.

Unlike what we have today, Babangida dialogued with the people consistently. He never took them for granted. As if acting out the script of The Prince, he ran a government that made the people vicariously take ownership of the most crucial but painful sacrifices they had to make. He pioneered a romance with theoreticians of socio-politics, a romance which produced brilliant policies of government like DIFFRI, MAMSER, Code of Conduct Bureau, People's Bank, mortgage bank, primary healthcare centers across the country. He created many agencies which today straddle our economic life. They are the Federal Environmental Protection Agency (FEPA) which he created in 1985 and the Oil Minerals Producing Area Development Commission, construction of the Third Mainland Bridge, construction of the Federal Capital Territory and universities of agriculture and technology across the country. He appointed world-class scholars and technocrats as his ministers like Olikoye Ransome-Kuti and created many states and local governments which, for good or bad, constitute the architecture of governance today. No leader in Nigeria's history has Babangida's reputation for deploying palliatives as a weapon for stemming the tides of dissent.

Babangida: The Prince At 78

For instance, he ran a government by referendum, even while implementing polices said to have been imposed by Bretton Woods. Before the austerity measure policy, for instance, IBB laid the policy by the table of Nigerians to discuss, making its ultimate implementation a fait accompli.

His Structural Adjustment Programme, (SAP) implemented in 1986, brought an unprecedented deregulation of the agricultural sector, abolition of marketing boards, massive privatization of public enterprises and devaluation of Naira. It brought unprecedeted pains to the people as well. IBB hired the best of Nigeria's brains resident in the academy and used them to surf a template of governance for Nigeria. In most of those experiences, theory failed governance and academics gathered a renowned notoriety as hollow propounders whose political economy remedies for redemption of the polity were at best Utopian. In spite of the high-fallutin policies, Nigerians were not better off economically and the ascendancy of bribery, corruption, cronyism and a rent-seeking economy which he instituted became the hub of Nigeria's socio-political malady. The country still battles it till today.

During his eight-year reign, Babangida's government left traces of blood which though are coagulated now, still stain his cocaine-white apparel. Prominent among this is the blood of journalist, Dele Giwa, parcel-bombed in a novelty murder unknown in the history of the macabre of government in Nigeria. The widely-circulated tale of Gloria Okon, said to be a drug courier and alleged to be acquainted with him, is yet unresolved. IBB was intolerant of dissent and had a dual response to it: cooption or evisceration.

It is a shame that, 26 years after he left government, no Nigerian leader has manifested IBB's brilliance, grasp of governance and the democratic credentials he possessed, even as a military despot. For instance, while we today battle to be told what ails our president, Babangida advertised his sickness before Nigerians almost 30 years ago and subsequently travelled to Germany for surgery. Radiculopathy, he claimed, was the surname of the infirmity. He also said he still had pellets lodged in his leg since the civil war. Nigerians collectively prayed for his quick recovery. After him, so-called leaders in a democracy have disdained disclosure, shawling their existential lot of infirmity from their constituents, as if by being president, they had automatically become German philosopher, Fredrich Nietzsche's Superman. While he took ill and was being ferreted to Saudi Arabia for treatment in 2009, I wrote a piece against President Umaru Yar'Adua which some people felt was callous. It was entitled Why we should neither fast nor pray for Yar'Adua. My argument was that, since he didn't disclose that he was sick, it would be foolhardy for Nigerians to pray for his recovery.

Babangida however further ruined what was left of his credentials by his failure to abide by democratic norm when he reneged on his promise to hand over power in 1993 and annulled the June 12, 1993 election. By the way they show us that, comparatively, Babangida was a hero, the crop of leaders after him has shown that his creed of benevolent dictatorship is what is needed in a democratic experiment of this sort. Not effeminate or pacifists.

One unique thing about Babangida is that he still has his 'boys' in all the nooks and crannies of Nigeria today, retired Generals themselves, who are ready to die for him. I doubt if the current C-in-C has such. It is sincerely hoped that IBB, apart from all that have been written about him, will personally document all the missing links in his eight-year government and almost three decades, post-office. Like the Awujale of Ijebuland said last week at the Ojude Oba festival, death doesn't haggle its day of strike. I digress: Since I read the biography of this great king - Awujale, I have come to reserve a space for him in my admiration. His standing up to Olusegun Obasanjo when he attempted to destroy Mike Adenuga caught my fascination. Nigeria cannot afford not to have IBB's personal recollections undocumented for posterity. By the way, there was this doctoral thesis, presented in 1997 to the department of Political Science, University of Ibadan, which dissected what it called IBB's neo-patrimonial rule, which we must encourage its author, Adeolu Akande, Professor of Political Science at Igbinedion University, Okada to get published. It theoretically documented IBB's rule.

About a year ago, pictures of Babangida's frail and apparently sickly frame appeared on the social media and some ostensibly naïve characters took their time to mock the Prince of the Niger. They should be told that sicknesses and death, Siamese twins of providence's sting of man, are analogous to a fitful downpour that is yet to subside which no one can claim to be immune from its anger. IBB is battling his own existential portion. We are or will all battle ours too. I raise a wine glass up to celebrate Nigeria's most controversial leader.

Load-Date: August 20, 2019

---

End of Document

NUJ Wants IG to Revisit Alleged Journalists' Killings in Lagos

Vanguard (Lagos)

March 9, 2012 Friday

Copyright 2012 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 306 words

Byline: Laja Thomas

Body

---

Lagos council of Nigeria Union of Journalists, NUJ, has called on the Acting Inspector General of Police, Alhaji Mohammed Abubakar, to revisit the cases of journalists killed in the state in the last few years.

Chairman of the council, Mr. Deji Elumoye , who made the plea in Lagos, at the public presentation of a book, The Journalist's Wife authored by Mrs.Ochuko Ohu, the widow of slain Assistant News Editor of The Guardian, Bayo Ohu, said apart from the killing of Mr. Dele Giwa, the pioneer Editor-in-Chief of Newswatch magazine through parcel bomb in Lagos on October 19, 1986, several other journalists had been killed in the course of carrying out their official duties

The slain journalists, according to him, include Godwin Agbroko, late Chairman , Editorial Board of ThisDay newspaper; Mr Sule Edo, Judicial Correspondent of The Nation; Abayomi Ogundeleji , member of the Editorial Board of ThisDay and Bayo Ohu.

Elumoye said since the assassination of the aforementioned journalists nothing positive had been done to unravel the killers of "these crops of seasoned journalists."

He called on the new IG to as a matter of urgency, re-open the cases of all these slain journalists, so that the cases will not be swept under the carpet

He said: "The new IG being a crack and seasoned police officer should prove his worth by calling for the files of all the slain journalists. Thank God at a particular time, he was Commissioner of Police in Lagos, so we believe with his recent elevation, he is now more in a position to ensure that justice was done in the case of these our late colleagues."

"It is our hope that the Police IG will assign these cases to tested detectives, who we also believe will get to the root of the murders, so that those who perpetrated the dastardly act would be brought to book no matter how late," he added.

Load-Date: March 9, 2012

NUJ Wants IG to Revisit Alleged Journalists' Killings in Lagos

---

End of Document

Akinnola Doles Out N.25 Million to Wives of Dead Journalists

Daily Champion (Lagos)

April 29, 2010 Thursday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 317 words

Byline: Mansur Oladunjoye

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

A journalist cum lawyer, Richard Akinnola Tuesday gave N250, 000 to the wives of five slain journalists.

The beneficiaries included: wife of the former photo editor of Vanguard Newspaper, Mrs. Grace Oyeleru; Mrs. Lydia Efenji whose husband died on April 14, 2009; Mrs. Tonia Ike Ekeje, also of AIT; Mrs. Adeyinka Dehinsilu of the Daily Times and Mrs. Ojenike Ohu whose, hubby The Guardian staff killed by unknown assassins .

Presenting N50, 000 to each of the beneficiaries on behalf of the Richard Akinnola Foundation at the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) Lagos State Council, Akinnola said the foundation initiated the widows' scheme after a thorough realisation that Nigeria Journalists have always been neglected to their own plight.

He said, "Last year, I started thinking about the conditions of our people; I felt something had to be done, especially to affect the lives of widows and children of slain Journalists positively," adding that the scheme shall soon be registered with Board of Trustees in place to attract the involvement of corporate bodies and public spirited individuals.

Akinnola regreted that the nation's Police have never unraveled the circumstance surrounding the killing of any journalist, from Dele Giwa, Godwin Agbroko, Bayo Ohu, Edo Sule-Ugbagwu, Abayomi Ogundehi to Efenji Efenji.

He urged journalists to prepare their will in expectation of the worst so that their loved ones will not be left to suffer, adding that it won't be out of place for NUJ to have insurance scheme.

"Allow your wives to know your investments and bank accounts so that if anything happens, those investments and accounts are not claimed by a non-family member; also ensure that your wives are made your next-kin in any transaction," he urged.

The Corporate Affairs manager, Daar Communication, Johnson Onime described Akinola's gesture as a worthy cause that deserved to be emulated by all and sundry.

Load-Date: April 29, 2010

Akinnola Doles Out N.25 Million to Wives of Dead Journalists

---

End of Document

PARCEL BOMB KILLS NIGERIAN JOURNALIST ACCUSED OF PLOTTING

The New York Times

October 20, 1986, Monday, Late City Final Edition

Copyright 1986 The New York Times Company

Section: Section B; Page 16, Column 4; Foreign Desk

Length: 362 words

Byline: Reuters

Dateline: LAGOS, Nigeria, Oct. 19

Body

---

A Nigerian journalist was killed today when a parcel bomb delivered to his home exploded.

The journalist, Dele Giwa, editor in chief of Newswatch magazine, died in a Lagos hospital shortly after the explosion.

Two other people in the room were slightly wounded, according to a Newswatch statement and Nigerian television.

Mr. Giwa, 39 years old, was summoned to the headquarters of Nigeria's State Security Service on Friday, according to a statement issued by his colleagues. They said he had been interrogated by a senior officer and accused of plotting a socialist revolution and of importing arms into Nigeria.

He denied the allegations and was allowed to go home.

Messenger Delivered Parcel

His colleagues at Newswatch, a weekly that Mr. Giwa co-founded in 1985, said a messenger had delivered the parcel to his home in Ikeja, a suburb of the Nigerian capital.

Mr. Giwa's son, Billy, 19, took it to his father, who was having breakfast in his study with Kayode Soyinka, Newswatch's London correspondent, the magazine said in a statement.

"As he opened the parcel, the bomb exploded, fatally wounding him and throwing Mr. Soyinka off his chair," Newswatch said. In its 18 months of publication, Newswatch has earned a reputation for hard-hitting reporting, with cover stories about corruption and other sensitive issues. Studied in the U.S. Mr. Giwa was born in Oyo state, in western Nigeria, and studied for several years in the United States, earning a degree in English and Latin at Brooklyn College.

He was trained as a journalist in the United States and worked as a news clerk for The New York Times. He returned home in 1979 and worked on two national newspapers.

PARCEL BOMB KILLS NIGERIAN JOURNALIST ACCUSED OF PLOTTING

In 1983, when he was editor of The Sunday Concord, he was detained for a week after the newspaper published what the police said was classified material. But a year later a high court ruled the detention unlawful and ordered Nigeria's police chief to pay Mr. Giwa compensation.

Nigeria is considered to have the freest and most diverse press in Africa, and the country's military leader, Gen. Ibrahim Babangida, has often said he is committed to respecting all human rights, including freedom of expression.

---

End of Document

Derek Ingram (1925-2018)

Nigerian Tribune

June 28, 2018 Thursday

Copyright 2018 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 1073 words

Body

---

Derek Ingram was a distinguished British journalist and editor known across the Commonwealth most especially for his incomparable knowledge of the association and perhaps most importantly for his love for journalism - development journalism especially. He died at his west London home, Sunday, 17 June, aged 93. Derek had moved through the ranks to become the deputy editor of the Daily Mail. After seventeen years at the Daily Mail, he resigned as deputy editor after a disagreement with the aristocratic chairman of the newspaper Viscount Rothermere.

Derek left the Mail to start the Gemini News Feature Service in 1967, which was devoted to the coverage of development stories, especially from around the Commonwealth and disseminated globally. Gemini became so popular in newsrooms across the Commonwealth and the developing world in general that its base in London became the starting point for several bobbling Commonwealth journalists just starting a career in London in those days either in journalism or as foreign correspondents. Such Commonwealth journalists like Cameron Duodu from Ghana, and Trevor McDonald, from Trinidad and Tobago, used the Gemini News Feature Service to launch themselves into mainstream media and journalism in the UK. As London Correspondent of the Concord Press of Nigeria, I made it possible for the Concord to subscribe to Gemini News Feature Service. The subscription was still ongoing until I left in October 1983.

When I arrived in the UK in August 1978 to represent the Sketch newspapers of Nigeria as London Correspondent, Derek helped me to settle down by introducing me to the everyday 12:30 press briefing at the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office in London, where the UK's view and position on key events happening around the world on the day were first made known to diplomatic and foreign correspondents by government officials. He introduced me to his close friend and colleague, the Canadian broadcaster, Patrick Keatley, who was then the Diplomatic Editor of the UK Guardian newspaper. It was through Derek and Patrick that I was introduced to the Chatham House. They recommended me for membership and I became a member of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. They also, with another ex-Guardian Education Editor, Richard Bourne, introduced me to the Round Table Moot - the editorial board of the Commonwealth Journal of International Affairs, membership of which I have retained for about 25 years now. Derek travelled extensively in Africa as a journalist and for the Commonwealth. He related on a first-name basis with most pre-independence African leaders and politicians. He was a frequent visitor to Obosi, a village in eastern Nigeria, where he would visit Chief Emeka Anyaoku, the Nigerian diplomat who later became Commonwealth Secretary-General. During Chief Anyaoku's tenure as S-G, Derek was given the responsibility of traveling around the Commonwealth to sound out opinions on how to rebrand, move the Commonwealth forward and make it more attractive, relevant, and effective especially in a post-apartheid and modern world.

Derek Ingram (1925-2018)

He was a most reliable repository of African and Commonwealth history and confidante to several Secretaries-General of the Commonwealth. Until old age caught up with him and he could no longer travel, he had attended almost all Commonwealth Heads of Government Summits - he attended 20 in all. Derek co-founded the Commonwealth Journalists Association (CJA) in 1978 with Patrick Keatley. He served as the pioneer President of the CJA from 1980 to 1990. His tenure as CJA president was remarkable for establishing the CJA in most countries of the Commonwealth and making sure that journalists across member-countries could rely on the CJA for support, especially in their incessant struggles against pressures on the press from dictators and that Commonwealth journalists received adequate training. When he left as CJA president, he handed over to a distinguished Nigerian editor Ray Ekpu. Derek became President Emeritus of the CJA after his retirement in 1990. Derek was also partly instrumental to the establishment of the Commonwealth Human Rights Initiative (CHRI). In a quiet but remarkable manner, he used both platforms of the CJA and CHRI to provide support for pro-democracy campaigners in Nigeria during the political crisis in the country in the mid-90s. He supported international opposition to both the Babangida and Abacha regimes that had trampled upon the democratic will of the Nigerian people by the annulment of the result of the June 12, 1993, general elections, which had been adjudged to be the freest, fairest and most credible in Nigeria's history.

Throughout the period Abacha remained in power in Nigeria, and despite the fact that a Nigerian had been elected and was now his successor as CJA president, Derek, and the CJA refused to take the international conference of the association to Nigeria, in order not to be seen to be providing credibility and recognition to the brutal Abacha regime, which had led to Nigeria's expulsion from the Commonwealth over the extrajudicial murder of the Ogoni rights activist Ken Saro Wiwa and eight others. Immediately democracy returned to Nigeria 29 May 1999, Derek made sure that Nigeria hosted the next CJA international conference, which took place in the capital Abuja in 2000 in honour of the country's return to democratic rule. Besides, when Dele Giwa, the campaigning Nigerian editor was assassinated through a letter bomb on 19 October 1986, and Newswatch magazine that he edited was proscribed by the Babangida military junta, Derek was able to rally support of both the CJA and the CHRI and joined by the Commonwealth Press Union (CPU) to pressure Babangida to find Dele Giwa's killers and re-open Newswatch.

Born in 1925, he will be remembered as a distinguished Commonwealth writer, journalist and editor, a passionate believer in and fighter for freedom of the press, most especially, using his preferred phrase, the 'independence of the journalist'. He fought tirelessly for this to be the norm across the Commonwealth. Perhaps it is to his eternal credit and honour that the Commonwealth Principles on Freedom of Expression and the Role of the Media in Good Governance put together by the CJA, was launched last April in London to coincide with the 2018 Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting (CHOGM), which was hosted by the UK. He will be sorely missed.

Load-Date: June 30, 2018

---

End of Document

Derek Ingram: A tribute

The Nation (Nigeria)

June 29, 2018 Friday

Copyright 2018 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1073 words

Body

---

DEREK Ingram was a distinguished British journalist and editor known across the Commonwealth most especially for his incomparable knowledge of the association and perhaps most importantly for his love for journalism - development journalism especially. He died at his west London home, Sunday, June 17, aged 93.

Derek had moved through the ranks to become the deputy editor of the Daily Mail. After 17 years at the Daily Mail, he resigned as deputy editor after a disagreement with the aristocratic chairman of the newspaper Viscount Rothermere.

Derek left the Mail to start the Gemini News Feature Service in 1967, which was devoted to the coverage of development stories, especially from around the Commonwealth and disseminated globally. Gemini became so popular in newsrooms across the Commonwealth and the developing world in general that its base in London became the starting point for several bobbling Commonwealth journalists just starting a career in London in those days either in journalism or as foreign correspondents. Such Commonwealth journalists like Cameron Duodu from Ghana, and Trevor McDonald, from Trinidad and Tobago, used the Gemini News Feature Service to launch themselves into mainstream media and journalism in the UK. As London Correspondent of the Concord Press of Nigeria, I made it possible for the Concord to subscribe to Gemini News Feature Service. The subscription was still ongoing until I left in October 1983.

When I arrived in the UK in August 1978 to represent the Sketch Newspapers of Nigeria as London correspondent, Derek helped me to settle down by introducing me to the everyday 12:30 press briefing at the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office in London, where the UK's view and position on key events happening around the world on the day were first made known to diplomatic and foreign correspondents by government officials. He introduced me to his close friend and colleague, the Canadian broadcaster, Patrick Keatley, who was then the Diplomatic Editor of the UK Guardian newspaper.

It was through Derek and Patrick that I was introduced to the Chatham House. They recommended me for membership and I became a member of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. They also, with another ex-Guardian Education Editor, Richard Bourne, introduced me to the Round Table Moot - the editorial board of the Commonwealth Journal of International Affairs, membership of which I have retained for about 25 years now.

Derek travelled extensively in Africa as a journalist and for the Commonwealth. He related on a first-name basis with most pre-independence African leaders and politicians. He was a frequent visitor to Obosi, a village in eastern Nigeria, where he would visit Chief Emeka Anyaoku, the Nigerian diplomat who later became Commonwealth

Derek Ingram: A tribute

Secretary-General. During Anyaoku's tenure as Secretary-General, Derek was given the responsibility of traveling around the Commonwealth to sound out opinions on how to rebrand, move the Commonwealth forward and make it more attractive, relevant, and effective especially in a post-apartheid and modern world.

He was a most reliable repository of African and Commonwealth history and confidante to several Secretaries-General of the Commonwealth. Until old age caught up with him and he could no longer travel, he had attended almost all Commonwealth Heads of Government Summits - he attended 20 in all.

Derek co-founded the Commonwealth Journalists Association (CJA) in 1978 with Patrick Keatley. He served as the pioneer President of the CJA from 1980 to 1990. His tenure as CJA president was remarkable for establishing the CJA in most countries of the Commonwealth and making sure that journalists across member-countries could rely on the CJA for support, especially in their incessant struggles against pressures on the press from dictators and that Commonwealth journalists received adequate training. When he left as CJA president, he handed over to a distinguished Nigerian editor Ray Ekpu. Derek became President Emeritus of the CJA after his retirement in 1990.

Derek was also partly instrumental to the establishment of the Commonwealth Human Rights Initiative (CHRI). In a quiet but remarkable manner, he used both platforms of the CJA and CHRI to provide support for pro-democracy campaigners in Nigeria during the political crisis in the country in the mid-90s. He supported international opposition to both the Babangida and Abacha regimes that had trampled upon the democratic will of the Nigerian people by the annulment of the result of the June 12, 1993, general elections, which had been adjudged to be the freest, fairest and most credible in Nigeria's history.

Throughout the period Abacha remained in power in Nigeria, and despite the fact that a Nigerian had been elected and was now his successor as CJA president, Derek, and the CJA refused to take the international conference of the association to Nigeria, in order not to be seen to be providing credibility and recognition to the brutal Abacha regime, which had led to Nigeria's expulsion from the Commonwealth over the extrajudicial murder of the Ogoni rights activist Ken Saro Wiwa and eight others. Immediately democracy returned to Nigeria on May 29, 1999, Derek made sure that Nigeria hosted the next CJA international conference, which took place in the capital Abuja in 2000 in honour of the country's return to democratic rule. Besides, when Dele Giwa, the campaigning Nigerian editor was assassinated through a letter bomb on October 19, 1986, and Newswatch magazine that he edited was proscribed by the Babangida military junta, Derek was able to rally support of both the CJA and the CHRI and joined by the Commonwealth Press Union (CPU) to pressure Babangida to find Dele Giwa's killers and re-open Newswatch.

Born in 1925, he will be remembered as a distinguished Commonwealth writer, journalist and editor, a passionate believer in and fighter for freedom of the press, most especially, using his preferred phrase, the 'independence of the journalist'. He fought tirelessly for this to be the norm across the Commonwealth. Perhaps it is to his eternal credit and honour that the Commonwealth Principles on Freedom of Expression and the Role of the Media in Good Governance put together by the CJA, was launched last April in London to coincide with the 2018 Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting (CHOGM), which was hosted by the UK.

He will be sorely missed.

Load-Date: June 30, 2018

Will the deceased get justice?

Will the deceased get justice?

The Nation (Nigeria)

July 19, 2016 Tuesday

Copyright 2016 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1154 words

Body

---

The planned reopening of cases of assassination of two politicians at a time Nigerians had foreclosed any headway is a renewal of hope. BUNMI OGUNMODEDE revisits some of the unresolved high profile murder cases.

A glimmer of hope may have come for the families of those whose assassinations were politically motivated with plans by police authorities to re-arrest some of the principal suspects in the murders of former Attorney-General of the Federation and Minister of Justice Chief Bola Ige and ex-Deputy National Chairman (South-South) of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP), Chief Aminosari Dikibo. Before the police decided to reopen the cases of the two leading politicians, scores of cases on the murder remained unresolved and not a few Nigerians have lost faith in the ability of the judicial system to bring perpetrators of political assassinations to justice.

Though, there have been calls for the reopening of other unresolved murder cases beyond the duo of the late Ige and Dikibo, some have described the decision as a good starting point and expressed the hope that the reopening of the cases will no longer be a journey to nowhere. In Nigeria, political killings are not limited to the democratic era as many high profile assassinations in the 60s under the military have not been resolved.

Including the killings of the likes of first Prime Minister Abubakar Tafawa Balewa Gen. JTU Aguiyi-Ironsi, Brig Adekunle Fajuyi, Chief Samuel Ladoke Akintola and North's Premier Ahmadu Bello in the crossfires of the first military coup, till date, no suspect has been conclusively prosecuted and punished to serve as deterrent to others.

The brutal killings cut across every stratum of the society. The political circle, the judiciary, the business world, the academia all have their shares of senseless murders.

Not left out of the bitter pill are journalists. Since the killing of the profession's leading light Dele Giwa with a parcel bomb on October 19, 1986, many other budding talents have been assassinated in strange circumstances.

Thirty years after Giwa's assassination, "Who killed Dele Giwa?" has remained a recurring stanza and catchphrase in the polity. Those who were killed in similar circumstances include: Tunde Oladepo, a correspondent with The Guardian, who was killed by unknowned gunmen on February 26, 1998 Okezie Amaruben, publisher of an Enugu-based NewsService, who was shot on the street by a trigger-happy policeman on August 28, 1998 Fidelis Ikwuebe, a freelance journalist was abducted and killed while covering violent clashes between the Aguleri and Umuleri communities in Anambra State.

Other assassinated journalists were: Bagauda Kaltho Nansok Sallah Edo Sule Ugbagwu a judicial correspondent with The Nation Bayo Ohu Nathan Dabak Bolade Fasasi Modu Gubio Enenche Akogwu Omololu Falobi Godwin

Will the deceased get justice?

Agbroko Abayomi Ogundeji and Bayo Ohu, among others. On the political scene, the list is endless and so far, nobody has been punished because there has not been any diligent prosecution of masterminds.

Below are some of the unresolved cases: ulge One of the killings that drew so much attention was that of Esa-Oke, Osun State-born Bola Ige, who was murdered in his bedroom in Ibadan a day to the Christmas Eve of 2001. For years, the murder case of Nigeria's former chief law officer lingered in the court rooms, until the accused were discharged for want of concrete evidence.

uDikibo Chief Aminasoari Dikibo, a former Peoples Democratic Party National Vice Chairman in the (Southsouth), was also killed on February 6, 2004. His killers were never apprehended.

The police reportedly adopted a face-saving tactics by parading some armed robbers as suspects. uMarshal Harry A chieftain of the defunct All Nigeria Peoples Party (ANPP), Chief Marshal Harry was assassinated on March 5, 2003.

Like Ige and Rewane, he was killed at home and nobody has been punished for his murder uAlfred Rewane Elder statesman and an avowed critic of military dictatorship, a successful businessman and National Democratic Coalition (NADECO) financier, Pa Alfred Rewane, was murdered his Ikeja GRA home on October 9, in 1994. The case was on for a very long time with the trial of suspects who pleaded not guilty to the heinous crime.

uKudirat Abiola Wife of the acclaimed winner of the June 12, 1993 presidential election, Alhaja Kudirat Abiola, was shot near the old Toll Gate at the Ojota end of the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway on June 4, 1994. The Chief Security Officer (CSO) to the former Head of State, the late Gen Sani Abacha, Major Hamzat Al-Mustapha and others, who were charged for the murder, have since been discharged and acquitted.

uDgbonnaya Uche An ANNP senatorial candidate for Orlu zone, Ogbonnaya Uche, was murdered on February 8, 2003 in his Owerri, Imo State home. uAndrew Agom A member of the PDP Board of Trustees (BoT) and a former chief of the Nigeria Airways, Chief Andrew Agom, was killed on March 4, 2004.

He was allegedly riding in the same vehicle with Senator George Akume (then Benue State governor), when he was hit by bullets believed to have been fired by assassins. uAlabi Olajokun Renowned as a leading financier of the Oronmiyan Group, a socio-political movement within the defunct Action Congress (AC), Alhaji Alabi Olajokun was shot dead by suspected assassins at Gbongan Junction in Osun State on trip from Osogbo, en route Lagos on May 15, 2005.

u Igwe Barnabas The Onitsha branch chairman of Nigerian Bar Association (NBA), Chief Igwe Barnabas, was killed by suspected assassins' bullets on September 10, 2002. He was killed alongside his wife, Mrs.

Abigail Amaka Barnabas. uDunayo Olagbaju Odunayo Olagbaju won election in 1999 to represent Ile-Ife State Constituency in the Osun State House of Assembly.

He was killed by suspected assassins on December 21, 2001. uFunsho Williams A two-time governorship aspirant in Lagos, Funsho Williams, an engineer, was killed at his Dolphin Estate, Ikoyi, Lagos home on July 27, 2006.

The police are yet to identify his killers, almost a decade after his gruesome murder uAyo Daramola A former World Bank consultant and PDP governorship aspirant in Ekiti State, Dr Ayo Daramola, was murdered in 2006. The police have closed investigation to the murder of the Ijan-Ekiti-born technocrat.

uCharles Nsiegbe Chief Charles Nsiegbe was former Rivers State Governor Rotimi Amaechi's political associate. He was killed on the street of Port Harcourt on November 21, 2009.

uDipo Dina Otunba Dipo Dina, a trained accountant, was the Action Congress (AC) Ogun governorship candidate in 2007. He was shot dead by suspected assassins on January 25, 2010 around Covenant University in Ota, Ogun State.

Will the deceased get justice?

Between 1999 and 2012, more than 92 high profile political killings had been recorded. Some of the cases are still been investigated till date.

Others have been discontinued with for want of proofs and dearth of diligent prosecution.

Load-Date: July 20, 2016

---

End of Document

Will the deceased get justice?

Will the deceased get justice?

The Nation (Nigeria)

July 19, 2016 Tuesday

Copyright 2016 The Nation All Rights Reserved

Length: 1154 words

Body

---

The planned reopening of cases of assassination of two politicians at a time Nigerians had foreclosed any headway is a renewal of hope. BUNMI OGUNMODEDE revisits some of the unresolved high profile murder cases.

A glimmer of hope may have come for the families of those whose assassinations were politically motivated with plans by police authorities to re-arrest some of the principal suspects in the murders of former Attorney-General of the Federation and Minister of Justice Chief Bola Ige and ex-Deputy National Chairman (South-South) of the Peoples Democratic Party (PDP), Chief Aminosari Dikibo. Before the police decided to reopen the cases of the two leading politicians, scores of cases on the murder remained unresolved and not a few Nigerians have lost faith in the ability of the judicial system to bring perpetrators of political assassinations to justice.

Though, there have been calls for the reopening of other unresolved murder cases beyond the duo of the late Ige and Dikibo, some have described the decision as a good starting point and expressed the hope that the reopening of the cases will no longer be a journey to nowhere. In Nigeria, political killings are not limited to the democratic era as many high profile assassinations in the 60s under the military have not been resolved.

Including the killings of the likes of first Prime Minister Abubakar Tafawa Balewa Gen. JTU Aguiyi-Ironsi, Brig Adekunle Fajuyi, Chief Samuel Ladoke Akintola and North's Premier Ahmadu Bello in the crossfires of the first military coup, till date, no suspect has been conclusively prosecuted and punished to serve as deterrent to others.

The brutal killings cut across every stratum of the society. The political circle, the judiciary, the business world, the academia all have their shares of senseless murders.

Not left out of the bitter pill are journalists. Since the killing of the profession's leading light Dele Giwa with a parcel bomb on October 19, 1986, many other budding talents have been assassinated in strange circumstances.

Thirty years after Giwa's assassination, "Who killed Dele Giwa?" has remained a recurring stanza and catchphrase in the polity. Those who were killed in similar circumstances include: Tunde Oladepo, a correspondent with The Guardian, who was killed by unknowned gunmen on February 26, 1998 Okezie Amaruben, publisher of an Enugu-based NewsService, who was shot on the street by a trigger-happy policeman on August 28, 1998 Fidelis Ikwuebe, a freelance journalist was abducted and killed while covering violent clashes between the Aguleri and Umuleri communities in Anambra State.

Other assassinated journalists were: Bagauda Kaltho Nansok Sallah Edo Sule Ugbagwu a judicial correspondent with The Nation Bayo Ohu Nathan Dabak Bolade Fasasi Modu Gubio Enenche Akogwu Omololu Falobi Godwin

Will the deceased get justice?

Agbroko Abayomi Ogundeji and Bayo Ohu, among others. On the political scene, the list is endless and so far, nobody has been punished because there has not been any diligent prosecution of masterminds.

Below are some of the unresolved cases: ulge One of the killings that drew so much attention was that of Esa-Oke, Osun State-born Bola Ige, who was murdered in his bedroom in Ibadan a day to the Christmas Eve of 2001. For years, the murder case of Nigeria's former chief law officer lingered in the court rooms, until the accused were discharged for want of concrete evidence.

uDikibo Chief Aminasoari Dikibo, a former Peoples Democratic Party National Vice Chairman in the (Southsouth), was also killed on February 6, 2004. His killers were never apprehended.

The police reportedly adopted a face-saving tactics by parading some armed robbers as suspects. uMarshal Harry A chieftain of the defunct All Nigeria Peoples Party (ANPP), Chief Marshal Harry was assassinated on March 5, 2003.

Like Ige and Rewane, he was killed at home and nobody has been punished for his murder uAlfred Rewane Elder statesman and an avowed critic of military dictatorship, a successful businessman and National Democratic Coalition (NADECO) financier, Pa Alfred Rewane, was murdered his Ikeja GRA home on October 9, in 1994. The case was on for a very long time with the trial of suspects who pleaded not guilty to the heinous crime.

uKudirat Abiola Wife of the acclaimed winner of the June 12, 1993 presidential election, Alhaja Kudirat Abiola, was shot near the old Toll Gate at the Ojota end of the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway on June 4, 1994. The Chief Security Officer (CSO) to the former Head of State, the late Gen Sani Abacha, Major Hamzat Al-Mustapha and others, who were charged for the murder, have since been discharged and acquitted.

uDgbonnaya Uche An ANNP senatorial candidate for Orlu zone, Ogbonnaya Uche, was murdered on February 8, 2003 in his Owerri, Imo State home. uAndrew Agom A member of the PDP Board of Trustees (BoT) and a former chief of the Nigeria Airways, Chief Andrew Agom, was killed on March 4, 2004.

He was allegedly riding in the same vehicle with Senator George Akume (then Benue State governor), when he was hit by bullets believed to have been fired by assassins. uAlabi Olajokun Renowned as a leading financier of the Oronmiyan Group, a socio-political movement within the defunct Action Congress (AC), Alhaji Alabi Olajokun was shot dead by suspected assassins at Gbongan Junction in Osun State on trip from Osogbo, en route Lagos on May 15, 2005.

u Igwe Barnabas The Onitsha branch chairman of Nigerian Bar Association (NBA), Chief Igwe Barnabas, was killed by suspected assassins' bullets on September 10, 2002. He was killed alongside his wife, Mrs.

Abigail Amaka Barnabas. uDunayo Olagbaju Odunayo Olagbaju won election in 1999 to represent Ile-Ife State Constituency in the Osun State House of Assembly.

He was killed by suspected assassins on December 21, 2001. uFunsho Williams A two-time governorship aspirant in Lagos, Funsho Williams, an engineer, was killed at his Dolphin Estate, Ikoyi, Lagos home on July 27, 2006.

The police are yet to identify his killers, almost a decade after his gruesome murder uAyo Daramola A former World Bank consultant and PDP governorship aspirant in Ekiti State, Dr Ayo Daramola, was murdered in 2006. The police have closed investigation to the murder of the Ijan-Ekiti-born technocrat.

uCharles Nsiegbe Chief Charles Nsiegbe was former Rivers State Governor Rotimi Amaechi's political associate. He was killed on the street of Port Harcourt on November 21, 2009.

uDipo Dina Otunba Dipo Dina, a trained accountant, was the Action Congress (AC) Ogun governorship candidate in 2007. He was shot dead by suspected assassins on January 25, 2010 around Covenant University in Ota, Ogun State.

Will the deceased get justice?

Between 1999 and 2012, more than 92 high profile political killings had been recorded. Some of the cases are still been investigated till date.

Others have been discontinued with for want of proofs and dearth of diligent prosecution.

Load-Date: July 20, 2016

---

End of Document

Ex-Daily Times MD Dies in Road Crash

Daily Trust (Abuja)

March 06, 2017

Copyright 2017 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 585 words

Body

---

Former Managing Director of Daily Times Nigeria Plc and a one-time Senior Special Assistant to the former Vice president Atiku Abubakar on Public Communications, Dr. Adinoyi Ojo Onukuba, is dead.

Aged 57, Onukuba was involved in motor accident on Sunday evening in Akure, Ondo State while returning from the 80th birthday celebration of former president Olusegun Obasanjo.

A versatile journalist and playwright, Dr. Onukuba was born on March 9, 1960 in Oboroke-Ihima, Okehi LGA of Kogi State to the family of Mallam Shuaibu Onukuba and Hajia Aisha Onukuba.

He obtained his first degree in 1982 in Theatre Arts from University of Ibadan. He served his national service at Radio Nigeria, Ikoyi -Lagos in 1982/83.

He joined The Guardian newspaper as one of its pioneer reporters in 1983. He rose to the position of News Editor before travelling out in 1989 for graduate studies. He bagged Master of Arts degree in Journalism from New York University, New York, USA. He worked as a Research Officer at the African Leadership Forum, New York. Onukuba also served as the Information officer, Division of Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM) between 1994 and 1995. He obtained his Doctor of Philosophy degree in 1996 from New York University.

Dr. Onukuba became Adjunct Professor of Mass Communication at the School of New Resources, College of New Rochelle, New York in 1997. Between 1997 and 1998, he worked as Press Officer, Department of Public Information, United Nations (New York). In June 1998, he was sent to Iraq as an Information Officer, United Nations Office of the Humanitarian Coordinator. Upon his return to Nigeria in 1999 to participate in the present democratic dispensation, former Vice President Atiku Abubakar appointed him as Special Assistant on Media Relations. He had known and related closely with both Atiku and Olusegun Obasanjo since 1984.

Onukuba got to the peak of his journalistic career in August 1999 when he was appointed Managing Director/Chief Executive Officer of the then ailing Daily Times of Nigeria PLC. He worked tirelessly to reposition the Daily Times and made it attractive to investors. The company was privatized in 2004. Onukuba returned to the presidency as Senior Special Assistant to the former Vice president Atiku Abubakar on Public Communications between July 2003 and April 2005. Beyond Onukuba's humble exterior lies impenetrable armour of principle and dedication to duty. In December 2005, the Okun Youth Solidarity Forum (OYSF) led by Hon. Adeniyi Sunday Bello, honoured him with the "Pillar of Youth Award" in recognition of his services to the State.

Ex- Daily Times MD Dies in Road Crash

Earlier in 2001, the then Governor Abubakar Audu of Kogi State honoured him as one of the distinguished citizens of the state. Onukaba has received numerous other awards for his decency, integrity, creativity and kindness.

Adinoyi Ojo Onukaba, a seasoned journalist, playwright and publisher of high repute, has published so many books and journals including: "In the Eye of Time"- a biography of former President Olusegun Obasanjo. "Atiku Abubakar"- a biography of former Vice President Atiku Abubakar. "Born to Run" - a biography of Late Dele Giwa, co-authored by him and Dele Olojede. Some of his plays include Her Majesty's Visit, A Resting Place, Tower of Burden, The Virginity Flee, The Lone Ranger, Bargain Hunting, and Soommalliyya. His play, "The Killing Swamp" was one of the three finalists for the 2010 NLNG Literature Awards.

He was married with children.

Load-Date: March 6, 2017

---

End of Document

A President in Need of Disciples [opinion]

This Day (Lagos)

February 13, 2016

Copyright 2016 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 2051 words

Body

---

Fellow Nigerians, let me say right away that I do not envy President Muhammadu Buhari at this moment. It cannot be easy carrying the burden of nearly 200 million highly boisterous people. It is worse when your predecessors had messed up big time thus almost snuffing life out of a potentially great nation. What a shame!

I'm not trying to find and make excuses for the President. Far from it, but it is pertinent to constantly remind ourselves of how we got to this sad juncture. I seriously doubt if Mr President ever bargained for this monstrosity that has confronted him so early in his long awaited and much trumpeted second coming. The Naira has nose-dived in the most cataclysmic fall ever in the history of our beleaguered country. And the disaster I foresee and predict would be monumental if a miracle does not happen soon. I won't be surprised if our great leader is experiencing insomnia and wondering what has hit him like a thunderbolt.

When I had the privilege of sitting with our President one on one, I was reasonably persuaded that he has in him the right dose of passion and patriotism necessary to reignite this great country. He also has the guts to take on dangerous tasks. He wouldn't have been a Major General if he was lily-livered. There is no question in my mind that he has what it takes to lead Nigeria out of the doldrums. But whenever I think of the debilitating challenges he is currently facing what comes to my mind is that the man is running a lonely marathon. I'm not sure he has enough disciples around willing to imbibe his spirit of simplicity and integrity. The reason is very simple. It is not so easy to be a Buhari devotee.

What do I mean? Buhari is a preacher who teaches what is quite difficult for an average Nigerian to follow and obey. I already explained in my column last week why corruption is very attractive in Nigeria. The contradictions within our ruling classes make it almost impossible to be a pontiff in our clime. The society makes silly demands of the public officer. The public officer also has the mind-set of a demi-god. He knows everyone sucks up to him and expects him to be a Santa Claus in office. There are other expectations he must activate and actualise. In summary, he is not expected to retire into poverty and perdition. Now Buhari is saying that is no longer possible. And that Big Brother is watching everyone and everywhere. How realistic this is, we are yet to see.

Corruption is not an easy scourge to exterminate especially when it has become cancerous and malignant. Ours has spread far and wide. What is the President doing? Fighting corruption has become an all-consuming agenda, indeed, perhaps, the only visible agenda that is raking in all attention and headlines. No one knows how much has been recovered, where it is kept and what is being done with the humongous loot. The EFCC is working frenetically on overdrive. I hope they are able to cope with the deluge of cases that keeps unfolding almost on daily basis.

A President in Need of Disciples [opinion]

The President also seems to have placed his fate more in the hands of Government technocrats. These civil servants are expected to propel the policy directions of this administration. But is that working as planned and expected? I can't confidently confirm anything of the sort. I'm almost certain they are already letting down the President. There is no other evidence than the budget conundrum that has left this Federal Government terribly exposed and heavily scandalised. Whoever participated in crafting that horrific document has not done the President any favours. In fact, the budget-drafting team has done incalculable damage to a government that rode to power on the crest of frugality and accountability. Not only is the budget outlandishly profligate it is atrociously hypocritical.

What Nigerians wanted from President Buhari is simple and straight-forward. One, reverse the reckless spending in Abuja and replace it with prudent spending on common-sense capital projects and investments. Two, make corruption unattractive by establishing a workable regime of crime and punishment. Three, tidy up the economy and create a conducive environment for investors and their investments. Four, arrest the perfidious attacks of Boko Haram and make every inch of the Nigerian landscape safer for every citizen or foreigner. Five, upgrade our worthless educational system and create substantial opportunities for our army of unemployed youths. Six, fix our comatose infrastructure and restore aesthetic glory to our environment. Seven, find some veritable alternatives to our over-dependence on a monolithic economy in this season of oil commotion.

Unfortunately, I don't think some of the disciples are working in tandem with the Commander-in-Chief. Rather, they are skilfully wasting the resources that are so difficult to come by. Worse still, they want Nigeria to mortgage its future by borrowing money to fund their expensive habits. I sincerely beg the President to cancel the rubbish budget and substitute it with one that will reflect the principles and values upon which he was elected. It is better late than never. Nigeria is in bad shape. There is no point pretending to be a wealthy nation when we are miserably poor. We must do what countries like China and India did, invest heavily in education and food production. Education is the greatest leveller and the key that can unlock a prosperous future. Remove hunger out of poverty and you would have killed penury half-way and also energised the people.

I watched in utter amazement as theorists propounded some jejune thesis on how to save the Naira against the US Dollar. They cleverly stood truth on its head by recommending that those sending their children to schools abroad should be ready to pay the full dollar rate. What stupidity? No sensible country plays politics with sound education and good health. Even at a time Nigeria had quality education most of those who later became our elites schooled abroad. They travelled by sea and later by air. Most of them enjoyed government or foreign scholarships. My own Brother left Nigeria as an indigent student in 1965 after his A'levels and returned with a PhD from Stanford University.

Those preaching that Nigerians should remain at home have refused to take care of home. These preachers will still spend public money on sending their own children abroad for studies and vacations. They will go for medical treatment abroad at public expense. Education is a universal phenomenon and no amount spent on it is ever wasted. It is a shame that our politicians and members of the privilegedtsia would rather punish Nigerian students abroad instead of cutting their own excesses at home. They would rather we produce half-baked illiterates than offer our youths the opportunity to display their natural wizardry globally. This is the worst decision any government can make and President Buhari should veto the shenanigan of the carpetbaggers who are trying to sell him a rubbish legacy. What will save Nigeria ultimately is a well-educated citizenry and not the beautiful government houses and bullet-proof cars. I can name thousands of our icons who schooled abroad and returned home with bright ideas needed to grow our economy.

The Chinese and Indians litter everywhere on this planet! You find them as IT gurus today because their governments encouraged them to acquire knowledge from the greatest institutions in the world. Only the children of the poor would be affected by our ill-thought decision while the rich can afford anything, anyhow. Education would then become the exclusive preserve of the privileged few and those who wish to join them would have to steal to catch up. We should not push our people into more hardship. Paying fees abroad is more verifiable and virtuous than budgeting billions for over-inflated contracts and flights of fancy.

A President in Need of Disciples [opinion]

The President should please avoid enemies from every direction. In case he is not aware, Nigeria is tension-soaked at the moment. The change we promised was to reduce and not to escalate hardship. Nigerians are ever willing to make sacrifices if and when the leaders are seen to be reasonable and sincere. As promised, when I met our great leader after he took office, I will continue to advise this government in order to avoid the pitfalls of the past. There are huge challenges but they are not impossible to tackle. The solution is not the type of jamboree and propaganda that certain people are recommending. We finished campaigning with drums and tambourines last year; it is now time to settle down to serious work. Rebranding Nigeria every time a new government comes is shambolic and myopic. There is nothing to campaign about again after election. A beautiful work will always speak for itself. On a final note this week, the President should fast-forward the war against corruption by recovering as much loot as possible very urgently. We should decrease the raucous and riotous drama surrounding the corruption crusade by revving up the substance of the war and establishing our goals and destination. When tomorrow comes, no one would ask how many people were jailed but everyone would always remember the hunger that ravaged the land in the time of Lagbaja. It is the bitter truth.

A TOAST TO FLORENCE ITA-GIWA AT 70 The name Florence Ita-Giwa flashed across my consciousness over 30 years ago. The news of her whirlwind romance with the famous journalist Dele Giwa and their short-lived marriage had spread like bushfire in harmattan. Of course, the assassination of Dele Giwa on October 19, 1986, would amplify Florence Ita-Giwa's name. The melodrama of Florence and Dele's wedding would later be captured by Dele Olojede and Onukaba Adinoyi-Ojo's biography on the life and times of Dele Giwa, titled BORN TO RUN.

The description of this gorgeous lady and Calabar Princess read like fairy-tale and I looked forward to meeting her someday. I landed in Lagos in 1988 after completing my Master's in Literature in English at Obafemi Awolowo University, Ile-Ife and instantly took appointment at the African Concord magazine. Months later, in February 1989, I was transferred to a new publication, Weekend Concord, and there my rendezvous with Nigerian celebrities and newsmakers began. From Weekend Concord, I resigned and joined Classique magazine, owned by May Ellen Ezekiel Mofe-Damijo, now of blessed memory, as Editor.

It was while at Classique that I got to know very well some of the movers and shakers of Nigeria. Florence Ita-Giwa had already established herself as a veritable member of that class. She had a powerful aura and exuded panache. There was no way anyone could have missed a lady who mesmerised Nigeria with her beauty and brains. We met and we became friends forever. She never stopped extolling my writing skills. Unknown to her, I had been greatly influenced by Dele Giwa who incidentally was born at number 2 Atiba Square, Ile-Ife, where I later grew up, though we never met. Aunty Florence and I were party animals by virtue of our socialite status and we met at too many functions in Lagos and London. She and her circle of friends also stopped by at my Accra home for dinner and we danced late into the night. Aunty Florence is always such a jolly good woman.

I was particularly fascinated by her political adventures and charitable spirit. She served her people of Bakassi, a peninsula between Nigeria and Cameroon, loyally. She fought hard for them to remain within the geographical boundary of Nigeria. This coupled with her adoption and sponsorship of children from that area was how she acquired the moniker of Mama Bakassi. She became a Senator of the Federal Republic of Nigeria and later Special Adviser to President Olusegun Obasanjo on National Assembly Matters. She handled every assignment with total dedication and competence.

Born on February 19, 1946, Senator Florence Ita-Giwa turns 70 in the next few days. I'm proud and privileged to raise a toast to this ageless beauty ahead of her celebrations which starts with a reception this evening by the Fashion Designers Association of Nigeria (FADAN, of which I'm a patron) and a seminar to be hosted by the African Women in Leadership Organisation next Monday in Lagos. Here's a toast to good health and more prosperity... â€¢

Load-Date: February 14, 2016

NUJ Abuja Protest Over Murdered Journalists

Daily Trust (Abuja)

May 2, 2010 Sunday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 315 words

Byline: Abubakar Yakubu

Body

---

Members of the Nigeria Union of Journalists (NUJ) Abuja Council Saturday carried placards to protest the killings of journalists and insistent threats to their lives.

The journalists, who joined other workers to mark the May Day celebrations at Eagle Square Abuja, held placards that read 'Stop the killings of journalist', 'Journalists need to be protected' and 'FOI bill is for every one'.

Our reporter learnt that the council had before that day sent a petition to the FCT Police Commissioner, Mr. John Haruna, over plans by yet to be identified persons to kill some journalists in the course of their constitutional duties.

In the petition, Mr. Jacob Edi, chairman of the council, expressed the worries of the council that politicians and political actors have made journalists targets of assassinations.

The chairman stated that a council member, Chuks Okocha of This Day, sent him a text he received that read thus: "Gbenga Aruleba (AIT), Yusuf Ali (The Nation), Olusola Fabiyi (PUNCH), Chuks Okocha (This Day). U all have no hiding place. U must be happy now dat Prof. Maurice Iwu has been sacked due to ur bad stories and reports. We will deal wit u soon. Remember Dele Giwa, Bayo Ohu and Edo Ubagwu? Gud luck".

The council chairman expressed worry over the development and called on the FCT police boss to provide 24-hour security for the affected journalists and others as well as leave nothing to chance in bringing to book all those that are responsible for the senseless killing of journalists in the country.

"By this protest letter, we are handing over these journalists to your protective custody and hope that no harm will come to either of them or members of their family," the petition read.

City News further learnt that several attempts to the GSM number 08063623794, where the threat came from yielded no result as the service provider kept saying the number was out of service.

Load-Date: May 3, 2010

Babangida And the Bypass to Nowhere [column]

This Day (Lagos)

September 3, 2010 Friday

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1622 words

Dateline: Lagos

Body

---

On this page last week, Chidi Amuta, a man more difficult to ignore than to agree with, wrote a tribute to former military President, Ibrahim Babangida, his friend and benefactor. But Amuta's piece titled, "Babangida and the Western bypass," was more than a tribute.

It was part chastisement and part plea to the conscience of the Yoruba nation, which, according to Amuta, still bears Babangida a deadly grudge in spite of all that he did for Yoruba sons and daughters when he was military president and even after he left office.

The piece was also supposed to redeem the memory of those now in their late 20s or early 30s from the havoc and savagery of the prejudiced lot who, in Amuta's view, are determined to revise the history of the Babangida era. I am part of the prejudiced lot, but I have no apologies.

Why? Because my prejudice is neither personal nor blighted by my association with the so-called western bypass for many years. It is not based on fiction either or a meanness to deny Babangida credit for the good things he did which Amuta could not even fully list.

My prejudice is based on what I saw and experienced as an adult during Babangida's eight-year rule.

If I had any doubts that Babangida is unworthy of public office his conduct after he was forced to leave office 17 years ago has since erased such doubts. Sure, after the harsh spell that the country had been through under the Buhari/Idiagbon rule, Babangida seized power a different man. He would have been a fool to play Rehoboam, the Israelite king who took the advice of his friends and flogged his people with scorpions when he needed to soothe their pains.

Babangida wormed his way into our hearts, posing like our own Abdel Nasser the soldier's soldier who restored his country's pride and became a strong voice for pan-Arab nationalism. But Babangida, being Babangida, brought his own ambition game to a cropper. Now, he wants to be our De Gaulle or Churchill?

Yes, he pressed some of the best and brightest in the Yoruba nation to service. But except for the purpose of creating a comfort zone out of Babangidanistan, I do not see the point in dragging Wole Soyinka, Bolaji Akinyemi, Michael Omolayole, Ojetunde Aboyade, Olikoye Ransome-Kuti, Tai Solarin or any of the others mentioned into a debate about Babangida's credentials. These people loved their country and were happy to do their bit to bring it out of the difficult situation it was in at the time. I think it's unfair to their legacy and memory to suggest, as Amuta did, that they were recruited to appease some ethnic god who they, their nationality, and the nation are now obliged to repay.

Babangida And the Bypass to Nowhere [column]

There were other non-Yoruba professionals like Tony Momoh, Sam Oyovbaire, Jerry Gana, Tam David-West, Omo Omoruyi and Abubakar Umar Dangiwa, who stepped up to the plate believing it was a call to give their country a future and a hope. Except if they had good reason beforehand to suspect that Babangida's rule would turn out to be the disaster that it was or stayed on after the fact, it serves no more useful purpose reminding us that Soyinka served under Babangida than it does saying that Sani Abacha appointed Pius Okigbo to chair the panel on the Central Bank accounts in 1994.

Oh no, I am not so mean, or jaundiced, as to forget a few of Babangida's good works. The liberalisation of broadcast media licences, the tinkering with the structure of the capital market, the directorate for roads and infrastructure, and of course, the technical aid corps, which was a lifeline to a few African countries. But who, in Babangida's shoes, given so much, would have done less? Apart from Olusegun Obasanjo in his second coming as civilian president in 1999, there is arguably no other Nigerian leader in recent times who enjoyed so much drumbeat of goodwill at the inception of his rule and yet, as my people would say, ended his dance with the left hand.

How can one explain, for example, that the same man who opened up the media space, was the one who shut down Punch, hunted the press, and assailed academic freedom the highpoint of which was exemplified by his abduction and deportation of Patrick Wilmot in 1988 for "teaching what he was not paid to teach?" Wasn't the Liberian crisis also, for good measure, a gravy train on the watch of the man who enthusiastically supported the technical aid corps?

His main economic programme, the Structural Adjustment Programme, has been praised as a masterstroke ahead of its time. Maybe it was. But like too much of every good thing the consequences are in evidence, even today. Take the power sector, for example. Babangida did not bring power supply to ruin, but his half-hearted attempt to save it left behind a greater mess. In 1988, he put in place a 25-year power plan to redeem decaying infrastructure and narrow the supply-demand gap. The plan had barely taken off when he introduced SAP which left the prices of everything from the price of staple food to the unit price of electricity (which was 6 kobo in 1979) in a tailspin.

Babangida's government, incapable of telling the truth about anything, was neither able to pursue the power plan nor to tell consumers that the economic crisis created by SAP had inevitably widened the gap between the capacity charge for electricity (which covers the replacement cost of infrastructure) and the energy charge (which covers the operational costs). Simply put, government was picking up the subsidy while consumers who had grown by the millions were hardly paying the real cost per wattage consumed. To date, we are still in the quagmire.

In contrast to his predecessor, his personal touch was fairy tale stuff. His charming smiles often made me smile when I saw his face in the newspapers or watched him on TV. But that was before the parcel bomb that killed Dele Giwa at breakfast on October 19, 1986.

Dele Giwa had been my idol, my role model - one of the main reasons, apart from Ray Ekpu, Yakubu Mohammed and Dan Agbese, why I wanted to become a journalist. Babangida has said he had nothing to do with the murder of Dele Giwa and has made it plain that he does not wish to answer any more questions on the matter. That is just as well. But the untidy manner in which his regime handled investigations into the murder, frustrating independent enquiry and fending off leads whenever they pointed up the military hierarchy, would cast a very long shadow on his past and his future ambition.

Neither the passage of time nor the force of a thousand brilliant pieces by Amuta can dim the memory of that day when as an undergraduate I filed past the shattered remains of Dele Giwa in front of Newswatch Oregun office to say a final goodbye to the man who had inspired me.

And how can I forget Major Remi Okeowo, my friend and classmate at the University of Lagos who died in the Hercules C130 air crash in 1992 that claimed the lives of a generation of some of Nigeria's best and brightest military officers? Don't get me wrong. I'm not blaming Babangida for the crash, even though it happened under his nose. However, the sheer levity and incompetence of the rescue, not to mention the shrouded nature of the fatal trip, never ceases to amaze me; it sticks in the nails and just won't go away.

Babangida And the Bypass to Nowhere [column]

But why should that be? Amuta said Babangida loved his friends - and went out of his way to please even his enemies. Okay maybe he was a nice guy but I don't think Mamman Vatsa's family - or a number of people who believe in fair play - will be sending him roses as he formally announces his intention to seek the PDP ticket in a few days, never mind that Amuta's piece made it look like the race for the party's ticket is Babangida's to lose.

Vatsa and others were charged with complicity in a failed coup to remove Babangida in 1986. The evidence against Vasta, was to say the least, dubious. Appeals were mounted to resolve the doubt in his favour and save him from execution. To stave off the pressure, however, Babangida's government announced, with "deep regret," that Vasta had been executed "one hour ago," when, in fact, he had not been executed at the time. Of course, Vatsa was later executed and those who did it have since washed their hands, but not their hearts.

Was the agape love reserved for M.K.O Abiola then? That's what Amuta seems to suggest - that Babangida loved Abiola more than the millions of voters who voted for him as their president in the freest and fairest election yet on June 12, 1993. It's the kind of love that pushes a friend over the cliff and returns home to drown itself in tears; Saulish love that puts sacrifice over obedience. Or else what was the point in bending over backwards to please the Yoruba nation, when what was required of him was to simply do the right thing by handing over to the winner of the election?

If the past is past, bringing closure, it now seems, to an era of "rule by settlement,"; debate about how the Gulf War oil windfall was spent; Babangida's refusal on a technical point to appear before the Oputa Panel that investigated human rights abuses; and the damaging legacy of First Ladyship after Better Life among other things, in vain have I tried to search for what Babangida brings to the future.

At 69, he reportedly said in an interview that he is motivated to run for the presidency because he had seen signs that the younger generation is incapable of running the nation.

Trust me, it's not about age, IBB; it's about knowing when to say, enough. Unfortunately with the stats made to look just the way he would like it - as if he is only inches away from the prize - nothing else matters now. Amuta may not agree, but the only bypass that Babangida needs, is the one that takes him back to his Hill Top Mansion in Minna - and keeps him there.

Load-Date: September 7, 2010

---

End of Document

Repent of your corrupt antecedents, Clergy urges IBB

Nigerian Tribune

February 5, 2018 Monday

Copyright 2018 African Newspapers of Nigeria Limited All Rights Reserved

Length: 448 words

Body

---

REACTING to a statement issued by former military President, Ibrahim Babangida asking President Muhammadu Buhari not to seek re-election in 2019, a Clergy, Most Rev. Steve Onwu has said the former leader's penchant for corruption has pitched him against the anti-corruption crusade of the present administration.

Onwu who is the Executive Director, New Initiative for Credible Leadership (NICReL) addressing a press conference in Abuja on Monday, also alleged that besides the Babangida's era as President seeing Nigeria rank highest on the Global Corruption Index, it introduced use of bombs in killing innocent citizens amongst other ills that the country is currently grappling to overcome.

The Clergy said it was regrettable that at old age, the Former President and his like have failed to repent of their sins but are rather seeking desperate ways to get back at the country to continue and continue to pilfer its resources.

'The people coalescing in this manner are connected one way or the other with the grand corruption that has kept Nigeria in the doldrums and they are also the ones that are losing their grips on the illicit revenue from corruption under the ongoing reforms.

'Even in the midst of these ominous conjugations, however, we could not but notice the dark humour of the man credited as the father of corruption and the one that institutionalized corruption in Nigeria now grandstanding on the same issue in his desperation for relevance.'

'If old age has erased IBB's memory, Nigerians are not able to forget that his economic policies left the country bankrupt and reduced to a nation in need of foreign help despite its abundant natural resources. The fallout of his rule underpins the economic morass that the country is still struggling to exit several decades later,' Onuh stated.

He also described as ridiculous the comment of the former military President on security alleging further that he planted the curse of insecurity in the country.

'His commentary on security is really sad as it amounted to him dancing on the graves of those that have been killed in an insurgency that has been clearly traced to some of his cronies. As a reminder to the Evil Genius, he introduced letter bomb in the controversial death of senior Nigerian journalist, Dele Giwa. It was an art he made into a science and his fingerprint has been all over several other bombing campaigns in the country.'

ALSO READ: Restructuring: Yakassai differs with IBB

Repent of your corrupt antecedents, Clergy urges IBB

NICReL called on Nigerians to put the Obasanjo, IBB, and the other members of their alliance (that are yet to come out) on notice that they shall be held responsible for any breach of peace in the run-up to the 2019 General Elections.

Load-Date: February 7, 2018

---

End of Document

POLITICS-NIGERIA: TALES OF MILITARY ABUSES RECOUNTED BY VICTIMS

IPS-Inter Press Service

December 12, 2000, Tuesday

Copyright 2000 IPS-Inter Press Service/Global Information Network

Length: 1005 words

Byline: By Remi Oyo

Dateline: LAGOS, Dec. 12

Body

---

An investigating panel on human rights abuses during Nigeria's period of military rule will continue hearing testimonies from victims and perpetrators alike, in an unprecedented recounting of conspiracies, attempted coups, and torture of prisoners by the nation's security forces.

The panel was supposed to have concluded on Dec. 8, leaving time for two other sessions in the eastern city of Port Harcourt and the northern city of Kaduna. However, it has been extended by a week to allow all the witnesses to testify.

Headed by Chukwudifu Oputa, a retired Supreme Court judge, the panel was established by President Olusegun Obasanjo to recommend redress for victims and punishment for those found guilty of perpetrating gross abuses during the period 1984-1999.

But critics say the panel, which has no judicial powers, is nothing but a chronicler of the "theater of absurd."

"The Oputa panel is a waste of time, waste of money, waste of energy," septuagenarian lawyer and politician Abraham Adesanya said shortly after one witness admitted to carrying out attempts to assassinate him.

Adesanya, leader of the National Democratic Coalition (Nadeco), which vehemently opposed the despotic rule of late head of state Sani Abacha, asked: "How do you expect people to forgive those who were torturing our people?"

Referring to the copious apologies and tears shed at the panel by Abacha aides currently standing trial for political murders, the lawyer said apologies were not enough.

"There must be penitence, then forgiveness can follow. But in this case, there is no penitence whatsoever," Adesanya added.

Gani Fawehinmi, another lawyer and activist, also said in testimony before the panel that "everything must be in the open."

POLITICS- NIGERIA : TALES OF MILITARY ABUSES RECOUNTED BY VICTIMS

In earlier comments, Fawehinmi, who was jailed by the military governments, insisted that former President Ibrahim Babangida must testify regarding the death in 1986 of Dele Giwa, CEO of the weekly magazine Newswatch.

